This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

1914 SESSION CASES.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION,

AND ALSO IN THE

COURT OF JUSTICIARY

AND

HOUSE OF LORDS,

FROM JULY 20, 1913, TO JULY 22, 1914.

REPORTED BY

A. J. ALISON (ASSISTANT EDITOR), J. H. HENDERSON, R. C. HENDERSON, W. A. RAMSAY, AND
R. A. LEE, ADVOCATES.

EDITED BY

J. S. LEADBETTER, ADVOCATE.

Published for the Faculty of Advocates

BY

T. & T. CLARK, EDINBURGH,

AND STEVENS & SONS, LONDON.

M.CMXIV.

PRINTED BY GEORGE ROLB & CO., CLYDE STREET, EDINBURGH.

279750

STANFORD LIBRARY

JUDGES

OF THE

COURT OF SESSION

DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

FIRST DIVISION.

Lord President, The Lord STRATHCLYDE.*
The Lord KINNEAR.†
Lord JOHNSTON.
Lord MACKENZIE.
Lord SKERRINGTON.

SECOND DIVISION.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. Sir JOHN H. A. MACDONALD, K.C.B.
Lord DUNDAS.
Lord SALVESEN.
Lord GUTHRIE.

PERMANENT LORDS ORDINARY.

Lord SKERRINGTON.
Lord CULLEN.
Lord DEWAR.
Lord ORMIDALE.
Lord HUNTER.
Lord ANDERSON.‡

---

* Lord Strathclyde took his seat, in succession to Lord Dunedin, on 17th October 1913.
† Lord Kinnear resigned on 21st October 1913.
‡ Lord Anderson took his seat on 4th November 1913.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

Lord Justice-General, The Lord STRATHCLYDE.

Lord Justice-Clerk, { The Right Hon. Sir JOHN H. A. MACDONALD, K.C.B.

LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF JUSTICIARY.

The other Judges of the Court of Session.

Lord Advocate, { The Right Hon. ALEXANDER URE, succeeded by the Right Hon. ROBERT MUNRO.

Dean of Faculty, { The Right Hon. CHARLES SCOTT DICKSON.

Solicitor-General, { ANDREW MACBETH ANDERSON, Esq., succeeded by THOMAS BRASH MORISON, Esq.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PEERS

WHO DELIVERED JUDGMENTS IN SCOTCH APPEALS DURING THE PERIOD OF THESE REPORTS.

Lord Chancellor, VISCOUNT HALDANE.

EARL LOREBURN, EARL OF HALSBURY, Lords KINNEAR, DUNEDIN, ATKINSON, SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE, PARKER OF WADDINGTON, SUMNER, and PARMOOR.

INDEX OF NAMES

IN 1914 SESSION CASES.

For Index of Names in Lands Valuation Appeal Court, see p. x.,—Court of Justiciary, see p. x.,—House of Lords, see p. xii.

I.—COURT OF SESSION.

	Page
Aberdeen Female Domestic Servants' Benevolent Fund,	8
Adam (Colville's Judicial Factor) v. Nicoll,	62
Advocate, Lord, Anderson's Trustees v.	942
Advocate, Lord, Mathieson v.	464
Advocate, Lord, v. Montgomery's Trustees,	414
Aitken v. Finlayson, Bousfield, & Co., Limited,	770
Aitken v. Robson,	224
Allan's Trustees, Mathieson v.	464
Ancient Order of Foresters, Baird & Co., Limited, v.	965
Anderson v. Dickie,	706
Anderson's Trustees v. Scott,	942
Argylls, Limited, v. Ritchie & Whiteman,	915
Baikie v. Kirkwall Educational Trust,	860
Baird & Co., Limited, v. Ancient Order of Foresters,	965
Baird & Co., Limited, Law v.	423
Balfour of Burleigh, Lord, Couper v.	139
Bannatyne's Trustees v. Watson's Trustees,	693
Barbour v. M'Douall,	844
Bartholomew's Trustee, Bannatyne's Trustees v.	693
Battcock, Stewart's Trustees v.	179
Beardmore & Co., Limited, Watson v.	718
Black, Hill v.	913
Blythswood, Lord, v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.,	726
Blythswood, Lord, Macdonald, Limited, v.	930
Board of Agriculture for Scotland, Scott Plummer v.	1
Bonnybridge Silica and Fireclay Co., Limited, Cook v.	740
Boyd & Forrest v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.,	472
Breadalbane, Marquis of, v. Robertson,	215
Brenes & Co. v. Downie,	97
British Motor Body Co., Limited, v. Shaw (Dundee), Limited,	922
Brown, &c., Veitch's Trustees v.	182
Brunton & Sons, Marsden, Limited, v.	868
Buckingham, Suzor v.	299
Burn, Lister's Judicial Factor v.	204
Burnett, Pressley v.	874
Burns v. North British Railway Co.,	754
Bute's Trustees, Marquess of, v. Crawford,	459
Cadzow Coal Co., Limited, Scullion v.	36
Cairns v. Walker, Limited,	51
"Calabria," Owners of s.s., Craig v.	765
Caldwell & Co., Limited, Dempsey v.	28

	Page
Caledonian Railway Co., Frame v.	93
Caledonian Railway Co., Heriot's Trust v.	601
Cameron, Secker v.	354
Campbell, Marshall's Trustee v.	443
Carlton v. Sinclair, Limited,	871
Chapman, Cochrane's Trustees v.	403
Chisholm v. Grant,	239
Church of Scotland, Scottish Insurance Commissioners v.	16
Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited,	165
Clarke v. Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited,	775
Clark v. Taylor & Co.,	432
Clydesdale Bank, Limited, Argylls, Limited, v.	915
Clydesdale Bank, Limited, Wood v.	397
Coats, Coats's Trustees v.	744
Coats's Trustees,	723
Coats's Trustees v. Coats,	744
Cochrane, Cochrane's Trustees v.	403
Cochrane's Trustees v. Cochrane,	403
Cogan's Trustees, Bannatyne's Trustees v.	693
Colville, Colville's Trustees v.	255
Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll,	62
Colville's Trustees v. Colville,	255
Cook v. Bonnybridge Silica and Fireclay Co., Limited,	740
Cormack, &c. (Owners of s.s. "Calabria"), Craig v.	765
Costin v. Hume,	134
Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh,	139
Cowan, &c. (Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland) v. Provident Association of London, Limited,	165
Craig (Healy & Young's Trustee) v. Mair's Trustees,	893
Craig (Kilmarnock), Limited, v. Inland Revenue,	338
Craig v. Owners of s.s. "Calabria,"	765
Crawford, Marquess of Bute's Trustees v.	459
Crichton-Stuart v. Ogilvie,	888
Davidson, Scott v.	791
Deeside District Committee, &c., M'Robert v.	633
Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited,	28
Dickie, Anderson v.	706
Douglas, Earl of Mansfield v.	997
Downie, Brenes & Co. v.	97
Dundee Harbour Trustees, Nicol v.	374
Dykes, Shedden's Trustee v.	106
Edgar v. Lamont,	277
Edinburgh and District Tramways Co., Limited, Clarke v.	775
Edinburgh, Juridical Society of, Inland Revenue v.	731
Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland,	241
Farmer (Surveyor of Taxes) v. Juridical Society of Edinburgh,	731
Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne,	129
Ferguson, &c. (M'Leod's Trustees) v. Love,	983
Fife Coal Co., Limited, Fife County Council v.	882
Fife County Council v. Fife Coal Co., Limited,	882
Finlayson, Bousfield, & Co., Limited, Aitken v.	770
Fleming & Co., Limited, Grant v.	228
Foster (Marshall's Trustee) v. Campbell,	443

	Page
Fotheringham, Gibson v.	987
Fowler v. North British Railway Co.,	866
Frame v. Caledonian Railway Co.,	93
Fraser v. Riddell & Co.,	125
Galbraith (MacDougall's Trustee) v. Ironside,	186
Gaunt v. M'Intyre,	43
General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, Glasgow Corporation v.	835
Gibson v. Fotheringham,	987
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Boyd & Forrest v.	472
Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Lord Blythswood v.	726
Glasgow Assurance Corporation, Limited, Liquidators of, v. Welsh Insurance Corporation, Limited,	320
Glasgow Corporation v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited,	835
Glasgow Royal Hospital for Sick Children, Shedden's Trustee v.	106
Glasgow Surveyor of Taxes, "Glensloy" Steamship Co., Limited, v.	549
"Glensloy" Steamship Co., Limited, v. Inland Revenue,	549
Gow, Macdonald v.	854
Grant, Chisholm v.	239
Grant v. Fleming & Co., Limited,	228
Grant, &c. (Taylor's Executrices) v. Thom,	79
Great North of Scotland Railway Co., M'William v.	453
Greenshields, Royal Bank of Scotland v.	259
Healy & Young's Trustee v. Mair's Trustees,	893
Henderson, M'Gown v.	839
Hepburn v. Law,	918
Heriot's Trust v. Caledonian Railway Co.,	601
Hill v. Black,	913
Howatson v. M'Clymont,	159
Hull (Port of) Trawl Fishermen's Protective Society, Scottish Insurance Commissioners v.	826
Hume, Costin v.	134
Inland Revenue, Craig (Kilmarnock), Limited, v.	338
Inland Revenue, "Glensloy" Steamship Co., Limited, v.	549
Inland Revenue v. Juridical Society of Edinburgh,	731
Ironside, MacDougall's Trustee v.	186
Juridical Society of Edinburgh, Inland Revenue v.	731
Keenan v. Scottish Wholesale Co-operative Society, Limited,	959
Keeper of the General Register of Sasines, Macdonald v.	854
Keevans v. Mundy,	525
Kenneth (Shedden's Trustee) v. Dykes,	106
Kilbrandon and Kilchattan United Parish, MacPhail v.	1015
King's Theatre and Hippodrome, Dundee, Limited, Hill v.	913
Kirkwall Educational Trust, Baikie v.	860
Lamont, Edgar v.	277
Lampson Paragon Supply Company, Limited, v. MacPhail,	73
Law v. Baird & Co., Limited,	423
Law, Hepburn v.	918
Lethem (Surveyor of Taxes, Glasgow), "Glensloy" Steamship Co., Limited, v.	549
Lister, Colville's Judicial Factor v.	62

	Page
Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme,	204
Livingston (Bartholomew's Trustee), Bannatyne's Trustees v.	693
Lloyd Verney. See Verney.
Local Government Board for Scotland, Edinburgh Parish Council v.	241
Love, M'Leod v.	983
MacArthur v. Mackay,	547
M'Clymont, Howatson v.	159
M'Connachie, Petitioner,	853
M'Crae, Limited, Renfrew v.	539
M'Currach, Countess-Dowager of Seafield's Trustees v.	174
Macdonald v. Keeper of the General Register of Sasines,	854
Macdonald, Limited, v. Lord Blythswood,	930
M'Douall, Barbour v.	844
MacDougall's Trustee v. Ironside,	186
M'Ghee, Martin's Executrix v.	628
M'Govern v. West Calder Co-operative Society, Limited,	674
M'Gown v. Henderson,	839
M'Ilwaine v. Stewart's Trustees,	934
M'Intyre, Gaunt v.	43
Mackay, MacArthur v.	547
Mackay v. Mackay,	200
M'Kenna, Menzies v.	272
Mackenzie v. Parker and Douglas,	997
Mackintosh, &c. (Countess-Dowager of Seafield's Trustees) v. M'Currach,	174
M'Lachlan, Suzor v.	306
M'Leod v. Love,	983
Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees,	10
M'Martin v. Robertson,	783
M'Naughton, Scottish Insurance Commissioners v.	826
MacPhail v. Kilbrandon and Kilchattan United Parish,	1015
MacPhail, Lampson Paragon Supply Company, Limited, v.	73
M'Robert v. Reid	633
M'Vie v. Taylor & Co.	533
M'William v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co.,	453
Mair's Trustees, Healy & Young's Trustee v.	893
Maitland, &c. (Directors of Aberdeen Female Domestic Servants' Benevolent Fund),	8
Mansfield, Earl of, v. Parker and Douglas,	997
Marsden, Limited, v. Brunton & Sons,	868
Marshall's Trustee v. Campbell,	443
Martin, &c. (Cogan's Trustees), Bannatyne's Trustees v.	693
Martin's Executrix v. M'Ghee,	628
Mathieson v. Allan's Trustees,	464
Menzies v. M'Kenna,	272
Methven, Newton v.	753
Milne, Farmers' Mart, Limited, v.	129
Moncreiffe, &c. (Montgomery's Trustees), Lord Advocate v.	414
Montgomery's Trustees, Lord Advocate v.	414
Motherwell Entertainments, Limited, Stevens v.	957
Motor Brougham and Cab Co., Limited, Liquidator of the, MacArthur v.	547
Mundy, Keevans v.	525
Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.	114
National Sailors' and Firemen's Union of Great Britain and Ireland Trustees, Martin's Executrix v.	628
Newton v. Methven,	753

	Page
Nicoll, Adam (Colville's Judicial Factor) v.	62
Nicol v. Dundee Harbour Trustees,	374
Nicol (Scott's Trustee), Scott v.	704
North British Railway Co., Burns v.	754
North British Railway Co., Fowler v.	866
North British Railway Co., Tough v.	291
Ogilvie, Crichton-Stuart v.	888
Parker, Earl of Mansfield v.	997
Patrick, Anderson's Trustees v.	942
Paul (Clerk to The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland), Scottish Insurance Commissioners v.	16
Plummer. See Scott Plummer.
Pressley v. Burnett	874
Provident Association of London, Limited, Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v.	165
R. v. S.	193
Reid, M'Robert v.	633
Renfrew v. M'Crae, Limited,	539
Riddell & Co., Fraser v.	125
Ritchie & Whiteman, Argylls, Limited, v.	915
Robertson, Marquis of Breadalbane v.	215
Robertson, M'Martin v.	783
Robson, Aitken v.	224
Ross,	450
Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields,	259
Rutherford, Veitch's Trustees v.	182
S., R. v.	193
Scott, Anderson's Trustees v.	942
Scott v. Davidson,	791
Scott v. Scott's Trustee,	704
Scott, &c. (Scott's Marriage-Contract Trustees), Macleod's Trustees v.	10
Scott's Trustee, Scott v.	704
Scott Plummer v. Board of Agriculture for Scotland,	1
Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland,	16
Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. M'Naughton,	826
Scottish Wholesale Co-operative Society, Limited, Keenan v.	959
Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited,	36
Seafield's Trustees, Countess-Dowager of, v. M'Currach,	174
Secker v. Cameron,	354
Shaw (Dundee), Limited, British Motor Body Co., Limited, v.	922
Shedden's Trustee v. Dykes,	106
Shepherd, Yool v.	689
Sinclair, Limited, Carlton v.	871
Spence v. Spence,	887
Stein v. Stein,	903
Stevens v. Motherwell Entertainments, Limited,	957
Stewart, Whyte v.	675
Stewart's Trustees v. Battcock,	179
Stewart's Trustees, M'Ilwaine v.	934
Stuart v. Ogilvie,	888
Suzor v. Buckingham,	299
Suzor v. M'Lachlan,	306
Swinburne, Stewart's Trustees v.	179
Syme, Lister's Judicial Factor v.	204

Page

Talbot, &c. (Marquess of Bute's Trustees) v. Crawford, - - 459
Taylor's Executrices v. Thom, - - - - 79
Taylor & Co., Clark v. - - - - - 432
Taylor & Co., M'Vie v. - - - - - 533
Thom, Taylor's Executrices v. - - - 79
Tough v. North British Railway Co., - - - 291
Turnbull, &c. (Veitch's Trustees) v. Rutherford, - 182

United Free Church of Scotland, Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. 16

Veitch's Trustees v. Rutherford, - - - - 182
Verney v. Verney, - - - - - 801

Walker v. Whitwell, - - - - 560
Walker, Limited, Cairns v. - - - - 51
Walker & Sons, Limited, Petitioners, - - - 280
Wallace, Marrs, & Co., Murray v. - - - - 114
Watson v. Beardmore & Co., Limited, - - - 718
Watson, &c. (Bannatyne's Trustees) v. Watson's Trustees, - 693
Watson's Trustees, Bannatyne's Trustees v. - - - 693
Weir, Hepburn v. - - - - - 918
Welsh Insurance Corporation, Limited, Liquidators of the Glasgow Assurance Corporation, Limited, v. - - - 320
West Calder Co-operative Society, Limited, M'Govern v. - 674
Westergaard v. Westergaard, - - - - 977
Whitwell, Walker v. - - - - - 560
Whyte v. Stewart, - - - - - 675
Wood v. Clydesdale Bank, Limited, - - 397

Yool v. Shepherd, - - - - - 689

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL COURT.

Glasgow Assessor, Glasgow Parish Council v. - - - 651
Glasgow Parish Council v. Glasgow Assessor, - - - 651

Kincardineshire Assessor, Scott v. - - - - 655

Leith Assessor, Water of Leith Sewerage Commissioners v. - 664

Midlothian Assessor, Water of Leith Sewerage Commissioners v. - 664

Scott v. Kincardineshire Assessor, - - - - 655

Water of Leith Sewerage Commissioners v. Leith Assessor, - 664
Water of Leith Sewerage Commissioners v. Midlothian Assessor, - 664

II.—COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

A B, Solicitor-General v. - - - - 38
Advocate, H. M., Heron v. - - - - 7

	Page
Advocate, H. M., v. Higgins,	1
Advocate, H. M., Knox v.	69
Advocate, H. M., Mather v.	184
Advocate, H. M., Paul v.	69
Advocate, H. M., v. Ryan,	108
Advocate, H. M., Townsend v.	85
Auld v. Pearson,	4
Birrell, Earl of Galloway v.	92
Blackwood v. M'Intyre,	165
Brander, Kinnear v.	141
Di Carlo v. M'Intyre,	60
Dumfriesshire Procurator-fiscal, Dundas v.	114
Dundas v. Phyn,	114
Dundee Officer of Customs and Excise, Rhind v.	31
Dundee Procurator-Fiscal, Leng & Co., Limited, v.	77
Easson, Hilson v.	99
Edinburgh Police Court Prosecutor, Traynor v.	174
Edward, Glasgow Parish Council v.	159
Fife and Kinross Procurator-fiscal, Kinnear v.	141
Fleming, Wilson v.	20
Galloway, Earl of, v. Birrell,	92
Glasgow Parish Council v. Edward,	159
Glasgow Police Court Procurator-fiscal v. Persichini,	126
Glasgow Police Court Procurator-fiscal, Reilly v.	11
Glasgow Procurator-fiscal, Blackwood v.	165
Glasgow Procurator-fiscal, Di Carlo v.	60
Glasgow Procurator-fiscal, Porcelli v.	169
Gordon v. Hansen,	131
Hansen, Gordon v.	131
Heron v. H. M. Advocate,	7
Higgins, H. M. Advocate v.	1
Hilson v. Easson,	99
Jameson, Scott v.	187
Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood,	150
Kinnear v. Brander,	141
Kirkwood, Keith, Limited, v.	150
Knox v. H. M. Advocate,	69
Lavelle, Solicitor-General v.	15
Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh,	77
Macbeth & Maclagan v. Macmillan,	165
M'Intyre, Blackwood v.	165
M'Intyre, Di Carlo v.	60
M'Intyre v. Persichini,	126
M'Intyre, Porcelli v.	169
M'Intyre, Reilly v.	11
Mackintosh, Leng & Co., Limited, v.	77
MacLennan, Paterson v.	123
Macmillan, Macbeth & Maclagan v.	165
Macpherson, Traynor v.	174
Mather v. H. M. Advocate,	184

Page

Paterson v. MacLennan, - - - - - 123
Paul v. H. M. Advocate, - - - - 69
Pearson, Auld v. - - - - - 4
Persichini, M'Intyre v. - - - - - 126
Perthshire Procurator-Fiscal, Scott v. - - - 187
Phyn, Dundas v. - - - - - 114
Porcelli v. M'Intyre, - - - - - 169

Reilly v. M'Intyre, - - - - - 11
Renfrewshire Procurator-fiscal v. Pearson, - - - 4
Rhind v. Wimpress, - - - - - 31
Rothesay Procurator-fiscal, Macbeth & Maclagan v. - - 165
Roxburghshire Procurator-fiscal v. Easson, - - - 99
Ryan, H. M. Advocate v. - - - - 108

Scott v. Jameson, - - - - - 187
Solicitor-General v. A B, - - - - - 38
Solicitor-General v. Lavelle, - - - - - 15

Townsend v. H. M. Advocate, - - - - 85
Traynor v. Macpherson, - - - - - 174

Wilson v. Fleming, - - - - - 20
Wimpress, Rhind v. - - - - - 31

III.– HOUSE OF LORDS.

Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited, Lendrum v. - - 91

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited, 1
Brown v. Watson, Limited, - - - - 44

Clark v. Taylor & Co., - - - - - 104

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne, - - - - 84
Fife Coal Co., Limited, Smith v. - - - - 40

Gibson & Co., Wishart v. - - - - 53

Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited, Liquidators of, Bank of Scotland v. 1

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited, - - 91
Linlithgow, Marquis of, and Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Co., Limited, v. North British Railway Co., - - 38

Macleod, &c. (Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited), Bank of Scotland v. - - - - 1
Milne, Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. - - - - 84

Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, - - - - 76
National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Nasmyth's Trustees v. - - - - 76
North British Railway Co., Marquis of Linlithgow and Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Co., Limited, v. - - 38

Pott, Cassels, & Williamson, Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. - 18

Page

Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Nasmyth's Trustees v. - - - - 76
Shearer, Shields v. - - - - - 33
Shields v. Shearer, - - - - - 33
Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited, - - - - 40

Taylor & Co., Clark v. - - - - - 104

Watson, Limited, Brown v. - - - - 44
Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson, - 18
Wishart v. Gibson & Co., - - - - 53

Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Co., Limited, and Marquis of Linlithgow v. North British Railway Co., - - 38

ERRATA.

P. 126, line 1 of notes, for "Wilkins" read "Watkin."

P. 480, line 14 from top, for "March" read "February."

P. (J.) 41, line 5 from foot, for "Pollock" read "Pont."

P. (J.) 41, line 4 from foot, for "Port" read "Kirk."

P. (J.) 60, in "Carlo v. M'Intyre" transpose names of counsel for the respective parties.

P. (J.) 165, line 9 from top, after "Respondent" add "—Sol.-Gen. Morison."

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

1913-1914.

No. 1.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

THE GOVERNORS AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF SCOTLAND, Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Clyde, K.C.

JOHN MACKINTOSH MACLEOD AND ANOTHER (Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited), Respondents.—Horne, K.C.—Black.

Bankruptcy—Effect—Company—Winding-up—Creditor's right to a security—Obligation to assign debenture in security for debt—Assignation not completed at date of liquidation—Trust—Constitution.

A company entered into an arrangement with a bank to which they were indebted, whereby it was agreed that, on the bank surrendering certain moveables belonging to the company which the bank held in security, the company should obtain from J, who was indebted to them, a debenture over his assets, and should assign the debenture to the bank in lieu of the surrendered security. The moveables were surrendered and the debenture was obtained from J; but before it had been assigned to the bank the company went into liquidation. The bank having claimed the debenture on the ground that the company held it merely for behoof of the bank as trustees or agents,—

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the company did not hold the debenture for the bank, but had, at most, come under a contractual obligation to assign it; that accordingly the company were the parties beneficially interested in the debenture at the date of the liquidation; and claim for the bank rejected.

Dictum of Lord Westbury in Fleeming v. Howden, (1868) 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, at p. 121 (L. R., 1 H. L. Sc. 372, at p. 383), that "an obligation to do an act with respect to property creates a trust" discussed.

Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. Millar, (1892) 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598, distinguished.

(IN the Court of Session, 29th November 1912—1913 S. C. 255.)

The Bank of Scotland appealed to the House of Lords.

The appeal was heard on 17th and 19th November 1913.

Earl of Halsbury. Lord Kinnear. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

Argued for the appellants;—The appellants' case was founded on the law of tantum et tale to which effect was given by the House of Lords in Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. Millar.[1] The Court below had read the letters passing between the appellants and the Company as containing a suspensive condition, namely, that the obligation of the Company should have no binding effect until a formal deed was signed. This was a misconstruction of the letters.

[1] (1892) 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

The letter of 3rd February 1910 showed that the obligation to assign the debenture was definite and completed; and thereafter the legal title of the Company was effectively subjected to an equitable obligation in favour of the appellants. It might be said that the appellants had been made the attorney of the Company for enforcing the agreement, the Company in fact holding the security under a personal contract with the appellants, under which they were just as accountable to the appellants as though they had expressly held the security only as trustees or agents, so that it would have been a fraud on their part to have used the property so as to prejudice the appellants' interest therein. The moment the Company got the debenture there arose a resulting trust; and a trustee in bankruptcy "takes the property of the bankrupt subject to all the rights and equities that affected it at the time of the bankruptcy."[1] Accordingly the liquidators here were in the same fiduciary position as the Company. In Heritable Reversionary Company, Limited, v. Millar[2] the decision was that heritable property to which a bankrupt had an unqualified feudal title, but which did not belong to him, was not his property in the sense of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, and did not vest in his trustee. The doctrine in that decision was not limited to the particular facts of that case, but was applicable wherever property was held by a person in a fiduciary capacity.[3]

Argued for the respondents;—An incorporeal right could only be transferred by an assignation duly intimated to the debtor. The argument that this general rule did not apply because Hutchison, Main, & Company were really only trustees for the Bank was not in accordance with the facts, because it was impossible to spell out of the averments or correspondence anything in the nature of a trust or mandate. The letter of 3rd February was indefinite as to amount and time, and it contemplated that there should be a transfer made in legal form. The beneficial interest in the debenture was in the Company until it was transferred out of their hands. It was something which they were procuring for their own benefit in the course of their relations with Johnson. In this respect the cases cited by the appellants were all distinguishable. Here the beneficial interest and the formal title were in the same persona at the date of bankruptcy, and the property accordingly perforce passed to the liquidators. The only thing which could have ousted the liquidators would have been an effective transfer granted outwith the prohibited period prior to bankruptcy.[4]

EARL OF HALSBURY.—We are all agreed that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs, but it will

[1] Fleeming v. Howden, 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, at p. 121, L. R., 1 H. L., Sc. App. 372, at p. 383.

[2] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.

[3] Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland, (1886) 14 R. (H. L.) 1, 12 App. Cas. 53; Forbes's Trustees v. Macleod, 1898, 25 R. 1012; Dunn v. Pratt, (1898) 25 R. 461; Gordon v. Cheyne, (1824) 2 S. 675; Dingwall v. M'Combie, (1822) 1 S. 463; Littlejohn v. Black, (1855) 18 D. 207; Macadam v. Martin's Trustee, (1872) 11 Macph. 33. Cranstoun v. Bontine, (1832) 6 W. & S. 79, and Taylor v. Farrie, (1855) 17 D. 639, were also cited.

[4] Reference was made to Stiven v. Scott & Simson, (1871) 9 Macph. 923; Gourlay v. Mackie, (1887) 14 R. 403.

be convenient that the reasons for our judgment should be given at a later date.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

On February 6th, 1914,—

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case is raised by a claim made by the appellants in the liquidation of a limited company, called Hutchison, Main, & Company. The claim is based on an alleged preferable right in a certain security which is said to have been constituted by a debenture created and issued in favour of Hutchison, Main, & Company by another limited company styled Frank A. Johnson, Limited. This debenture is now in the hands of the liquidators, and would seem prima facie to be held by them as an asset of the estate for distribution among the creditors pari passu. But the appellants claim right to a preference which will exclude the other creditors on two different and inconsistent but alternative grounds. They say, first, that at the date of the liquidation they had obtained a valid and effectual security over this debenture for payment of a debt of £14,000 due to them by the Company; and, secondly, that the debenture is not part of the distributable estate, but belongs to them, inasmuch as at the date of the liquidation it was held by the Company as trustees for them, and not as beneficial owners. Both grounds have been rejected as untenable by the Court below, and I think the judgment is right.

It is common ground between the parties that the rights of competing creditors in the liquidation are to be governed by the same rules as regulate the rights of creditors in a sequestrated estate under the Bankruptcy Acts. These are well established and familiar. The general object of the statutes, as Lord President M'Neill states it in Littlejohn v. Black,[1] "was to preserve as far as possible all rights and interests in the position in which they stood the moment before bankruptcy." From that moment no preference could be acquired by any creditor or created by the bankrupt. But the earlier Act, with which he was at the time concerned, as well as that now in force, "abstained from disturbing any securities or preferences honestly obtained and lawfully completed according to the nature of such securities or preferences." I do not understand it to be disputed that in this respect the Company in liquidation is exactly in the same position as an individual debtor under the Bankruptcy Acts. Rights in security which have been effectually completed before the liquidation must still receive the effect which the law gives to them. But the Company and its liquidators are just as completely disabled by the winding-up from granting new or completing imperfect rights in security as the individual bankrupt is by his bankruptcy. This, indeed, is the necessary effect of the express provision of the Companies Act that the estate is to be distributed among the creditors pari passu. Every creditor is to have an equal share, unless any one has already a part of the estate in his hands by virtue of an effectual legal right. The question, therefore, is whether, at the date of the liquidation, the appel-

[1] 18 D. 207, at p. 215.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Kinnear.

lants had obtained a valid security legally completed over the debenture issued by F. A. Johnson.

In answering this question the Court did not require to consider whether a floating charge over the assets of a trading company would constitute a valid security according to the law of Scotland except in the cases where it may have been specially authorised by statute, because Frank A. Johnson is an English company, and its rights and liabilities must be governed by English law. Nor did they need to inquire, as in other circumstances might have been necessary, how far it was valid and effectual, or by what method it could be effectually transferred in security, according to the law of England, because, in fact, it has not been transferred to the appellants at all.

There can be no question that by the law of Scotland the jus crediti in debts may be made the subject of an effectual security, provided the debt be assigned and the assignation completed according to the method recognised as proper for the completion of such rights. But to make it effectual the assignee must have a right which he can enforce against the debtor in his own name, because it is indispensable for the efficacy of a security that the secured creditor should have jus in re. It is manifest on the face of their own statement, and of the document they produce in support of it, that the appellants have no such right. They say that the Company had financial dealings both with the appellants themselves and with the British Linen Bank, and that, at a time when the appellants were not satisfied with the state of the account, it was arranged that they should transfer to the British Linen Bank certain goods which they held in security, and in lieu thereof should take bills on F. A. Johnson to be held in security, and "as collateral security the company would give the appellants a debenture or floating charge over the assets of F. A. Johnson for the sum of £12,000." This last part of the statement lacks precision. But the nature of the proposed debenture is more clearly brought out in the contractual obligation.

This is expressed in a letter from the Company's agents to the appellants, dated February 3, 1910, in the following terms: "We are authorised by the directors, and our London correspondents have instructions forthwith to procure from Mr Johnson a debenture or floating charge over the whole of his assets in the name of the company for the amount required to secure the debt due by Mr Johnson to our clients. So soon as that debenture reaches our hands we have instructions to make it available to the Bank of Scotland as further and additional security for the repayment by our clients of their indebtedness to the bank." This is the only writing by way of security which the appellants ever obtained, and it seems to me quite idle to pretend that it is a valid and effectual security in itself. It is a promise to give the Bank the benefit of a security which the Company is to procure from its debtor in its own favour, and it is nothing more. It does not appear in what manner the Bank was to obtain this benefit, and in particular it is not stated whether the debenture is to be transferred or whether the Company is to account for the proceeds. But this is not material, because nothing was done to make the promise effectual. The appellants' counsel laid great stress on the undertaking to "make the debenture available to the bank" as soon as it reached the hands of the agents. But that only shows that something remained to be done which the appellants could not do for themselves. If they have a complete and real security they require no help from the Company to make it good. If they have not, they have no preference of any kind. They are in no better position than that of unsecured creditors of the Company, and the estate must be divided equally among all such creditors.

But then it is said that the question as to the validity of the security arises only on the assumption that the debenture is part of the distributable estate, and that, although the appellants have stated a claim on that assumption, their substantial case is that it is held by the Company and its liquidators, not as part of the Company's estate, but as trustees for them. In aid of this contention it was argued that the Company procured the debenture as agents for the appellants. But agency is matter of fact, and no facts are proved or stated from which it could possibly be inferred. The case has been decided on the assumption that the appellants' averments on record are true, and in these averments no suggestion is to be found that they employed Hutchison, Main, & Company as their agents to procure the debenture. In the absence of averments relevant to be sent to proof the case must be decided on the documents. These consist of the letter already mentioned, the agreement between Hutchison, Main, & Company and Frank A. Johnson, and the debenture itself, and there is no trace of the supposed agency in any of them. If they are to be taken as expressing the transaction, they make it apparent that Hutchison, Main, & Company procured the debenture in their own name and acting on their own behalf, and not as agents for anybody else. The agreement between them and Frank A. Johnson was that the latter should execute and deliver to the Scotch company a debenture for a total sum of £17,000 to be "held as security for all amounts which may from time to time be owing to the Scotch company"; and the debenture actually issued is, accordingly, for £17,000, and is in favour of Hutchison, Main, & Company. I have no difficulty, therefore, in rejecting the argument founded on a supposed agency. But it is nevertheless true that Hutchison, Main, & Company were under an obligation to make the debenture available to the appellants, not to its full amount, but to the extent of £12,000, and it is said that this affects their right with a trust which excludes any beneficial interest in themselves or their creditors. The argument was founded on the decision of this House in Heritable Reversionary Co. v. Millar,[1] and on the doctrine which was there considered that a trustee in bankruptcy takes the estate tantum et tale as it stood in the bankrupt.

But the decision has only a remote bearing, if any, on the case before your Lordships, and the doctrine of tantum et tale is inapposite, because on the liquidation of a limited company there is no transference of property to which it can be applied. The effect of the Bankruptcy Act is to divest the bankrupt, and to invest the trustee in the entire estate; and it is not surprising that questions should have arisen as to the extent

[1] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Kinnear.

to which this transference of the legal title might or might not involve a corresponding transference of all equitable qualifications which might have affected the estate in the hands of the bankrupt. But the liquidators of a limited company are not vested in the estate to the exclusion of the company. The estate remains vested in the company itself, and the liquidators are mere administrators of it for the purpose prescribed by the statute, and that is for equal distribution among creditors. It appears to me, therefore, that the argument on the doctrine of tantum et tale is beside the mark. But the question remains whether the debenture forms part of the distributable estate; and it is that which is said to be decided by the case of Millar.[1] I cannot agree. The only arguable question in that case belonged to a totally different chapter of law: to wit, What is the legal effect of the registration of an absolute title to land in the Register of Sasines? A bankrupt who had been manager of a trading company had purchased a certain heritable property, for behoof of the company and on the instructions of their directors, and the purchase-money was provided by them. He took the title in his own name, and he executed a declaration of trust which was perfectly explicit and effectual to qualify his right; but unfortunately he recorded the title, ex facie absolute, in the Register of Sasines, and he did not record the declaration of trust. It was, therefore, a latent trust, however effectual as between the agent himself and his employers. It was held in the Court of Session[2] that the Register of Sasines was conclusive, because the bankrupt was infeft on an absolute title, and everyone, whether creditor or purchaser, dealing with a proprietor infeft was entitled to rely on the public records, and was not affected by any qualification or burden on the real right which did not appear there. The main ground of judgment was that the bankrupt could have sold the subject and given an unimpeachable title to a purchaser, and that the trustee in bankruptcy is vested in all heritable estate held by the bankrupt under such an absolute title, to the same effect as if he had obtained a decree of adjudication in implement of a sale to himself.

That construction of the vesting clause was corrected in this House[1] and the judgment was reversed on the ground that, as between the bankrupt and his employers, the former was a bare trustee, and the latter were the true and beneficial owners of the property, which, therefore, did not belong to the bankrupt in the sense of the Act, and was not vested in the trustee. It was not disputed that third persons dealing with the bankrupt with specific reference to the property were entitled to rely on the title as it stood on the Register of Sasines, and, thus, that an onerous purchaser from him would have obtained an unimpeachable title. But it was held that this would not be because the property was his, but because the true owners had permitted him to appear on the Register of Sasines as the owner, and thus entitled anyone dealing with him for value to regard him as such. The noble and learned Lords held that the rule of personal bar which thus protects transactions of the trustee from challenge only applies to such as have specific reference to the trust estate, and is not pleadable by personal creditors who do not stipulate for, or obtain, any conveyance to that estate. This appears to me to be the full force of the decision; and I am unable to see that it has any bearing on the matter in hand. Of course it assumes, what, indeed, was never disputed, that property admittedly held under a bare trust, without any beneficial interest in the trustee, would not pass to his creditors on his bankruptcy. But the bankrupt's title of property was qualified only by a latent trust. The question was whether this latent declaration of trust could be looked at; and when that was once settled by the decision of this House the rest followed as a matter of course.

---

[1] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.

[2] Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. M'Kay's Trustees, (1891) 18 R. 1166.

It is further to be observed that the trust so established was declared in express terms, and directly affected the constitution of the real right. It is a very different thing to say that a personal obligation to give the benefit of a specific fund to a particular creditor creates a trust which attaches to the fund and excludes it from the estate for distribution. That the judgment in the case of Millar[1] was not intended to cover such a case as this is obvious, because Lord Herschell states the distinction between the duty imposed by a trust and the liability created by a personal contract in perfectly clear terms. But the appellants rely upon a dictum of Lord Westbury in Fleeming v. Howden,[2] where he is reported to have said that "an obligation to do an act with respect to property creates a trust." This proposition is expressed in general terms, but in relation to property only, and not to personal obligations; and it must be interpreted with reference to the particular case which the noble and learned Lord was discussing. The effect intended to be given to it in that case does not seem to me to be doubtful. Mr Fleeming, afterwards Lord Elphinstone, held the estate of Duntiblae under a deed of entail which required him to denude on succeeding to a peerage. He was duly infeft in terms of an instrument of sasine which was recorded in the Register of Sasines, but the deed under which he held was not recorded in the Register of Tailzies. It followed that, although the entail was distinctly set forth on the face of the deed in which he was infeft, the fetters of the entail were ineffectual to exclude the diligence of creditors. He succeeded to a peerage in 1860 and died in 1861 without having denuded, and leaving large debts. It was held that the estate did not pass to a trustee in bankruptcy because from the moment the clause of devolution became operative it was not to be regarded as the property of the deceased bankrupt but was held by him in trust for the benefit of the heir to whom it had devolved. But it was so held, as is shortly but very clearly explained in the judgment of Lord Colonsay, because the duty to devolve was a quality of the right on the face of the title under which Mr Fleeming possessed. It was thus a trust which every one becoming his creditor on the faith of his having a feudal investiture was bound to

---

[1] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.

[2] 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, at p. 121, L. R., 1 H. L. Sc. 372, at p. 383.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Kinnear.

know, for there it stood open and patent. An obligation of this kind, which in express terms qualified the title to land, imposed a duty which might well be held to involve a trust.

But to extend Lord Westbury's phrase so as to make it cover personal obligations which do not affect the real right of the obligor seems to me altogether extravagant. It was maintained in argument that every obligation with reference to any property or fund which involves a liability to account fell within the principle. If that were so, every imperfect security, however invalid as a real right, would be effectual as a trust. But then in the same sense a bankrupt holds his whole estate as trustee for all his creditors. The fallacy consists in using legal terms in a popular or metaphorical sense and yet affixing to them all the legal consequences which would attach to their use in a strictly technical sense. It is impossible to suppose that Lord Westbury employed the word "trust" in any such inaccurate sense, and, indeed, the danger of so using it is nowhere more clearly exposed than it is by that eminent person himself in Knox v. Gye.[1] In discussing the liabilities of a surviving partner to the representatives of a deceased partner, his Lordship says, "Another source of error in this matter is the looseness with which the word 'trustee' is frequently used. The surviving partner is often called a 'trustee,' but the term is used inaccurately." He is not a trustee: if he is by an improper use of words to be called so the trust is limited to the discharge of his obligation. He goes on to say, "It is most necessary to mark this again and again, for there is not a more fruitful source of error in law than the inaccurate use of language. The application to a man who is improperly, and by metaphor only, called a trustee, of all the consequences which would follow if he were a trustee by express declaration—in other words, a complete trustee—holding the property exclusively for the benefit of the cestui que trust, well illustrates the remark made by Lord Mansfield, that nothing in law is so apt to mislead as a metaphor." That Mr Fleeming was a complete trustee in the sense thus explained, holding the property as trustee by express declaration, and holding it exclusively for the benefit of the cestui que trust, is beyond question, because it was so decided by this House. I think it equally clear that Hutchison, Main, & Company, who held a debenture under no express declaration of trust, and who certainly did not hold it exclusively for the benefit of the appellants, cannot be styled trustees of that debenture except by such an inaccurate use of language as Lord Westbury condemns. They were under an obligation to give the benefit of it to the appellants, but only to a limited extent; and that obligation they are disabled from performing in terms, because their hands are tied by the liquidation.

On the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the appellants are in the position of mere personal creditors who hold no complete security for their debt, and that the debenture which they might have obtained in security had their contract been carried out is not held exclusively in trust for them, but forms a part of the estate for equal distribution among the creditors of the Company.

---

[1] (1872) L. R., 5 H. L. 656, at p. 675.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal against an interlocutor, dated 29th November 1912, of the Lords of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, whereby they adhered to an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary dated 20th June 1912.

By this latter interlocutor the deliverance of the liquidators of a certain limited liability company named Hutchison, Main, & Company—on the claim of the Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland that they were entitled, to the extent of £14,000, to a security constituted by a certain debenture in the total nominal amount of £17,000 on the entire assets of a certain English limited company, styled Frank A. Johnson, Limited, in accordance with the provisions of an agreement dated 4th March 1910, made between Frank Alexander Johnson, of the first part; Frank A. Johnson, Limited, of the second part; and Hutchison, Main, & Company, of the third part—was upheld.

The liquidators by their deliverance rejected this claim. The Bank of Scotland filed objections to this deliverance, and the Lord Ordinary found that the averments made by the Bank in support of this objection were irrelevant. It is admitted that for the purpose of this appeal the averments in the answers of the Bank must be taken to be true.

The facts have been fully and clearly stated in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. It is unnecessary to restate any but the very few upon which, in my view, the question for decision turns. Hutchison, Main, & Company were a Scotch company, carrying on in Glasgow the business of manufacturers of golf balls and other gutta-percha and indiarubber goods. These goods they were in the habit of selling to Frank Alexander Johnson, and afterwards to Frank A. Johnson, Limited, the company into which Frank Alexander Johnson converted his business. As against these purchases the former company drew bills on Johnson, and subsequently on his firm, which they respectively accepted. Many of these bills were discounted by Hutchison, Main, & Company in the Bank of Scotland, and many others in the British Linen Bank; all or nearly all of each lot being renewed from time to time. Some other bills remained in the hands of the drawers undiscounted. In February 1910 Hutchison, Main, & Company stood indebted to both banks in respect of these bills to considerable amounts. The precise amounts are immaterial. Securities had been lodged with both banks by them to secure their indebtedness. The British Linen Bank, thinking the security inadequate, refused or threatened to refuse to discount any more of these bills, or to renew any of them, unless they were further secured.

Thereupon an arrangement was entered into between the Bank of Scotland through their local manager, Mr Bisset, whereby it was agreed that securities to the value of £2000 held by the Bank as against the overdraft of Hutchison, Main, & Company should be released and transferred to the British Linen Bank, who in consideration therefor would continue to renew Johnson's bills. A further term was added, of which the written evidence is contained in a letter dated 3rd February 1910, written by W. Baird & Company, the solicitors of Hutchison, Main, & Company, to Mr Bisset. The passage of this letter dealing with the matter runs thus: "We further write to say that we are authorised by the directors, and our London correspondents have instructions forthwith to procure from Mr Johnson a debenture or floating charge over the whole of his assets in the name of this company for the amount required to secure the debt due by Mr Johnson to our clients. So soon as that debenture reaches our hands we have instructions to make it available to the Bank of Scotland as further and additional security for the repayment by our clients of their indebtedness to the Bank, and it is understood, in respect of the arrangements made, that the Bank will give to those interested in the Company the benefit of the arrangements referred to in past correspondence."

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Ld. Atkinson.

It would appear to me to be perfectly clear on the construction of this letter, if it embodies the agreement of the parties, that Hutchison, Main, & Company, in procuring this debenture, were acting on their own behalf, and not as agents for the Bank of Scotland. I do not think there is any ground whatever for the contention that they were instructed to act as such agents, or did, in fact, so act. And it is, I think, equally clear that the only obligation they put themselves under was, at the most, a contractual obligation to make the debenture available to the Bank of Scotland "as a further and additional security" when they procured it. How that was to be done is not stated, but from the letter of Mr Bisset to W. Baird & Company of the following day it is plain that the mode in which he contemplated that Hutchison, Main, & Company should discharge this obligation, and make the debenture available as a security, was by assignation of it, followed presumably by notice to the debtor, Frank A. Johnson, Limited. He wrote: "With regard to the debenture or floating charge over Mr Johnson's assets, we shall rely on your having this completed as soon as possible, and sent to us for assignation to the bank as a security for the company's indebtedness."

This was not done. Discussion arose as to the best mode of making the debenture available, but nothing was done to perfect the security. The debenture was delivered on 4th March 1910, by Frank A. Johnson, Limited, to Hutchison, Main, & Company, in pursuance of an agreement of the same date entered into between them. By that agreement Frank A. Johnson, Limited, contracted to execute forthwith and deliver to Hutchison, Main, & Company a debenture or series of debentures in the form to the agreement annexed in the total sum of £17,000, to be held by the latter company as security for such sums as might, from time to time, be due to them by the former company, either on the bills in the schedule mentioned, or "in respect of advances or generally on trade account." There is no mention whatever in this agreement of the arrangement made between Hutchison, Main, & Company and the Bank of Scotland touching the debenture or debentures to be delivered under it.

Hutchison, Main, & Company went into liquidation on 1st July 1913. At that time they were ex facie the absolute beneficial owners of this debenture, and according to the case of Heritable Reversionary Company v. Millar,[1] any beneficial property they had in it would, under the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, on liquidation pass to, and become vested in, the liquidators.

[1] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.

The interest which would so pass would be the absolute and entire beneficial interest (unless some lesser beneficial interest had been carved out of this whole, and had, before liquidation, become vested in another). It would not, I think, on the authorities, be at all sufficient that Hutchison, Main, & Company should have merely entered into a contract to carve out of their property in the debenture this partial interest. Something in addition should be done which would, in contemplation of equity and good conscience at all events, separate the part from the whole, and prevent that part from being available to satisfy pro tanto the creditors of the insolvent owner. The ingenious arguments of Mr Clyde and the Solicitor-General for Scotland appear to me to amount to a contention that in the circumstances of this case this carving out took place, in contemplation of equity, the moment the debenture was delivered to Hutchison, Main, & Company. They did not contend that any specific charge on the debenture was thereby created, but they did contend that, by reason of the contractual obligation of Hutchison, Main, & Company to make the debenture available as a security to the Bank of Scotland, a trust in favour of that bank attached upon it immediately upon its delivery; that Hutchison, Main, & Company thenceforth held it, as to the £12,000 portion of the sum secured, as trustees for the Bank, and not as beneficial owners, and that the liquidators are now bound, as it is contended this Company would itself have been bound before liquidation, to transfer to the Bank of Scotland the benefit of the debenture up to that sum. That contention is, in my opinion, ingenious but unsound.

I do not think that the averments contained in the appellants' answers carry their case any further than the documents. The contract they rely upon was no doubt a contract for good consideration. Whether after a delay of so many months it was enforceable, and if so, what was the nature of the relief which would be obtained, are matters beside the real question for decision, which is this: Were Hutchison, Main, & Company, at the time of their sequestration owners of the entire beneficial interest in this debenture or not? In my opinion they were such owners. Whether or not they had bound themselves by contract to denude themselves of a portion of their interest does not alter their position as owners while and as long as that contract remained to be carried out. The Lord Justice-Clerk has, I think, put the case in a nutshell in the following passage of his judgment (1913 S. C., at p. 264): "To me it appears to be clear that at the date of the liquidation the debenture in question was still held by the Company, and that the Bank had no right to it, but had only a right to enforce a contract by which the Company was bound to assign the debenture to the Bank." In my opinion, nothing has been shown, either in the documents given in evidence, or in the averments contained in the appellants' answers, to establish, on any principle of equity, that at the time of the liquidation this insolvent Company had, either in the form of a charge, or of a trust, denuded itself of any portion of the entire beneficial interest in the debenture. If so, the entirety of that interest must go to satisfy pro tanto the debts of all their creditors, not the debt of one alone.

The decision appealed from was therefore, in my opinion, perfectly right, and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Halsbury has requested me to say that he concurs in the judgment which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Kinnear.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—I concur. The facts are important, but they are not complex. They are as follows: In the beginning of the year 1910 a limited firm named Hutchison, Main & Company, carrying on business in Scotland, were indebted to two Scottish banks—one, the appellants, the Bank of Scotland, and the other, the British Linen Bank. For some time the English agent of Hutchison, Main, & Company had been a Mr F. A. Johnson. By an arrangement amongst all these parties the Bank of Scotland transferred to the British Linen Bank certain goods and merchandise of the value of about £2000 which they held in security. On the other hand, they received bills by Johnson for £3000.

Johnson, who was, as stated, Hutchison, Main, & Company's agent in England, was also indebted to that company. He was anxious to form his own business into a limited liability concern and to obtain for this concern the agency of Hutchison, Main, & Company which he himself held. It was necessary in these circumstances that some arrangement should be made by which Johnson, Limited, should come under obligation to pay the bills due by Johnson himself. This was accordingly done, and the the terms of that arrangement are contained in an agreement of 4th March 1910.

By the fifth article of that agreement Johnson, Limited, undertook to execute and deliver to Hutchison, Main, & Company debentures for £17,000. The terms under which the debentures were to be held were these: "Such debentures shall be held by the Scotch company (that is, Hutchison, Main, & Company) as security for all amounts which may from time to time be owing to the Scotch company either in respect of such bills set forth in the schedule hereto or of any other sum that may from time to time be due to the Scotch company by the English company either in respect of advances or generally on trade account." It thus appears that if there was any trust with regard to the debenture or debentures granted by Johnson, Limited, in favour of Hutchison, Main, & Company, the trust was as now stated. And there can be no doubt that if Johnson, Limited, had paid the sums due by them to Hutchison, Main, & Company that firm would have been bound to hand back the debenture which had come into their hands under that simple arrangement. This transaction took place, as mentioned, on 4th March.

The debenture was granted on the same day. It is by Johnson, Limited, and it covenants with Hutchison, Main, & Company "its successors and assigns, to pay to the said Hutchison, Main, & Company, Limited, its successors and assigns, on the 4th day of March 1915, or on such earlier date as the principal moneys hereby secured shall become payable under the conditions of this debenture, at the registered office of the company the sum of £17,000 on presentation of this debenture."

In these circumstances it would require competent and very cogent and clear evidence to convince the mind that this debenture, once granted, was not the property of Messrs Hutchison, Main, & Company until that firm should have parted with it by voluntary assignation or until its liquidator or its trustee in bankruptcy should have succeeded to it as a consequence of the statutory assignment which vested in him everything which was in bonis of the firm.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

The whole question in this case appears, therefore, to be: Has there been any deed produced, formal or informal, or is there indeed any relevant averment that the property in this debenture thus duly vested in Hutchison, Main, & Company was not in reality the property of that firm, but was so only in appearance,—that the debenture was only their apparent title, but that the real title to its contents was in somebody else, namely, the appellants? In short, I will venture to put the proposition which, as it appears to me, is at the bottom of this case in these words: What proof is tendered that the contents of this debenture were not at the date of liquidation in bonis of its holder, Hutchison, Main, & Company, but were in bonis of the Bank of Scotland? For unless the latter proposition be relevantly averred and legally proved, the claim of the Bank to that debenture must fail.

This being the statement of the proposition, it is now important to see how the Bank addresses itself to it on the record. In particular, does the Bank really claim that this property throughout belonged to it and not to Hutchison, Main, & Company?

It founds upon the correspondence. From that it appears that in the preceding month of February Messrs Hutchison, Main, & Company, whose own affairs were manifestly embarrassed, did make an important promise to the Bank. It is in these terms: "We are authorised by the directors, and our London correspondents have instructions forthwith to procure from Mr Johnson a debenture or floating charge over the whole of his assets in the name of this company for the amount required to secure the debt due by Mr Johnson to our clients." (The letter is written by Messrs Hutchison, Main, & Company's solicitors, and it proceeds as follows:) "So soon as that debenture reaches our hands, we have instructions to make it available to the Bank of Scotland as further and additional security for the repayment by our clients of their indebtedness to the bank, and it is understood, in respect of the arrangements made, that the bank will give to those interested in the company the benefit of the arrangements referred to in past correspondence." The Bank is, therefore, undoubtedly right in so far as it maintains that a just expectation was held out to it that the debenture was to be made available to it by Hutchison, Main, & Company.

The form, however, of making it available was certainly not that they should take the debenture as trustee or agent for the Bank and hold the debenture for it. On the contrary, the firm took the debenture exactly in terms of the agreement made with Johnson, Limited, namely, as its own; and the arrangement with the Bank was that after this had been done then the next step would be taken, namely, to grant a title to it to the Bank by way of assignation. This is clear from the bank manager's letter of 4th February, which says: "With regard to the debenture or floating charge over Mr Johnson's assets, we shall rely on your having this completed as soon as possible and sent to us for assignation to the Bank as a security for the Company's indebtedness."

Feb. 6, 1914.

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

The debenture was thereafter granted on 4th March, but no assignation was made. Correspondence is produced which shows that in April a solicitor in London had been consulted on the point of assignment and that counsel had been instructed to prepare a mortgage. On 6th April the bank manager stated that he would "be glad to receive the mortgage referred to when it is ready for delivery." Nothing further was done; the months slipped away; and neither assignment nor mortgage had been received by the Bank when, on 1st July 1910, Hutchison, Main, & Company went into liquidation.

The learned Judges in the Courts below, not unnaturally, treat the case as one of an "uncompleted security." And so treated their judgment upon it would humbly appear to me to be correct. But, in truth, this puts the facts too favourably for the appellants, unless indeed the words "uncompleted security" are meant to include the case of a security not merely inchoate but never to any extent having any existence. A promise had been made to bring it into existence, by way first of assignation and then of mortgage, but beyond the giving of that promise nothing had been done. The learned Lord Justice-Clerk expresses most clearly and concisely, if I may say so, the essential facts of this case in one sentence when he says (1913 S. C., at p. 264): "To me it appears to be clear that at the date of the liquidation the debenture in question was still held by the Company and that the Bank had no right to it, but had only a right to enforce a contract by which the Company was bound to assign the debenture to the Bank."

It is from this point of view that the citation of much of the authority quoted seemed to me to be inapplicable. For the right of the Bank in the circumstances which I have mentioned was a right resting upon nothing more than this, namely, an unfulfilled promise. And, when one analyses the idea, that is the simple category under which we may presume that 99 per cent of every bankrupt's obligations could be ranged. All his creditors, down to the humblest tradesmen, relied on his promise, expressed or implied, that he would pay for accommodation given, services rendered, or goods received. Upon what principle is one of these creditors to be preferred to another? The whole law of equitable distribution would be destroyed, and the whole security for mercantile dealings would be much impaired, if it were open to an individual creditor to say: "I got no assignment of my debtor's goods either by delivery or by deed, but he promised to me that he would not part with certain of them except in my favour." After bankruptcy or liquidation, things still standing on that footing, all these nuda pacta disappear, and the one question which remains is: Was the property—whatever promises were made with regard to it before—was the property at the time of bankruptcy or liquidation in bonis of the debtor or not?

It is only fair to the appellants to say that the shape of their pleadings in this case is in accord with the correspondence, their eleventh answer containing the gist of their claim at law in these terms: "As part of the arrangements aforesaid concluded between the Company and the respondents (the Bank), the Company were under obligation to transfer the benefit of such debenture to the extent aforesaid, and that such obligation is therefore binding on the liquidators." This is a plain admission that at the date of liquidation the debenture was not the property of the Bank, but still remained the property of the Company. At the conclusion of a strenuous argument for the appellants, I ventured to put the Bank's contention in the following propositions, to the accuracy of which their learned counsel assented: "When the debtor acquires and holds property in his own name, but under a personal obligation to account to a particular creditor therefor, then, in the event of bankruptcy the existence of the personal obligation prevents the property being treated as in bonis of the debtor. On the contrary, the debtor must denude in favour of the particular creditor for whom he is truly a trustee." I am of opinion for the reasons stated that these propositions are not in accordance with the law of Scotland. A preference created in this manner is repugnant to the sound and familiar principles of equitable distribution; and the doctrine of converting a promise to assign or transfer into something which effects a transmutation of real ownership by the debtor into merely apparent ownership by him is legally indefensible.

The only support to be obtained for this operation is by mis-applying the well-known doctrine of apparent and real ownership. When an agent obtains money for the specific purpose of purchasing a property for his client and takes the title in his own name, and becomes bankrupt, it is clear that in such a case the law will get behind the apparent title to the beneficial and the real title, and that—always granted that the interests of third parties who have bought upon the faith of the records have not arisen—the property will, in the event of bankruptcy, be correctly treated as never having been in bonis of the debtor, but always of the client. Lord M'Laren explains this with clearness in Forbes's Trustees v. Macleod.[1] Or when a property is acquired by a company with the company's money and put for convenience sake in the name of the company's manager, then upon the occasion of the manager's bankruptcy the same result happens. The apparent title and the beneficial and real title are in conflict, not on account of the existence of any promise on the part of the manager to transfer it to the company, but on account of the fact that the property all along never was the manager's but was the company's. It would be, therefore, contrary to the truth of the case to permit that property to enter the assets of the manager, to whom it never in truth belonged. The company stands accordingly preferred to the property in the distribution of his assets.

Heritable Reversionary Company v. Millar[2] is the outstanding instance of this. In the language of Lord Watson, "An apparent title to land or personal estate, carrying no real right of property with it, does not, in the ordinary or in any true legal sense, make such land or personal estate the property of the person who holds the title. That which, in legal as well as in conventional language, is described as a man's property is

[1] 25 R. 1012, at p. 1015.
[2] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, at p. 49, [1892] A. C. 598, at p. 614.

Feb. 6, 1914

Bank of Scotland v. Liquidators of Hutchison, Main, & Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

estate, whether heritable or moveable, in which he has a beneficial interest which the law allows him to dispose of. It does not include estate in which he has no beneficial interest, and which he cannot dispose of without committing a fraud." And the distinction between a case of real and beneficial interest as against apparent title on the one hand, and a case of real and beneficial interest or dominium with a contractual obligation to convey or transfer, is well brought out in the judgment of Lord Herschell, where he distinguishes the case of Wylie v. Duncan[1] in this way[2]: "It appears to me that there has been some confusion between the case of heritable property held upon a latent trust of which the owner appearing on the register is a bare trustee, and that of heritable property as to which the owner has come under some contractual obligation. The latter was the case in Wylie v. Duncan.[1] Archibald was there the owner of the property, not a mere trustee; he had bound himself on certain conditions to re-dispone to Wylie, from whom he took the subjects. But this was a mere personal contract. If he had sold the property and disposed of the proceeds, he might have rendered himself liable to legal proceedings, on the ground that he had put it out of his power to fulfil his obligation; but he would not have been guilty of a breach of trust, or brought himself within the reach of the criminal law."

The familiar case—sanctioned in all the law books and acknowledged in many decisions—for the application of this law is that which was commented on in this House in Union Bank of Scotland v. National Bank of Scotland.[3] It is the case of a disposition of heritable property entering the record, but granted concurrently with a back bond which acknowledges that the transaction, although giving the title to the disponee, was truly a security transaction. Nor do I question that the same result could be achieved in a less formal manner. But what is necessary in all such cases is that the question of property itself in what I have ventured to call a real and beneficial sense is settled adversely to the debtor—settled, that is to say, in this way, that the property does not belong to him, but belongs to someone else.

The decisions and dicta in many cases were cited at the discussion, and it would be possible to deal with these in detail. But there are two further considerations which I bear in mind. In the first place, I think that nothing can shake the authority of the case of Heritable Reversionary Company v. Millar,[4] in which substantially the entire case law relevant to this subject was analysed and focussed in the judgments of Lord Herschell and Lord Watson.

And, in the second place, I feel constrained to add that the only judicial dictum of weight which seems to me to give any favour to the argument presented for the Bank is that of Lord Westbury in Fleeming v. Howden.[5] "An obligation," said the distinguished Judge, "to do an act with respect

[1] (1803) M. 10,269.
[2] 19 R. (H. L.) at p. 44, [1892] A. C. at p. 605.
[3] 14 R. (H. L.) 1, 12 App. Cas. 53.
[4] 19 R. (H. L.) 43, [1892] A. C. 598.
[5] 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, at p. 121, L. R., 1 H. L. Sc. 372, at p. 383.

to property creates a trust; and if a fiar, bound to fulfil an obligation acquires or retains, by means of his neglect of that duty, a greater estate than he would otherwise have had, he is a trustee of such excess of interest for the benefit of the persons who would have been entitled to it if the obligation had been duly fulfilled." It seems somewhat late in the day to cite the dictum of this eminent Judge as creating an invasion into the well-settled principle that a contractual obligation with regard to property, which has not effectually and actually brought about either a security upon it or a conveyance of it, is not per se the foundation of a trust or of a declarator of trust. As Lord Watson said in Millar's case,[1] "I agree with the late Lord President in thinking that the opinions expressed by Lord Westbury in Fleeming v. Howden[2] with reference to the nature of the interest which a trustee in sequestration takes in the heritable estate of the bankrupt require considerable modification." Perhaps one ought now to venture distinctly further and to say that it is difficult to reconcile the dictum of Lord Westbury with the decision in Millar's case,[1] or to see how the former can now be stated to represent with accuracy the principle of the law of Scotland.

These circumstances make it clear to me that nothing urged by the Bank in the present case comes up to what the law requires. For, as I have said, it requires nothing less than this, that the property in the debenture referred to was in the Bank of Scotland. The averments, squaring with the correspondence, are, however, that there was a personal contract with Hutchison, Main, & Company to transfer it to the Bank, and that matters stood upon that contract at the time of liquidation. At that time, accordingly, the debenture was part of the property of the bankrupt. It required, in the view of parties, an assignment to divest him of it, and this assignment was not obtained. The case accordingly is the familiar one of an unfulfilled promise to give property or security for goods or benefit which have been received. It is no part of Scotch law to admit a claim of that character to preference in the distribution of bankrupt or liquidation assets.

I am humbly of opinion that the judgment of the Court below is upon that ground correct and should be affirmed.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

ASHURST, MORRIS, CRISP, & CO.—TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—FAITHFUL & OWEN—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.

[1] 19 R. (H. L.), at p. 49, [1892] A. C., at p. 613.
[2] 6 Macph. (H. L.) 113, at p. 121, L. R., 1 H. L. Sc. 372, at p. 383.

No. 2.
Feb. 6, 1914.
Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

WATSON, LAIDLAW, & COMPANY, LIMITED, (Pursuers) Respondents. —Clyde, K.C.—Sandeman, K.C.—M. A. Robertson.
POTT, CASSELS, & WILLIAMSON, AND OTHERS, (Defenders) Appellants.—Walter, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.—Sinclair.

Patent—Infringement—Measure of damages—Appeal to House of Lords.

In an action by patentees for damages in respect of the sale of articles infringing their patent it was proved that the defenders, the infringers, had sold such a number of the articles as would have yielded to the pursuers, had they effected the sales, a profit of approximately £5000. The Second Division of the Court of Session (recalling an award by the Lord Ordinary of £1500) awarded the pursuers £3000, which represented the profits on the proportion of the articles sold by the defenders which, in the opinion of the Court, the pursuers would themselves have succeeded in selling had there been no infringement.

The defenders appealed to the House of Lords and craved their Lordships to restore the award of the Lord Ordinary, which they contended was well founded on the facts, and in any event was, like the verdict of a jury, only open to challenge if wholly unsupported by, or contrary to, the evidence. The pursuers acquiesced in the figure arrived at by the Second Division.

The House of Lords, holding that they were entitled to consider the question of damages on its merits, on a review of the whole evidence affirmed the judgment of the Second Division, (diss. Lord Halsbury, who was of opinion that there were not sufficient materials in the case for assessing the damages).

Opinion (per Lord Shaw of Dunfermline) that legally the pursuers were entitled to damages in respect of all the articles sold by the defenders, irrespectively of whether they themselves could have sold them or not, and that in cases where they themselves could not have effected the sales, damages fell to be assessed by way of a royalty on the articles sold.

(IN the Court of Session, 14th March 1913—1913 S. C. 762.)
The defenders appealed to the House of Lords.
The appeal was heard on 20th and 21st November 1913.

Earl of Halsbury.
Lord Kinnear.
Ld. Atkinson.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

At delivering judgment on 6th February 1914,—

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I regret to say I am unable to concur in the judgment about to be delivered. The question here is simply one of the amount of damages which the pursuers prove they are entitled to recover. The burden of proof lies upon them, and, apart from evidence which of course may shift it, that burden lies upon them to the end, no matter in what stage of the litigation the question arises. The exact nature of the invention does not appear to me to be very material to consider. It is not disputed that the appellants manufactured and sold 252 machines, each of which contained the patented article, and in respect of each of which the pursuers are entitled to recover such damage as was thereby occasioned to them; but in this last question arises the difficulty of proof that, but for the unlawful interference by the defenders, the pursuers would have made the profits of each such sale. The Lord Ordinary came to the conclusion that £1500 was the amount proved before him. The Judges of the Second Division doubled that amount. I understand that Lord Dundas considered that, in arriving at the amount of £1500, the learned Judge was influenced by what I agree would be a totally irrelevant topic; but I cannot find the smallest ground for attributing to the Lord Ordinary so grave an error, namely, the question of a previous offer. The question is no doubt a very difficult one, and, with all respect to Lord Moulton, I do not think it is rendered easier by suggesting a different form of calculation, namely, what would be a reasonable sum made as a charge for the licence to use a patented article. It is, as I have said, a difficult question, but it is purely a question of fact, and that question appears to me to have been vigorously contested before the Lord Ordinary. That learned Judge has in terms expressed his confidence in the witnesses, and two of the learned Judges who have overruled him in no doubtful manner expressed their opinion to be that they do not acquiesce in his finding.

I do not think that we have the materials to assess the damages ourselves. There is no principle here in debate. I cannot think that in any sense £1500 represents nominal damages, neither can I acquiesce in the proposition that the size of the machine can by any ingenuity be made a relevant topic in calculating the damages. I should feel great difficulty in affirming either judgment; but, while I agree with my noble friend, Lord Kinnear, that the judgment of fact is open to review, yet in this case I should not be able to say what I was affirming, what I was overruling, or upon what principle any sum whatever was reached. Fortunately for the parties your Lordships have been able to surmount my difficulties, and so avoid throwing upon them the enormous expense of a new assessment of damages, which is the only judgment with which I could agree.

I ought to add that I entirely agree with Lord Dundas as to the omission of any reasons for the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Kinnear.—The appellants in this case complain of a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session, by which they are ordained to pay to the respondents £3000 as damages for the infringement of a patent. There is no question as to the validity of the patent, nor as to the infringement; but the appellants maintain that the sum awarded is excessive, and that it ought to be reduced by one-half, or £1500, which is the sum awarded by the Lord Ordinary. The onus is, of course, upon them to satisfy your Lordships that the judgment is wrong, and I think they have failed to discharge it.

The controversy depends upon disputed matter of fact; and I shall state shortly what I think the right view of it. But it is necessary in the first place to consider an argument which was maintained with some insistence by the appellants, that the Lord Ordinary's award of £1500 ought to have been accepted by the Court below as conclusive. It is said that his decision, on matters of fact, must be considered on the same footing as the verdict of a jury, which can only be set aside if it is given without evidence, or proceeds upon a misdirection in point of law. But this rests upon an entire misapprehension of the law and practice of

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Kinnear.

Scotland. The procedure in the Court of Session is regulated by Acts of Parliament, which give to the party who may be aggrieved by the judgment of a Lord Ordinary a right to appeal to the Inner House on matter of fact as well as on matter of law. It is of the essence of a right of appeal so unlimited that the aggrieved party should be entitled to demand a review of the judgment, of which he complains, on all the grounds on which it was, or ought to have been, considered by the Judge of first instance.

The inveterate practice of the Court of Session is in accordance with this view of the statutes, and the learned Judges of the Second Division were therefore acting in performance of a duty which the law imposes upon them when they reviewed the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the matter of fact, and undertook to determine, not whether there was evidence before him on which his judgment might be based, but whether on a balance of evidence his conclusion was right or wrong. This is fully explained in Kinnell v. Peebles,[1] and the law is laid down to the same effect by Lord Blackburn in this House in the case of Mann v. Brodie.[2] It is true that in both these cases it is clearly indicated that the nature of the evidence may be such as to give the Lord Ordinary, who heard the witnesses, better means of judging than the Inner House or your Lordships, who only read the notes. In such a case the Lord President says that he should not only attach the greatest weight to the opinion of the Judge who saw the witnesses and heard their evidence, but that he should have been slow to disturb his conclusion; and Lord Shand said that on a question of credibility he had not known a case where the decision of the Lord Ordinary was not affirmed. But that is a consideration which creates no difficulty in the case before your Lordships. The question does not depend on the credibility of conflicting witnesses, but on the true import and bearing of facts the existence of which is hardly controverted. The Lord Ordinary says nothing to suggest that the witnesses on one side were more worthy of belief than those on the other. On the contrary, he says that on both sides they "gave their evidence frankly and fairly," and on the weight to be given to the evidence, irrespective of credibility, he expresses no opinion whatever. The learned Judges of the Inner House had thus no alternative but to consider the evidence for themselves, and give their own judgment on the facts just as if they were judging in the first instance.

The Lord Ordinary, however, makes one observation which suggests a somewhat different question. He says that, because the question is entirely a jury one, he did not think it necessary or desirable to give reasons for fixing the amount. This might be very right if the only question were one of amount, depending on considerations that could not be precisely formulated. There may be circumstances in which damages cannot be governed by any settled rule; and in such cases a discretion may well be left to a Judge, as it commonly is to a jury, not, indeed, without limits, but within limits that are not very strictly defined. But, nevertheless, the estimate of amount must be based on solid grounds, both of fact and law. The patentee must prove the loss that he has sustained by unlawful sales as the natural and direct consequence of the wrong done to him; and the Judge has to determine whether such loss has been proved. Whatever his reasons may have been, it cannot be supposed that the Lord Ordinary awarded a random sum; and yet his award could be presented in no other light to the Judges of the Second Division, since his reasons for it were unexplained. It follows that they were required to examine the evidence in the same way as in any other question of disputed fact, and determine for themselves the amount to which damage had been proved.

[1] (1890) 17 R. 416. [2] (1885) 12 R. (H. L.) 52, 10 App. Cas. 378.

I think the case of the United Horse Shoe and Nail Company v. Stewart & Company[1] in this House, which was relied upon by the appellants, is a very valuable authority on the question of the weight that may properly be given to the award of the Judge of first instance. But it gives no countenance to the notion that his award, just because it is his, is to be accepted without examination by a Court of appeal. The main question before the House was between substantial and nominal damages. The Lord Ordinary had held that substantial damage had been proved; the First Division reversed his judgment and awarded a certain sum by way of nominal damages; and it was held in this House that in principle the Lord Ordinary's judgment was right. The award of the First Division was thus completely displaced, and it became necessary to consider whether the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be restored even as to amount. It is evident from the judgment that, for this purpose, the noble and learned Lords who advised the House examined the evidence, and determined for themselves what was proved and what was not proved, and what part of the proof was relevant to the issue and what was not. As a result of this examination their Lordships held it to be proved that the patentee had suffered damage by reason of sales in infringement of his patents, and also that, but for the intervention of the infringers, a large part of these sales, though not the whole, would have been effected by the patentee himself. So far, the patentee's case was capable of direct proof or disproof, and their Lordships decided it according to their own view of the evidence. But when it came to an estimate of the actual amount of injury done to the patentee's trade, it was thought that this was matter for a probable estimate only, and not for exact calculation, because, as Lord Watson puts it (at p. 49), "it is impossible to ascertain with arithmetical precision what in the ordinary course of business would have been the amount of the patentees' sales and profits." It was on this problematical question alone that the House accepted the Lord Ordinary's amount without being altogether satisfied of its accuracy. But they did so only because they were satisfied on the one hand that it did substantial justice, and on the other, that it could not be said with certainty that any different figures would be exactly right. The Lord Chancellor puts the ground of judgment in a sentence when he says (at p. 46):—"The judgment of the Lord Ordinary, with which I concur, . . . hardly appears to me adequately to represent the amount of damages which the learned Judge held to be proved

[1] (1888) 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Kinnear.

. . . But I so far agree with the Lord Ordinary that, in arriving at the exact figure, it is extremely difficult, without further materials, to arrive with any confidence at a different sum to that which the Lord Ordinary has assessed." And Lord Macnaghten says (at p. 51):—"The amount of damages is not a matter of exact calculation, and your Lordships have not got before you all the materials which would be required to arrive at the most accurate estimate that could be formed. . . . But it appears to me that substantial justice will be done if your Lordships confirm the amount that the Lord Ordinary has awarded." I am of opinion that the course followed by the Second Division in the present case is entirely consistent with that approved by the House in the case cited. They could not accept the Lord Ordinary's award, not only because they knew nothing of its grounds, but because on their own examination of the evidence they were satisfied that it did not do substantial justice.

I think their own judgment rests upon a perfectly sound basis. They considered rightly that every sale of a patented article in violation of a patent is a damage to the patentee. They found it admitted that the appellants had sold 252 machines in infringement of the patent, and they came to the conclusion, on the evidence, that the profits of the respondents on similar sales came to a sum little short of £5000, or on a different calculation of over £6000. This brought the Court to the question as to the amount of loss, which has been found to be incapable of an exact solution. But the main point in controversy, on this part of the case, is nevertheless susceptible of argumentative proof, and on this I agree with the learned Judges below that the appellants have failed.

They maintain that if they had not interfered the respondents could not have effected the sales in question, first, because they were really due to the exceptional efficiency and popularity of their selling agents, Messrs Hellendoorn & Akkerman; and secondly, because their customers were attracted, not by the patented arrangement, but by a different arrangement of ball-bearings not covered by the patent. In so far as this is urged to show that the whole of these sales, or the great bulk of them, would have been made if the machines sold had not included the respondents' patent buffer, it appears to me a conclusive answer that Mr Hellendoorn himself took pains to advertise the merits of the patented machine by issuing illustrated circulars to the classes of persons likely to buy, and that, in dealing with possible customers, he put forward as a special inducement to buy from him, that he was able to supply the same centrifugal machines as the respondents. On the whole evidence, I think it proved that the greater number of the machines sold by the appellants, during the period of infringement, were avowedly sold and purchased on the merits of the respondents' invention, and that a considerable proportion, although not all, of the purchasers would have bought from the respondents if they had not obtained these machines from the appellants' agents. This left for consideration what is no doubt a very troublesome question as to the allowance which ought to be made for other causes which might reasonably be thought to have promoted the appellants' sales. This is not a matter which in the nature of things can be ascertained with any certainty. But the judgments show that it was very carefuly considered by the learned Judges. I am not prepared to substitute any estimate of my own for that which they have made, and I do not examine in detail the grounds on which they have reduced the £5000 above mentioned to £3000, because the only question before your Lordships is whether the latter sum is excessive. I think the appellants have failed to prove the alleged excess. The respondents, without admitting that it is in fact adequate, are content to accept it as sufficient, and I am of opinion that substantial justice will be done by affirming the interlocutor. I only add that this conclusion is, to my mind, entirely in accordance with the course taken by your Lordships' House in the case of the United Horse Shoe and Nail Company v. Stewart.[1]

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Kinnear.

Lord Atkinson.—In this case the Lord Ordinary, by an interlocutor dated the 30th March 1912, assessed the damages payable by the appellants to the respondents—in respect of the infringement by the former of certain letters-patent dated the 4th of May 1903 (No. 10,034 of 1903), granted in favour of James Wright Macfarlane, of the firm of Watson, Laidlaw, & Company, of 99 Dundas Street, Kingston, in the county of Glasgow, for the improvements in certain centrifugal machines therein described—at £1500. On a reclaiming note, lodged by the present respondents, the Second Division, by its interlocutor dated the 4th of March 1913, increased that amount to £3000. From this latter interlocutor the present appeal has been taken by the appellants.

It is admitted that the appellants manufactured and sold 252 machines, each of which so resembled the patented machines as to involve the infringement of the patent of the respondents. And to the extent, therefore, that the manufacture and sale of these pirated machines interfered with the sale by the respondents of their patented machines, the latter are entitled to be compensated in damages for the loss they have sustained. The difficulty in deciding the matter in controversy in this case, as in most cases of its kind, lies in the necessity of forming an estimate of the extent to which the sale of the patented machines has been interfered with by the sale of the pirated machines, so as to enable one to measure the amount of the loss sustained by the patentees.

Had this case been tried before a Judge and jury, the jury would have solved the question in a rough-and-ready way by the application of such common sense and commercial knowledge as commonly enables them to decide satisfactorily questions not susceptible of mathematical calculation; and their verdict could not have been disturbed by a Court of review, however that Court might disagree with their conclusion, unless it was of opinion that, having regard to the evidence, no reasonable men could come to the conclusion at which the jury had arrived. This is, however, because the jury are, in such a case, the sole judges of fact.

If, however, a case be tried—as this case, like the case of The United Horse Shoe and Nail Company v. Stewart & Company,[1] was tried—before a Judge sitting alone, who thus becomes the Judge of both law and fact, then on appeal from his decision the conclusions of fact at which he arrived

[1] 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Ld. Atkinson.

must, of necessity, be subject to review, and the evidence from which his conclusions were drawn must of necessity be re-examined. This course was followed in the Court of Session and your Lordships' House in the Horse Shoe case,[1] and is daily followed by the Court of Appeal in this country, and by this House in appeals, for instance, from the Judges of the Chancery and Admiralty Divisions when they decide without the assistance of a jury. Of course, the Judge who has had the great advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses who are examined before him is in a far better position to judge of their credibility than anyone can be who has not had that advantage, a consideration never to be lost sight of on appeal from the decision of a Judge so placed; but, credibility apart, it by no means follows that he is in a better position to draw the correct inference from the evidence given than are the Judges of the Court which has only the notes of that evidence before it.

In Mann v. Brodie[2] the question at issue was the existence of a public right of way over certain lands therein mentioned. The Lord Ordinary found against the existence of this right of way. The First Division of the Court of Session found in favour of it, but the difference between the conclusions arrived at by these two tribunals arose from the divergence of their respective views as to the effect of the evidence given on the two points mentioned by Lord Blackburn at page 388 of the Appeal Cases Report, rather than upon the question of the credibility of the witnesses. At page 384 Lord Blackburn, in the opening sentences of his judgment, laid down the law thus:—"The First Division differed from the Lord Ordinary, not as to any question of law but as to the effect of the evidence. There was not anything in the nature of the evidence to give the Lord Ordinary, though he heard the witnesses, better means of judging than the Judges of the First Division or your Lordships who only read the notes; and the Judges, I think, owed it to the respondent to form their own opinion and to act upon it if it was different from that of the Lord Ordinary. I think now that your Lordships owe it to the appellant to form your own opinion and to act upon it though it is different from that of the Inner House. I need not say I should not lightly differ from them, even though in doing so I agreed with the Lord Ordinary."

In the Horse Shoe and Nail Company case[1] the sole question in controversy was the amount of damages. There, as here, the main claim was that the damages were to be assessed on the assumption that if the infringers had not interfered with the patentees' trade the latter would themselves have sold, during the period of interference, a quantity of nails, in addition to what they had actually sold, equal to the quantity sold by the infringers. The consideration of the matter of competition, its keenness and amount, was involved in the decision of the claim. The Lord Ordinary had awarded the sum of £530 as damages. The Inner House had, on appeal, reduced that sum to £50. The noble and learned Lords who took part in the decision examined the evidence for themselves. They held that the sum of £50 was insufficient, that the Lord Ordinary had to some extent proceeded upon an erroneous principle, but that as the amount of damages, which their own examination of the evidence led them to conclude had been sustained, approximated nearly to the sum the Lord Ordinary had awarded, substantial justice would be done by confirming his award. The principle of that decision applies, I think, to the present case.

[1] 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.
[2] 12 R. (H. L.) 52, 10 App. Cas. 378.

Here the Lord Ordinary does not in his judgment indicate in any way on what principle he proceeded, or by what method, or on what basis he arrived at the figure of £1500. The respondents are content with the decision of the Inner House. They accept it, and have not appealed against it. The appellants do not suggest that the sum of £3000 is too little. On the contrary, they contend it is twice too much. The burden of showing it is too much rests upon them. They do not, in my view, discharge that burden by merely showing that the amount awarded by the Lord Ordinary is only half that awarded by the Inner House. If on examining the evidence one comes to the conclusion that it has not been clearly shown that this sum of £3000 is too large, then, in my opinion, the award of the Inner House should be allowed to stand and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

The first and most important point to determine is how many more of the patented machines it is reasonably probable the respondents would have sold if the appellants had not sold these 252 infringing or pirated machines. This is obviously a matter which cannot be determined by mathematical calculation or with absolute accuracy. At best the result can only be an approximation.

Mr Walter, on behalf of the appellants, reduced the number of extra sales the respondents would have made if his clients never had infringed to about 105. He arrived, however, at that figure by assuming that the sales by the appellants of 119 pirated machines in the island of Java did not prejudice in any way the sale of the respondents' machines in that market, and also assumed that the same assumption applies to 28 similar machines sold by the appellants under certain conditions which he specified. He contended that the persons who purchased these 147 machines for use were induced to do so, not from any appreciation of their superiority due to the particular improvements which the respondents had patented, or from any desire to purchase machines possessing those features, but solely because of the push and popularity of one Akkerman, through whom the sales were effected, aided by another person named Hellendoorn.

This Akkerman is a most important witness. He was examined and cross-examined on interrogatories. The Lord Ordinary neither saw nor heard him, and was in no better position to judge of his credibility than were the Judges of the Inner House, or than are your Lordships. I have read through all this evidence, and examined with special care that given by the important witnesses following, namely, Pieter Gallas, R. Williamson, I. F. R. Hellendoorn and Akkerman himself, together with the letters and other documents given in evidence in the case, and am utterly unable to come to the conclusion for which Mr Walter contends.

Hellendoorn acted as sole agent in Java for the sale of the appellants' machines. He himself bought these machines and resold them to the owners and managers of sugar estates. The respondents' machines were sold in Java through the instrumentality of Pieter Gallas, manager of a company or firm named the Constructive Winkel de Bromo, which carried on the business of supplying the respondents' centrifugal machines—the patented machines—to the managers of sugar estates in this island. This company, like Hellendoorn, purchased these machines from the respondents, and made their profit on the resale of them. This witness, whose veracity is not impeached, states at p. 46 that Hellendoorn was his chief competitor in the sale of centrifugal machines in Java; that very few centrifugal machines but those of the respondents and those sold by Hellendoorn were sold in the Java market; that after he, Gallas, started to supply the patented buffer, the new feature of special merit in the patented machine designed to check oscillation, Hellendoorn put a similar buffer on the market, advertised it, and distributed circulars containing drawings and descriptions of it. The admissions made by Akkerman in answer to cross interrogatories 68, 69, and 70, page 106, are of the utmost importance. They run thus:—"Cross Int. 68. Was the attitude adopted by Mr Hellendoorn and you as his agent in dealing with owners and administrators of sugar estates in Java that he was able to supply machines of the same type as those supplied by Watson, Laidlaw, & Company? (A.) Yes. Cross Int. 69. Did he also make it public in Java that he could supply all necessary parts for their machines? (A.) Yes. Cross Int. 70. In fact, was not the position adopted by Mr Hellendoorn as defenders' agent in Java, in dealing with owners and administrators of sugar estates there that he was able to supply exactly the same centrifugal machine as Watson, Laidlaw, & Company, Limited, at a lower price? (A.) Mr Hellendoorn's attitude was that he was able to supply exactly the same centrifugal machines as the pursuers, but nothing was said about a lower price."

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Ld. Atkinson.

The special feature of the invention of the respondents was a spindle supporting a revolving shaft. This spindle rested on a conical rubber buffer, and was so constructed as to admit of ball-bearings being so placed in its substance as to work. It is plain, from the manner in which the circulars distributed by Hellendoorn were got up, that they were designed for the very purpose of inducing intending purchasers to believe that the machines he supplied were in all respects the same as those supplied by the respondents.

Moreover, the correspondence given in evidence clearly proved that both Hellendoorn and Akkerman were most anxious to procure, and did procure, the infringing machines of the appellants for the very purpose of disposing of them to purchasers by the means set forth in the above-mentioned interrogatories. They say they thought they had the right to do this. It is, in my view, impossible to suppose that two keen business men like Hellendoorn and Akkerman would have purchased the appellants' machines if they did not believe they could resell them, and equally impossible to suppose that they would have distributed these circulars and drawings, and made the statements above mentioned, if they were not confident that the sale of the machines they so purchased would be stimulated by pointing out their resemblance to the respondents' machines. It may well be that the sales of the appellants' machines in Java were increased owing to the push and popularity of Akkerman. Due allowance should be made for that; but bearing in mind that the respondents' machines were extensively sold in Java, and were well known there and elsewhere, it is only reasonable to conclude that, if the appellants had not infringed, a considerable percentage of the persons who purchased the appellants' machines would have purchased those of the respondents.

Applying, then, the principle adopted in the cases to which your Lordships have been referred to the evidence in this case, it would appear to me reasonably probable that at least 60 per cent. of those purchasers would have supplied themselves with the machines they required from the vendors of the respondents' machines. Sixty per cent of 150 machines would be 90 machines, which, added to the 105 the sale of which Mr. Walter admits the respondents have lost, would mean that the respondents have lost the profits they would have realised upon the sale of about 195 machines. Mr Walter admits that a fair test of this loss would be the amount the appellants would have had to pay to acquire legally the power which they usurped. That is a royalty calculated at 10s. per inch of the machine. This would, owing to the large dimensions of some of the machines, average considerably more than £15 per machine, but taking it at that average the royalties would amount to £2915. In addition to this the loss the respondents have sustained under the other heads of their claim by the sale by the defenders of such things as accessories, and by extensions, repairs, &c., has to be considered. I have some difficulty in forming any estimate as to what sum this latter loss approximates. But the loss I have already mentioned as probable on the sale of the machines alone approaches so near to the sum awarded by the Inner House, that I fail to see that the latter is too large; and, following the precedent of the Horse Shoe and Nail Company case,[1] I think substantial justice would be done by upholding the decision of the Inner House and dismissing the appeal with costs.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—This is an action brought by the respondents against the appellants for damages in respect of the infringement of a patent granted in the year 1903 for improvements in the manufacture of centrifugal machines. The merits of the patent have been the subject of previous litigation, when the validity of the patent was affirmed and the appellants were interdicted from infringement. The principle of the patent, if I may quote what was formerly said judicially upon the subject, is that[2] "material, partly solid and partly fluid, put into a basket which is made to rotate, may be dried by the effect of the centrifugal action which occurs with the rotary motion and which separates the fluid matter from the solid. By the perforation of the basket the fluid matter, thus driven centrifugally, flies off and the solid matter remains in the receptacle. The basket or receptacle is

[1] 15 R. (H. L.) 45, 13 App. Cas. 401.
[2] 28 R. P. C. 565, at p. 578.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

swivelled upon the foot of the central bar or spindle. . . . It happens that the basket thus swung on the central bar, when it rotates with a certain velocity, begins to oscillate and the oscillation communicates itself also to the spindle. This oscillation, thus accompanying the rotation, may cause breakage and loss." The invention of the respondents was one for the avoidance of this oscillation. The patent consisted of "the construction of a hollow indiarubber cone suitably supported, into which fits a counterpart cone formed upon the spindle of the machine. By this construction the inventor takes advantage of the wedging action of the spindle cone upon the encasing rubber, and obtains, along with the necessary flexibility, the control previously unknown."

I am convinced, upon the evidence in this case, that the merits of the respondents' patent, which have already been judicially affirmed, have been proved to be of considerable commercial interest and value. I think it to be established, first, that it was in the hope and prospect that it would be so that it was copied by the appellants, the infringers; secondly, that they thought it right to apprise consumers in general of their ability to supply by the infringing machines exact replicas of those made by the respondents, and accordingly to issue the circulars and drawings to which reference will be made; thirdly, that consumers, being thus commercially apprised by the appellants of their power to supply machinery containing a novel and useful merit, purchased such machines. Upon this last head I include under the term "consumers" those agents (and especially one agent in Java, with a large connection in that island) who were able to continue their commercial connections and secure fresh orders, not only on account of their talents for business, but because it was in their own interests as well as the interests of the consumers, that they should be in a position to offer machinery containing the merits of the patented invention.

I have made these observations because in the present case I am also convinced on the evidence that, from the point of commercial effectiveness and output, there can be no doubt of the value of the patented part to the machine as a whole. And I may add that I see no reason to suppose that it ever entered into any consumer's mind to attempt the transaction (the attempt would probably have failed) of purchasing the novel and meritorious patented portion of the machine from the patentee, and the remainder of it from the appellants or any other firm. I further apply this observation to the machines and frames, which were generally treated as one item of order.

The damages were fixed by the Lord Ordinary at £1500—given as a jury estimate and without a statement of reasons or of the lines of calculation. In the Second Division of the Inner House this award was raised to £3000. The respondents are content with this sum, and defend the judgment. Subject to this position of the respondents, your Lordships, under the principle of Mann v. Brodie,[1] must consider the whole case, both in fact and in law. Nor is the balance swayed by any consideration of the advantage to the Judge of first instance in having seen

[1] 12 R. (H. L.) 52, 10 App. Cas. 378.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

the witnesses, for the Lord Ordinary was satisfied that the evidence had been fairly and frankly given on both sides. In result accordingly the issue for this House is whether, upon a review of the whole case, the one sum or the other—£1500 or £3000—comes nearest to the mark which your Lordships would fix.

The learned counsel for the appellants, in defending the lesser figure of £1500, proceeded by the method of a wide deduction from the number of machines, infringing the patent, which were sold. That number was 252. The sale of each of these was a legal wrong. But it is said that with regard to the major number of these the sales should not sound in damages. And fortunately the argument on this subject can be focussed by the consideration that of these machines, over 130 in number, which were sold in the island of Java, it is said: This Java trade would never have gone to the patentee; the machines sold there were disposed of by our, the infringers', agent; they contained the patented part, but, patented part or none, they would have been supplied as well and as good by us; and in any event this Java market you, the patentee, would not have touched. The figure of 252 must, therefore, be reduced in this simple and plain way by more than one half, and it is only with regard to the balance—the true dimension of the case—that damages can be measured. If this argument be good, the Lord Ordinary's figure can be justified. If bad, the Inner House figure of £3000 must at least stand, and the appeal fails.

There are many other details and items of the claim and case which were dealt with, but for the purpose of the broad comparison between the £1500 and the £3000 the Java trade covers the ground both in argument and in fact. In my opinion, the case does raise sharply an important question as to the assessment of damages in patent cases, and with that question I proceed to deal.

It is probably a mistake in language to treat the methods usually adopted in ascertaining the measure of damages in patent cases as principles. They are the practical working rules which have seemed helpful to Judges in arriving at a true estimate of the compensation which ought to be awarded to a patentee against an infringer.

In the case of damages in general, there is one principle which does underlie the assessment. It is what may be called that of restoration. The idea is to restore the person who has sustained injury and loss to the condition in which he would have been had he not so sustained it. In the cases of financial loss, injury to trade, and the like, caused either by breach of contract or by tort, the loss is capable of correct appreciation in stated figures. In a second class of cases, restoration being in point of fact difficult—as in the case of loss of reputation—or impossible—as in the case of loss of life, faculty, or limb—the task of restoration under the name of compensation calls into play inference, conjecture, and the like. And this is necessarily accompanied by those deficiencies which attach to the conversion into money of certain elements which are very real, which go to make up the happiness and usefulness of life, but which were never so converted or measured. The restoration by way of compensation is therefore accomplished to a large extent by the exercise of a sound imagination and the practice of the broad axe. It is in such cases, whether the result has been attained by the verdict of a jury or the finding of a single Judge, that the greatest weight attaches to the decision of the Court of first instance. The reasons for this are not far to seek—such as the value of testimony at first hand, even down to the nuances of its expression, and they include, of course, the attitude and demeanour of the witnesses themselves. In all these cases, however, the attempt which justice makes is to get back to the status quo ante in fact, or to reach imaginatively, by the process of compensation, a result in which the same principle is followed.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

In patent cases the question of damages is in all instances to some extent, and in many instances to the entire extent, dependent upon the same principle of restoration. The patentee may show that the trade done by the infringer would have been his (the patentee's) trade, and he is entitled in such cases to be restored against the action of the infringer; and he may adopt, in liquidating that principle in money, an alternative course. He may say, "I shall accept the profits which have been made by the infringer in this trade which ought to have been my trade"; or he may take the other head of the alternative and say, "The illicit opposition to and interference with my own trade caused me damage. I lost profit which I would have otherwise made in it; I lost business connection; the development of my business on its natural lines was interrupted by my being driven by these acts of piracy out of sections of my own trade." These and other things may be heads of damage. And it is well settled that a patentee may choose his course of measuring his loss either by the profits which the infringer made, or by items of damages such as those referred to, but that in respect of the same matter he cannot have both his own damages and the infringer's profits.

In the course, however, of deciding cases, certain expressions have been used by learned Judges, which, according to the contention, are to the effect, or truly mean, that if the patentee chooses the latter course, namely, to reckon up his claim under heads of damage, he is limited, so to speak, by the principle of restoration. Phrases, for instance, have been used, which it is said imply that the entire measure of his damage is the loss which he has incurred of the trade in the pirated articles. And then comes in an astute argument, that in all cases where the infringer can establish that the trade in the machines which happen to contain the patented article or part would under no circumstances have ever reached the patentee himself, no claim can be admitted. To take an instance such as the present case affords, the patentee was not in a position to carry on business in a certain part of the world exclusively possessed for commercial purposes by the energies of the infringer and his agents. It is said in such a case: Where is the damage which the patentee has incurred? On the other heads of the case he has obtained his damages; but on this part, which covers a section of trade which in no circumstances he could have touched, he can have sustained no damage, because he would never have sold his patented articles within that section. The duty of an infringer is covered by the principle of restoration, and the patentee has surely been restored to as good a position as he was in before the infringement, or would have been in but for it, if he has been put into the same financial position as he would have occupied in that region of trade where alone he would have been operating.

It is at this stage of the case, however, that a second principle comes into play. It is not exactly the principle of restoration, either directly or expressed through compensation, but it is the principle underlying price or hire. It plainly extends—and I am inclined to think not infrequently extends—to patent cases. But, indeed, it is not confined to them. For wherever an abstraction or invasion of property has occurred, then, unless such abstraction or invasion were to be sanctioned by law, the law ought to yield a recompense under the category or principle, as I say, either of price or of hire. If A, being a liveryman, keeps his horse standing idle in the stable, and B, against his wish or without his knowledge, rides or drives it out, it is no answer to A for B to say: "Against what loss do you want to be restored? I restore the horse. There is no loss. The horse is none the worse; it is the better for the exercise." I confess that this seems to me to be precisely in principle the kind of question and retort which underlay the argument of the learned counsel for the appellants about the Java trade. I explain that thus. In the island of Java machines of the kind in question in this case are largely used in the process of manufacturing sugar, in which the separation of the fluid from the solid matter by a system which is swift and avoids danger and loss is of great value. Much evidence was led to the effect that in that island, however, the agent for the infringer was an able business man, and that the value of his influence and connection was such that in substance it would not have mattered whether the machines sold by him contained the novel merit of the respondents' patent or did not. He would have sold machines which he and others think as good; and in any case the respondents (the patentees) would not have sold their machines as against him. The evidence to this effect is not conclusive, but it is strong, and I desire, as the matter in that way tests the principle I am applying, to accept it in its entirety. I exclude from view all that rather condemnatory evidence which shows that consumers, and notably foreign consumers, did think most highly of the patented invention. I will exclude all the evidence which shows that the appellants, the infringers, actually copied the drawings of the patented machine, and circularised their customers in various parts of the world to the effect that they could supply that identical article, or rather, the rotary machine with that identical merit. And I will go further and assume that the respondents would not have done the Java trade in the 130 machines sold in that island by the infringers, and containing the patented part. The argument is—for indeed this instance covers sufficiently the whole ground—the argument is: Here it is demonstrated that the patentees have lost no trade which they could have obtained. And under the cover of certain judicial dicta the infringers are entitled to say that the entire measure of the patentees' damage is exhausted when restoration of the status quo ante has been obtained.

Now, in the first place, it is clear to my mind that, suppose the patentees had chosen to ask an account of the profits made by the in-fringers upon the infringing machines, they would have been entitled to obtain it, and a decree for the amount, and it would have been no answer to say, The account shall be given, but there shall be excluded from it places which we shall establish your trade would never have reached.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

In the second place it appears to me that, although it be true that a patentee cannot have both remedies at the same time, namely, the damages to his own business and the profits of the infringer's business, still this is true simply because it is in that way that overlapping is prevented. But in the instance of which the present is an excellent type there is no overlapping whatsoever. If with regard to the general trade which was done, or would have been done by the respondents within their ordinary range of trade, damages be assessed, these ought, of course, to enter the account and to stand. But in addition there remains that class of business which the respondents would not have done: and in such cases it appears to me that the correct and full measure is only reached by adding that a patentee is also entitled, on the principle of price or hire, to a royalty for the unauthorised sale or use of every one of the infringing machines in a market which the patentee if left to himself, might not have reached. Otherwise that property which consists in the monopoly of the patented articles granted to the patentee has been invaded, and indeed abstracted, and the law, when appealed to, would be standing by and allowing the invader or abstracter to go free. In such cases a royalty is an excellent key to unlock the difficulty, and I am in entire accord with the principle laid down by Lord Moulton in Meters, Limited.[1] Each of the infringements was an actionable wrong, and although they may have been committed in a range of business or of territory which the patentee might not have reached, he is entitled to hire or royalty in respect of each unauthorised use of his property. Otherwise the remedy might fall unjustly short of the wrong.

In various cases—of which the present is a good example—it is only by this combination of actual damage on the principle of restoration with, in another section of these operations, the principle of royalty that a full and adequate response can be made to the cardinal question which remains always to be answered in these infringement suits, the question put by Vice-Chancellor Page Wood in Penn v. Jack,[2] viz.: "What would have been the condition of the plaintiff if the defendants had acted properly instead of acting improperly. That condition if it can be ascertained, will, I apprehend, be the proper measure of the plaintiff's loss." To apply the principle: The appellants did this Java trade improperly. Had they done it properly they would have done it under royalty. That royalty the respondents would have obtained.

Fortunately the figures—on these principles being settled—leave no doubt on the mind that the award of £3000 made by the learned Judges of the Second Division is much within the mark, and that their figure—it not being complained of as too low—must stand. To Mr Hellendoorn alone, the Java agent, over 130 infringing machines were sent. It is an admitted fact that the royalty of 10s. per inch of diameter is a fair charge, and this works out at about £17, which upon 130 machines reaches a slump amount of £2210. Thus for the Java trade alone a sum of over £2000 is due. To this sum falls to be added the loss and damage in respect of all the other branches of the trade. And much over the sum of £3000 is thus on admission, or moderate computation, reached.

[1] (1911) 28 R. P. C. 163.

[2] (1867) L. R., 5 Eq. 81, at p. 84.

Feb. 6, 1914.

Watson, Laidlaw, & Co., Limited, v. Pott, Cassels, & Williamson.

I do not doubt that the conclusion reached by the Court below ought not to be disturbed.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

ORDERED that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—WEBSTER, WILL, & Co., W.S.—NICHOLLS, HERBERT, & Co.—J. & J. ROSS, W.S.

STEPHEN SHIELDS, (Pursuer) Respondent.—Christie, K.C.—Scanlan.
JAMES SHEARER AND ANOTHER, (Defenders) Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Macquisten—H. M'Kinnon Wood.

No. 3.

April 3, 1914.

Shields v. Shearer.

Reparation—Illegal apprehension—Arrest by constables without warrant of person "reasonably suspected of" crime—Privilege—Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 88.

Issue—Form of issue—Illegal apprehension—Apprehension "without reasonable grounds of suspicion"—Malice.

The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 88, empowers constables within the city to take into custody, without any other authority than the Act, any person "who is either accused or reasonably suspected of having committed" a penal offence.

In an action of damages for wrongous arrest brought against two Glasgow constables, who had apprehended the pursuer without a warrant, the defenders maintained that, as they had bona fide suspected the pursuer of a crime and as, in their judgment, their grounds of suspicion were reasonable, they were protected by section 88 of the Glasgow Police Act and the action should be dismissed; or otherwise that, if a trial were allowed, malice must be put in issue, in respect that the pursuer was bound to prove that the defenders had been actuated by ill will towards him.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) (1) that it was a question for a jury whether the grounds of the defenders' suspicion were or were not reasonable; (2) that the pursuer was not bound to prove ill will on the part of the defenders, and accordingly that malice need not be put in issue; and an issue whether the defenders "wrongfully and illegally, and without reasonable grounds of suspicion, apprehended the pursuer" approved.

(IN the Court of Session 4th July 1913—1913 S. C. 1012.)
The defenders appealed to the House of Lords.
The appeal was heard on 3rd April 1914.*
At the conclusion of the appellants' argument,—

Ld. Chancellor (Haldane).
Ld. Kinnear.
Ld. Dunedin.
Ld. Atkinson.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—It would be with reluctance that I should criticise a decision come to in the Court of Session on a question of procedure, but

* The following case, which was not referred to in the argument in the Court of Session, was cited in the House of Lords:—Buchanan v. Corporation of Glasgow, (1905) 7 F. 1001.

April 3, 1914.

Shields v. Shearer.

Lord Chancellor.

on the present occasion I find myself, for reasons I will presently state, entirely in accordance with the views of the learned judges who have decided this case in the Court below; and I am strengthened in my sense of concurrence by the fact that three of your Lordships, who have large experience in connection with Scottish procedure, are of the same opinion. Of the issue as framed I only propose to say that it seems to me, if it is justifiable, a convenient course to have adopted for the bringing to justice of the case before us.

The real question seemed to me at a very early stage of the opening of the Solicitor-General for Scotland a question of substance—the question whether it is necessary for the pursuer to prove that malice in fact was in the minds of the police when they took steps which resulted in what he alleges was his false imprisonment.

Between malice in fact and malice in law there is a broad distinction which is not peculiar to any particular system of jurisprudence. A person who inflicts an injury upon another person in contravention of the law is not allowed to say that he did so with an innocent mind; he is taken to know the law, and he must act within the law. He may, therefore, be guilty of malice in law, although, so far as the state of his mind is concerned, he acts ignorantly, and in that sense innocently. Malice in fact is quite a different thing; it means an actual malicious intention on the part of the person who has done the wrongful act, and it may be, in proceedings based on wrongs independent of contract, a very material ingredient in the question of whether a valid cause of action can be stated.

What has happened in the present case is this: that an issue has been framed under a statute which governs these matters in Glasgow, and an issue which substantially follows the words of that statute. The issue proposed is: "Whether on or about 14th October 1912 the defenders wrongfully and illegally, and without reasonable grounds for suspicion, apprehended the pursuer in or about Glebe Street, Townhead, and conveyed him to the St Rollox police office in Glasgow, to his loss, injury, and damage"; and the damage is laid at £100. In order to succeed on what is the real question of substance underlying this case the learned Solicitor-General frankly admitted that he would have to say that if the defenders, the police, wrongfully and illegally without reasonable grounds of suspicion apprehended the pursuer, still the pursuer could not succeed without proving that malice in fact which I have distinguished from malice in law.

I asked the learned Solicitor-General, than whom no one is more competent to answer the question, whether he could produce any train of authorities in the Court of Session, or any decision of this House, which introduced what would be a most startling demarcation between the law as it exists in Scotland and the law as it exists here, and he replied with candour that he could not. There was one case, the case of Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow,[1] which we were all agreed was a case which related to a different state of matters. That being so, it appears to me that the issue which has been framed in this case is an issue which really is more favourable to the defenders than the issue which they would normally have were the case treated as one merely at common law; they have got such protection as the statute which prevails in Glasgow gives them. If they can succeed in bringing themselves within the words of justification which that statute enacts, then they will succeed.

[1] (1891) 18 R. 823.

The conclusion I have come to is that the Court of Session have taken a very convenient course in this case, a course in which, there being no challenge on the part of the pursuer as to the form of issue, I entirely agree; and I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed; and dismissed with costs.

Lord Kinnear.—I entirely agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, and I have nothing to add to what he has said.

Lord Dunedin.—I also agree with what has just been said by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. I think, perhaps, I had better add to what he has said that I think my noble and learned friend has used terms which are not perfectly familiar terms in Scotland; I mean "malice in law" and "malice in fact"; but which are exactly represented, in the cases which have turned upon these matters, by the distinction between cases where malice may properly be inferred from the mere wrongful act that is done, and cases where it is necessary in the Scotch phraseology to aver facts and circumstances out of which malice may be inferred; such a case, for instance, as the case of Beaton v. Ivory.[1] In other words, to use the words of my noble and learned friend, in Beaton v. Ivory[1] there could not be a relevant case against the sheriff unless the Court were able to infer malice in fact, which they were not able to do.

The common law upon the question that we have been here dealing with seems to me plain beyond all question. The first point is that in a case of this sort you are bound to take the averments of the pursuer alone, and not the defence which is made by the defender. That was laid down in this House by Lord Chelmsford, L.C., in the case of Pringle v. Bremner & Stirling.[2] Taking that, in this case we find that there are no circumstances according to the pursuer which justify the arrest at all; and, when that is so, I think it is absolutely clear upon the authorities that all that was necessary for the pursuer to put in issue were the words "wrongfully and illegally" without anything more, leaving any question of privileged situation to be dealt with by the learned judge at the trial. The only case that has been quoted against that is the case of Young,[3] and I am perfectly satisfied that in Young's[3] case the admission of the words "maliciously and without probable cause" in that issue was due to the concession of the counsel concerned, and not consequent upon the matter being argued. There have been countless cases since, not only cases in the books but cases in which one may invoke one's own personal knowledge of pro-

[1] (1887) 14 R. 1057.
[2] (1867) 5 Macph. (H. L.) 55.
[3] 18 R. 823.

April 3, 1914.

Shields v. Shearer.

Ld. Dunedin.

cedure, where the pursuer has made averments as here, and the issue was "wrongfully and illegally," and that alone.

Then we come to the question, Does the Glasgow Police Act, which says that constables are to be allowed to arrest if they have reasonable grounds of suspicion, make any difference? Upon that clause the appellants here argued that it meant that a constable was allowed to arrest if he said he suspected, and that the mere fact that he said he suspected absolutely closed the question. I should be sorry indeed to suppose that the liberties of the subject in Glasgow have been so interfered with as they would have been if an Act of Parliament had been passed with the meaning the appellants put upon it. Upon that point I will only say that I entirely agree with that portion of Lord Salvesen's judgment which deals with that matter.

That being so, the only question that remains is whether it was advisable in this case to alter the old form of issue, and to put in the particular words of the statute. I agree with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack in thinking that the course adopted has been quite convenient. I would like to say this, that upon the question of the mere form of the issue—which is merely what is a convenient way of trying the case—I should think your Lordships' House would be slow indeed to interfere with the learned judges of the Court of Session, unless you were thoroughly convinced that what they had done would, in some way or other, lead to a result which would not be in accordance with justice in the interests of either the pursuer or the defender.

I agree in the motion that has been made.

Lord Atkinson.—I concur. I have some hesitation in expressing any opinion on a matter of Scotch pleading and practice, but it certainly would appear to me that the issue as framed is more favourable to the defenders than they are entitled to. I think human liberty is such a valuable thing in this country—as in Scotland—that a person who invades it by arresting an individual must justify his action in that respect. The Solicitor-General for Scotland was extremely candid in stating that his quarrel with this issue was that it was not so framed as to place upon the pursuer the burden of proving affirmatively that the act of the constable was done with ill will. I do not think there is any principle of law which would throw that burden upon the pursuer, and I am very happy to say that it is so. I do not think any case was cited before your Lordships which would justify your coming to any such conclusion. I think that the issue as framed practically enables the parties to raise the defence based upon the Glasgow statute, and that there is no sound objection to it.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—I agree. In determining as to an issue the rule is elementary that the allegations of the pursuer must be taken as they stand. The case made is very simple. It is, as alleged, this—that the pursuer, being the lawful owner of a watch, was arrested for having it in his possession.

The power of arrest of a citizen in Glasgow does not appear to me to be in any way different from what it is in other places in Scotland. Very frequently no warrant is required. And of course there are certain protections afforded. In addition to the ordinary rules of the common law, the Glasgow police statute bears upon the subject. I desire, since the case has reached this House, to say that I adopt entirely what I consider, if I may say so, to be the excellent summary of the position given by the learned sheriff-substitute. He says: "By virtue of section 88 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, a police constable has power to arrest without a warrant any person whom he may reasonably suspect of having committed a crime. But it rests upon the constable to prove that his suspicion was reasonable, and his act therefore justifiable. It may quite well be that the defenders here will be able to establish at the proof that the pursuer brought his arrest upon himself by his own furtive and suspicious behaviour, by his giving confused and contradictory accounts of how the watch came into his possession, and the like. If that be so the defenders were doing no more than their duty in arresting him."

I had great difficulty in understanding what it really was that the appellants desired. After a brief argument it was admitted that the pursuer's averments did contain issuable matter. It turned out ultimately that the appellants wished to put into this issue the word "maliciously." The form of the issue is this: "Whether on or about 14th October 1912 the defenders wrongfully and illegally, and without reasonable ground of suspicion, apprehended the pursuer." To this hour I do not understand what "maliciously" would add to that. For if a constable has arrested a citizen without reasonable grounds even of suspicion against him, the law would demand no further proof of malice. With regard to actions of slander it has long been established that malice is implied by the reckless use of words without any consideration whether they were true or not. And with regard to false or improper apprehension or imprisonment the law is also elementary that malice is implied from recklessness whether the citizen arrested is innocent or not. Accordingly, when the statute in Glasgow says that it is no defence unless there is reasonable ground for suspicion, it appears to me that the Act simply lays down in so many terms—in broad and popular terms—what might have been put in the old legal form by the words "maliciously and without probable cause."

The difficulty in this case is said to have arisen from one sentence in Lord Salvesen's opinion. I think it right to call attention to that because it ought to be said, in justice to the learned judge, that that sentence has been misconstrued. No doubt he did say (1913 S. C., at p. 1017) that "the constable who arrests a person without a warrant takes the risk of justifying the apprehension." The learned Solicitor-General for Scotland argued that that must mean that the onus was upon the constable; but the learned judge in the succeeding sentence shows that that is not so. For he cites the statute and he says: "The presumption is that the officer acts in pursuance of his duty, and the pursuer must rebut the presumption"; and he concludes his judgment by saying this, in which I entirely agree: "It is obvious that the pursuer cannot succeed unless he convinces the jury that the defenders had no reasonable cause to suspect him of the crime charged; and it is desirable that officers of the law should as far as possible be protected in the discharge of their duty by the grounds of liability being pointedly brought under the notice of the jury." It humbly appears to me that those sentences of Lord Salvesen make clear where the onus lies, namely, that it rests upon the pursuer.

April 3, 1914.

Shields v. Shearer.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

A word with regard to the form of issue. My noble and learned friend has referred to the practice. I am aware that the general or at least frequent practice is that the insertion of the words "wrongfully and illegally" in the issue as presented to the jury is enough. When the pursuer's averments do not show that the defender was in any position of privilege, this is necessarily so. When thereafter, and in the course of the trial, privilege is disclosed and determined by the judge, the judge then charges the jury that they must further be satisfied that the action was done maliciously and without probable cause. In these cases, therefore, before the jury come to determine their verdict their duty is to consider the black type with "wrongfully and illegally" and to remember (if they can) the judge's charge that they must also find further that the act was done maliciously or maliciously and without probable cause. This course is ex necessitate inexact and might conceivably produce mishap if the jury omitted to recall the judge's charge. But what the learned judges of the Second Division have done in this case seems to me to be eminently fair to both parties,—a good reason for preserving this issue, which is not the subject of any cross-appeal. They have in point of fact taken this statute, which it is admitted covers the position of the defenders, and put in the forefront of the issue, and before the faces of the jury, the actual and complete thing which must be affirmatively established. I think that nothing could more clearly direct the minds of the jury to the true point. I accordingly approve of the issue as it has been put. I think it a model form.

ORDERED that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed and that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

HERBERT Z. DEANE—J. FERGUSON REEKIE, S.S.C.—MARTIN & CO.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.

No. 4.

April 22, 1914.

Marquis of Linlithgow v. North British Railway Co.

THE MARQUIS OF LINLITHGOW AND YOUNG'S PARAFFIN LIGHT AND MINERAL OIL COMPANY, LIMITED, (Pursuers) Appellants.—Clyde, K.C.—Hon. Wm. Watson, K.C.

THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, (Defenders) Respondents.—Sir Robert B. Finlay, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.—A. T. Lawrence.

Compulsory powers—Canal—Right of support—Mines and minerals—Oil shale—Mineral owner empowered to work minerals provided canal not injured—Canal company empowered to stop dangerous working on payment of compensation—Constitution of notice to "stop working."

Section 112 of a private Act of 1817, under which a company acquired lands for the construction of a canal, reserved to the vendors the mines and minerals lying within or under such lands, and permitted them to work the minerals subject to an obligation not to injure the canal. Section 113 empowered the company, in case they should find it necessary for the safety of the canal, "to stop the working" of the minerals on making satisfaction for their value to the owners.

The company having informed the representative of the vendor of certain lands through which the canal had been constructed that they would hold him responsible for any damage caused by his working a seam of oil shale, subjacent and adjacent to the canal within the lands in question, the representative of the vendor brought an action against the company in which he claimed the value of this shale on the grounds that it was a "mineral" reserved to him under section 112, and that the company's intimation was an intimation "to stop the working" within the meaning of section 113.

April 22, 1914.

Marquis of Linlithgow v. North British Railway Co.

The First Division of the Court of Session assoilzied the defenders, the ground of judgment being that the pursuer was not the owner of the seam in question, in respect that shale was not, at the date when the company acquired the land, regarded as a mineral, and consequently was not reserved to the vendor.

On an appeal to the House of Lords their Lordships—without expressing any opinion upon the question whether shale was a mineral and so was reserved to the vendor—affirmed the decision of the First Division assoilzieing the defenders, the ground of their Lordships' judgment being that sections 112 and 113 were independent sections, and that the company had not exercised the right of "stopping the working" of the shale conferred on them by section 113, but had merely intimated that they held the pursuer bound by the obligation not to injure the canal imposed on him by section 112.

(In the Court of Session, 11th June 1912—1912 S. C. 1327.)

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords, and a cross-appeal was also taken by the defenders against a portion of the interlocutor of the First Division.

The case was heard on 9th, 10th, 12th, 23rd, and 24th March 1914.

Ld. Chancellor (Haldane). Ld. Kinnear. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. Ld. Parker of Waddington.

On 22nd April 1914 their Lordships pronounced judgment, when opinions were delivered by the Lord Chancellor (Haldane), Lord Kinnear, Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, and Lord Parker of Waddington. In their opinions their Lordships examined at length the provisions of the Union Canal Act, 1817 (57 Geo. III. cap lvi.)—which governed the disposition under which the Canal Company acquired the lands for the canal—and in particular the provisions of sections 112 and 113 thereof. They also considered the communications and correspondence which had passed between the pursuers and the defenders in relation to the seam of oil shale in question. The conclusions at which their Lordships arrived were that sections 112 and 113 were independent sections, section 112 reserving to the vendors of lands the minerals under the lands disponed with a right to work them, but imposing an obligation to do no injury to the canal; section 113 conferring on the Canal Company an independent option to stop at their discretion any workings under or near to the canal which in their opinion might threaten damage, but imposing an obligation to pay for the value of minerals the working of which was so stopped. Their Lordships were of opinion that, in the communications which had passed between the parties, the defenders had not exercised the option conferred by section 113, but had merely indicated that they held the pursuers to the obligation not to injure the canal imposed on them by section 112, and that accordingly the pursuers' claim for compensation failed. Their Lordships expressly declined to pronounce any judgment upon the question with which the opinions of the Judges of the First Division had been chiefly concerned, viz., whether oil shale was a "mineral" within the meaning of the Act of 1817.

April 22, 1914.

Marquis of Linlithgow v. North British Railway Co.

ORDERED that the interlocutors complained of in the original appeal be affirmed except so far as they assoilzie the defenders from the first conclusion of the summons and so far as they refer to expenses: Ordered that the said first conclusion do stand dismissed as unnecessary, no judgment being pronounced in this House on the subject of whether the seams of shale or oil shale were embraced within the term "mines and minerals," as used in the Act 57 Geo. III. cap. lvi.: Ordered further that the said cross-appeal be dismissed, and that the appellants in the original appeal do pay to the respondents in the original appeal their costs in the Court of Session and also the costs in the House of Lords in respect of the original and cross-appeals.

GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—HOPE, SIMSON, & LENNOX, W.S.—JOHN KENNEDY, W.S.—JAMES WATSON, S.S.C.

No. 5.

April 28, 1914.

Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited.

JAMES SMITH, (Pursuer) Appellant.—Lord-Adv. Munro—Hon. A. Shaw.

THE FIFE COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, (Defenders) Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—H. W. Beveridge.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Breach of rule—Miner doing shot-firer's work contrary to rule.

The use of explosives in a mine was regulated by statutory rules, which provided that every charge should be fired by a specially appointed shot-firer, and that, where the firing was done by electricity, it was the duty of the shot-firer himself to connect the charge with the cable, and thereafter to connect the cable with the firing apparatus, after seeing that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter.

A duly appointed shot-firer was in the habit of getting the miners to connect the charges with the cable, and on one occasion he handed the cable to a miner for the purpose of having it so connected, and, without waiting till this had been done and without ascertaining that all persons in the vicinity had taken shelter, coupled the cable to the firing apparatus. He then fired the shot, and the miner, who had attached the cable to the charge and had not had time to retire to a place of safety, was seriously and permanently disabled by the explosion.

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the accident arose out of and in the course of the miner's employment, in respect that the accident was really due to the premature firing of the charge by the shot-firer, and could not be attributed to the miner having arrogated to himself a duty which he was neither engaged nor entitled to perform.

Kerr v. William Baird & Co., 1911 S. C. 701, distinguished.

Ld. Kinnear. Ld. Dunedin. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. Lord Parmoor.

(IN the Court of Session, 21st February, 1913—1913 S. C. 662.)

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 30th March, 1914.*

* The following cases, which were not referred to in the argument in the Court of Session, were cited in the House of Lords:—Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills Co., [1914] A. C. 62; Whitehead v. Reader, [1901] 2 K. B. 48.

At delivering judgment on 28th April 1914,— April 28, 1914.

LORD DUNEDIN.—The facts as found by the arbitrator out of which this case arises are as follows. The appellant was a miner in the employment of the respondents. He worked at a working-face where from time to time blasting by means of a shot was necessary. On these occasions the proper procedure is as follows: The miner bores a hole, puts into it a detonator which is handed to him by the shot-firer—a duly appointed official—and stems or packs the detonator in the hole. The shot-firer then connects a cable with the detonator wire, which has been left protruding from the stemmed hole. Then proceeding to the other end of the cable, which is at least twenty yards in length, he couples the cable to an electric battery, and then, after seeing that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter, he fires the shot by turning the handle of the electric apparatus.

What actually happened was this. The shot-firer, a man named Howard, in contravention of the regulations permitted the appellant to connect the detonator wire with the cable. Thereafter, while the appellant was in the act of retiring from the face, Howard, deceived by a voice calling out "Right; fire away," which voice was the voice of another man and not of the appellant, and without ocularly satisfying himself that the appellant was in safety, fired the shot. The result was that the appellant, who had not yet reached a place of safety, was severely injured.

In the circumstances the arbitrator found that the appellant had been injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. An appeal was taken, and the learned judges of the Second Division recalled the finding of the arbitrator.

I do not think it necessary to make any remarks of a general character upon the phrase in the statute "arising out of the employment," because I did so, with the approval of other members of your Lordships' House, in the very recent case of Plumb,[1] and I do not wish to repeat what I then said. Nor do I think that there was any divergence of opinion in the judgments of the learned judges in this case from the law as then laid down. Taking the phrase as a test and not as a definition, it may, I think, be conceded that, if the accident was due to the man arrogating to himself duties which he was not called on to perform and which he had no right to perform, then he was acting out of the sphere of his employment, and the injury by accident did not arise out of his employment. The sole question is, Was this so in this case? or, in other words, What is the true view of the facts?

I regret that I cannot come to the same conclusion as that come to by the learned judges.

I think I can best make my view clear by taking the case of Kerr v. William Baird & Co.,[2] and contrasting it with this. In that case the miner arranged a shot and fired it entirely by himself—I mean without the presence or help of the shot-firer at any stage of the proceeding. It

[1] [1914] A. C. 62. [2] 1911 S. C. 701.

April 28, 1914.

Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited.

Ld. Dunedin.

was held rightly that the accident was due to the action of the man, and that such action consisted in taking upon himself duties which he had no right to perform. Here, on the contrary, the miner did not arrange and fire the shot. One part of the composite action was his duty—to insert and stem the detonator—and that he did. The next step—the connecting of the detonator wire with the cable—he had no business to do, and in doing it he did something which was not in the sphere of his employment. But two more stages are necessary before we arrive at the explosion which causes the injury and forms the accident, namely, the connecting of the cable to the battery and the putting the battery into efficient action by the turning of the handle, and both these stages are done by the shot-firer. In the circumstances I cannot bring myself to see that the efficient cause of the accident was connected with the arrogation of unauthorized duty by the miner.

It is true that no explosion could have taken place unless the cable had been connected with the detonator. But that is only a remote cause sine qua non, and one in which the relation of the appellant to the act as distinguished from any other person is immaterial.

It seems to me that the question of fact which has to be answered is this: Did the injury to the appellant arise out of the illicit and unauthorized action of the appellant? The answer to that, it seems to me, so far as the action of the appellant consisted in coupling the wire, is No. The injury arose from the premature explosion, and that premature explosion was caused by the action of the shot-firer.

The learned counsel for the respondents felt this difficulty, and urged strenuously that the injury by the explosion to the appellant was really due to his, so to speak, lingering in the place of danger, and that this lingering was due to the fact that he had taken upon himself the duty of connecting the wire to the cable. If he were right on the facts I think his argument would be sound. But the facts as found by the arbitrator are, in my judgment, against him. The workman was, I think, under the regulation, quite entitled to stay in the vicinity of his working place till he was cleared out by the action of the shot-firer. As it was, he was in the act of leaving—an act which could only have been protracted for a few seconds by the connecting of the cable—and the whole mischief was caused by the premature action of the shot-firer.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the view of the facts taken by the arbitrator was correct, and that his finding should be restored.

LORD ATKINSON.—I agree.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—I concur. I have had the satisfaction of perusing the judgment which has just been read by my noble and learned friend Lord Dunedin and it exactly expresses my own view.

LORD PARMOOR.—In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator has found that the appellant is entitled to compensation in respect of injury resulting from an accident arising out of and in course of his employment with the respondents. The Second Division of the Court of Session, upon a stated case, has negatived the appellant's right to hold the award of the arbitrator. The question of law for decision is whether there was evidence before the arbitrator upon which it could be competently found that the appellant sustained an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. In answering this question it is necessary, in the first place, to ascertain what are the facts as stated or found by the arbitrator; and, in the second place, to determine whether to the facts so stated or so found the arbitrator has rightly applied the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The appellant was a miner in the employment of the respondents who suffered serious and permanent injury from the firing of a shot in the mine. When it was intended to fire a shot in the mine, the appellant as part of his ordinary employment would bore, charge, and stem the hole. In the present case he further attached the cable to the charge. In so doing he clearly acted outside the sphere of his employment, and in direct contravention of an Order of February 22, 1910, made by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, under section 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1896. Under this Order a shot-firer had been properly appointed, whose duty it was to attach the cable to the charge, and to do so before coupling the cable to the firing apparatus. The shot-firer did not attach the cable to the charge and, before the cable was attached to the charge, it had been coupled to the firing apparatus. There is a further provision in the Order that the shot-firer before firing a shot shall see that all persons in the vicinity have taken proper shelter. In this instance the shot-firer heard a shout, "Right; fire away," which he thought came from the appellant, but which was in fact from a neighbouring miner and addressed to that miner's drawer who had informed him that a shot was to be fired in the vicinity. The shot was then fired. The appellant had not taken proper shelter and was seriously injured.

The arbitrator has found, on the evidence before him, that the cause of the accident was the connecting of the cable to the battery by the shot-firer before the cable was connected to the charge, and before seeing that all persons in the vicinity had taken proper shelter, and firing the shot without ascertaining that all persons in the vicinity had taken proper shelter, and that at the time when the shot was fired the appellant was entitled to be at his working place, and was proceeding to go to a place of safety.

The further consideration is, whether on this conclusion of fact it was competent for the arbitrator to award compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906; or, in other words, whether it was competent for the arbitrator to find that when the appellant suffered the injury on which he based his claim to compensation he was doing some act arising out of or in the course of his employment. It is not seriously denied that the accident happened in the course of the employment of the appellant as a miner by the respondents. The real argument urged on behalf of the respondents is that the accident did not arise out of the employment of the appellant as a miner. If, however, the finding of the arbitrator is accepted, that the appellant was injured from the firing of a shot while proceeding to a place of safety, it appears to be impossible to maintain that the accident which caused the injury did not arise out of the course of his employment as a miner, and no such argument was directly advanced.

April 28, 1914.

Smith v. Fife Coal Co., Limited.

Lord Parmoor.

The argument for the respondents, when closely considered, is in reality, based on a criticism of the finding of the arbitrator. It is said that the appellant in attaching the cable to the charge was doing something which he was never employed to do and which he was prohibited from doing at all. No doubt this is so, and if the accident had happened while the appellant was engaged in work outside the sphere of his employment, and which he was prohibited from doing at all, it would not have been competent for the arbitrator to award compensation either on principle or without contravening the authority of decided cases. The answer is that the arbitrator has negatived any such conclusion on the evidence before him, and that this finding was within his competence.

In my opinion the question of law should be answered in the affirmative and the appeal allowed.

LORD DUNEDIN.—My noble and learned friend Lord Kinnear desires me to say that he concurs in the judgment about to be pronounced.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed, and the award of the arbitrator restored, with costs.

WALKER, SON, & FIELD—D. R. TULLO, S.S.C.—BEVERIDGE, GREIG, & CO.—WALLACE & BEGG, W.S.

No. 6.

April 28, 1914.

Brown v. John Watson, Limited.

MRS MARGARET COYLE OR BROWN, (Pursuer) Appellant.—Moncrieff, K.C.—Keith.
JOHN WATSON, LIMITED, (Defenders) Respondents.—Lord-Adv. Munro—H. W. Beveridge.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Injury by "accident"—Pneumonia following upon chill—Wreck in mine involving withdrawal of workmen—Chill due to standing in a draught while waiting to be raised to the surface.

During the working time in a coal mine the miners in No. 2 pit, owing to a wreck in the shaft, were ordered to ascend to the surface by the shaft of No. 1 pit, which was the downcast shaft for the air current which ventilated the mine. The miners, who had been sweating at their work, were compelled to wait at a mid-landing for an hour and a half, exposed to the down draught of cold air, until the men from the lower levels, who usually ascended by this shaft, had been raised. On reaching the surface one of the miners, who had been exposed to the draught, complained of chill. On this chill pneumonia supervened, and resulted in the death of the miner.

In an application by his dependants for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the arbitrator awarded compensation.

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that there was evidence on which it could competently be found that the deceased's death was due to an "injury by accident"; and award of the arbitrator affirmed

Drylie v. Alloa Coal Company, Limited, 1913 S. C. 549, approved.

(In the Court of Session, 30th January 1913—1913 S. C. 593.)

The pursuer appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 30th and 31st March 1914.[1]

At delivering judgment on 28th April 1914,—

April 28, 1914.

Brown v. John Watson, Limited.

Ld. Kinnear. Ld. Dunedin. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. Lord Parmoor.

Lord Dunedin.—On the assumption that the case of Drylie[2] was well decided I am of opinion that this case is ruled by that. I cannot help thinking, on perusing the opinion of Lord Salvesen, that that learned judge really took the same view, although he did not wish to express a formal dissent from the views of the other members of the Second Division. It seems to me that here, as there, you have an accident interfering with the normal working of the mine; a consequential exposure of the workman to rigorous climatic conditions for a prolonged period, which exposure would not have been his fate but for the accident; and a finding in fact that the supervening illness was due to this prolonged exposure. There is no intervening circumstance, depending on some cause other than the accident, which occurs to break that chain of causation. I would illustrate what I mean by this by referring to the case of M'Luckie v. John Watson, Limited,[3] where the wetting which brought on the chill was not a necessary result of the accident, but was due to the workman's determination not to wait his turn for the cage, but to stand in water in order to get in front of his fellows.

As regards the case of Drylie,[2] I was a party to that judgment and I have seen no reason to alter the opinion I then formed. I have the satisfaction of knowing that those of your Lordships who have considered that case for the first time on this occasion have seen no reason to doubt that it was rightly decided.

Therefore I think that the present appeal should be allowed and the award of the arbitrator restored, and I move accordingly.

My noble and learned friend Lord Kinnear has asked me to state that he concurs in this opinion.

Lord Atkinson.—This case has been very ably argued. The difficulties raised by the contention put forward by the learned Lord Advocate on behalf of the respondents arise, I think, from his effort, upon one point at all events, to disintegrate, as it were, the compound but injurious

[1] In addition to the cases cited in the Court of Session reference was made to Dunham v. Clare, [1902] 2 K. B. 292; Brintons v. Turvey, [1905] A. C. 230; Ystradowen Colliery Co. v. Griffiths, [1909] 2 K. B. 533; Clover, Clayton, & Co. v. Hughes, [1910] A. C. 242; Warner v. Couchman, [1912] A. C. 35; Blakey v. Robson, Eckford, & Co., 1912 S. C. 334; Pugh v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Co., [1896] 2 Q. B. 248; Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas, (1888) 13 App. Cas. 222; Dulieu v. White, [1901] 2 K. B. 669; Cooper v. Caledonian Railway Co., [1902] 4 F. 880; Bell v. Great Northern Railway Co., (1890) 26 L. R. Ir. 428; Yates v. South Kirby Collieries, [1910] 2 K. B. 538; M'Luckie v. John Watson, Limited, 1913 S. C. 975; Eke v. Hart-Dyke, [1910] 2 K. B. 677; Fenton v. Thorley & Co., [1903] A. C. 443; Wicks v. Dowell & Co., [1905] 2 K. B. 225; Rodger v. Paisley School Board, 1912 S. C. 584; Manson v. Forth and Clyde Steamship Co., 1913 S. C. 921.

[2] 1913 S. C. 549.

[3] 1913 S. C. 975.

April 28, 1914.

Brown v. John Watson, Limited.

Ld. Atkinson.

effect upon a workman of the forces or agents into contact with which he may by an accident be brought, separating the immediate and primary effect from the ultimate effect and endeavouring to establish a sequence of causation between them. He contended that the accident, under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906, must, to entitle the injured workman or his dependants to compensation, be the proximate cause of the personal injury, and insisted that in the present case the chill sustained by John Brown, the deceased workman, was the proximate cause of his death by pneumonia, and that the accidental breakdown or wreckage of the machinery of the mine in No. 2 shaft, so far from being the proximate cause of this chill, was either a mere historical event unconnected with it, or, at least, if a cause of it at all, a very remote cause.

By way of illustration I put to him during the progress of his argument the following question: Suppose an employer is, during very cold weather in mid-winter, driving in his motor car with two servants in front—his chauffeur and another—and suppose that when crossing a bridge over a river a tyre bursts, the car skids and comes into collision with one of the battlements of the bridge with such force and violence that both servants are precipitated into the river below, the one being drowned and the other rescued, but rescued so tardily as to be thoroughly chilled, and that an attack of pneumonia is thereby induced of which disease he dies, would the dependants of the first man be entitled to compensation under section 1 of the Act of 1906? The learned Lord Advocate answered in the affirmative, that they would be so entitled. I then asked him, Would the dependants of the second servant be similarly entitled? and as I understood him, he answered, as indeed the necessities of the case obliged him to answer, in the negative. But can there be any real distinction between these two supposititious cases in relation to this statute?

The accident, or the chapter of accidents—the primary accident, the bursting of the tyre, the consequential accidents, the skidding of the car, the collision with the battlement of the bridge, and the precipitation into the river—are common to both cases. The element into contact with which the deceased servants were brought, the cold water, is the same. The injurious effect of this element upon them is different. It smothered the one. That was the injury in his case. It chilled the other so badly that disease supervened. That was the injury in his case. According to the contention of the Lord Advocate, as I understood it, the bursting of the tyre, though it was the primary accident which, through the agency of other accidents consequent upon it, brought about the prolonged exposure of the deceased to the action of the cold water, was not the proximate cause of death.

The principle upon which cases should be dealt with under the statute where death or incapacity is caused to a workman by a disease induced by an "injury by accident" is clearly laid down in the well-known anthrax case, Brintons v. Turvey.[1] Lord Halsbury is reported to have expressed himself thus[2]: "When some affection of our physical frame is in any way induced by an accident, we must be on our guard that we are not misled by medical phrases to alter the proper application of the phrase 'accident causing injury' because the injury inflicted by accident sets up a condition of things which medical men describe as disease. . . . It does not appear to me that by calling the consequences of an accidental injury a disease one alters the nature or the consequential results of the injury that has been inflicted." Lord Macnaghten said[1]: "Speaking for myself, I cannot doubt that the man's death was attributable to personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The accidental character of the injury is not, I think, removed or displaced by the fact that, like many other accidental injuries, it sets up a well-known disease which was immediately the cause of death, and would, no doubt, be certified as such in the usual death certificate." Lord Lindley said[2]: "In this case your Lordships have to deal with death resulting from disease caused by an injury which I am myself unable to describe more accurately than by calling it purely accidental."

[1] [1905] A. C. 230.

[2] Ibid., at p. 233.

In the present case there were two shafts to the respondents' mine, the downcast shaft No. 1 and the upcast shaft No. 2. The current of air which ventilated the mine passed down the former shaft.

The deceased workman, John Brown, started to work in the mine at 7 A.M. on the morning of 26th June 1911, at a place which was dry, with a good current of air passing through it. Brown and his mates were sweating as they worked, their clothes were somewhat wet from this, not from any other cause. Some breakdown of the machinery connected with shaft No. 2 took place. Brown and his companions were ordered, owing to this, to ascend to the surface, and while proceeding to No. 2 shaft to ascend in the ordinary and accustomed way, they were directed to ascend by No. 1 shaft instead. They attempted to do so, but were checked at the mid-landing for the very prolonged and entirely abnormal period of one and a half hours during which the down current of cold air was playing upon them. Brown, the deceased, was badly chilled by this prolonged and abnormal exposure. Pneumonia was thereby induced, and from this disease he died. The immediate cause of the delay was this, that the men from the lower workings who were usually raised to the surface by shaft No. 1 had not been raised, and Brown and his companions were detained till these lower workers were raised. Thus Brown and his companions were, owing to the accidental breakdown of the machinery in No. 2 shaft, placed by the orders of their master in a position where they were, through the accident of the prolonged and abnormal delay, exposed to the action of the current of air while they waited. That exposure was not expected, intended, or designed apparently either by the employer or workmen. It was one of the consequential accidents arising from the primary accident, the breakdown of the machinery, just as the prolonged immersion in the river of the servant who was rescued was, in the supposititious case I have mentioned, one of the consequential accidents of the bursting of the tyre of the motor car. This

[1] [1905] A. C., at p. 234.

[2] Ibid., at p. 238.

April 28, 1914.

Brown v. John Watson, Limited.

Ld. Atkinson.

accidental but prolonged exposure was the cause of the "injury," the chill. The pneumonia was only the disease brought on by that injury.

I do not think this case can be distinguished on any solid ground from the case of Drylie v. The Alloa Coal Company.[1] There, owing to the breakdown of a pump, the water in a mine accumulated so that the workmen had to stop work. They went to the shaft to ascend and were kept waiting there for twenty minutes up to their knees in cold water, the cold air descending upon them. This abnormal exposure caused to the deceased a chill from which disease has set up. It would appear to me that the abnormal exposure to the action of the cold air and cold water in that case was on all fours with the abnormal exposure to the current of cold air in this case, and that the exposure in the latter case was quite as much an accident as in the former, and the chill quite as much an injury by accident in that case as in the former.

In my opinion therefore this appeal should be allowed with costs, and the question of law stated by the learned sheriff-substitute for the opinion of the Court should be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—This appeal arises out of an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. Sheriff-substitute Shennan, an experienced arbitrator, sets forth the facts in a stated case and says: "In these circumstances I found that the deceased, John Brown, died from the effects of injuries by accident received by him on 26th June, while in the course of his employment with the appellants, and awarded compensation."

In my opinion there is no ground for holding that the learned sheriff had in any respect misdirected himself in law; and the view that his finding was contrary to, or in no reasonable sense in accordance with, the facts proved appears to me to be equally unfounded.

One pit shaft in this mine was blocked by an admitted accident; a dislocation of the working arrangements ensued; the men had to be sent up by another shaft under circumstances which exposed them to severe chill; this chill in one unfortunate workman's case brought on pneumonia; and of that the workman died. It appears to me both legally and philosophically incorrect to say that this should not be treated as a chain of causation—with the accident at the one end as cause, and death at the other end as effect. Wherever a chain of causation is alleged to exist it is possible to say that it is broken at a certain point, and to attribute the effect to a fresh and intervening factor. The sheriff, as the judge of the facts, did not find that the chain of causation was broken in this way, and I see no ground for saying that he erred.

I am accordingly of opinion that the judgment of the Second Division which recalled the arbitrator's finding and award should be reversed.

It would be unnecessary to say more but for certain considerations, to which, out of respect for the learned judges of the Second Division, it appears to me proper to allude. In the first place, the judgments distinguish the present case from a decision by seven judges of the Court of

[1] 1913 S. C. 549.

Session in Scotland (Lord Salvesen dissenting) in the case of Drylie v. Alloa Coal Company.[1] In that case by an accumulation of water in a mine (caused by a breakdown in the pumps) the workmen were forced to stand knee deep in water; one of the men was in consequence seized with pneumonia; and he died. The Act was held to apply and an award of compensation was made. I think that this was right and that the judgment was sound.

Had it been necessary, I should for myself have said that the principle of the present case was concluded by that applied in Drylie.[1] The cold element in the one case was water and in the other air. But, as Lord Salvesen indicates very clearly, there does not appear to be any other real ground of distinction between the two cases. In this I respectfully agree. Indeed, I do not entirely understand why that learned judge, accepting the Drylie[1] decision and not distinguishing the two cases, did not tender his dissent from the present judgment. But the learned counsel for the respondents were within their rights in maintaining that the present judgment is unanimous.

Before passing from Drylie[1] I desire to remark upon a passage in the judgment of Lord Dundas. That learned judge is reported to have said, "The circumstance of Drylie finding himself immersed to the knees in icy cold water was abnormal; it, in its turn, was, as matter of fact, due to an abnormal cause—the stoppage of the pump while men were at work in the pit; and if the pneumonia of which he died was, in fact, caused by his immersion, I think the elements of an 'accident' are here present." I am aware that, in the present case, the views of Lord Dundas do not exactly equate with those just cited from that report. But these sentences do appear to me to give, if I may say so, such a clear statement of a chain of causation, connecting the whole with the statutory provision, that I should humbly have adopted them if Drylie[1] had directly reached this House.

For the reasons given, I think that the present case was ruled by the judgment in Drylie,[1] and the departure in the present case from its principles—for I am humbly of opinion that the two cases cannot stand together—makes the present appeal of importance, and that particularly in regard to one point.

The point appears most clearly from the opinion of Lord Salvesen, and it is this: that countenance appears to be given to the view that the compensatory provisions of the statute cannot be invoked unless injury be caused by "physical impact." This is, at this time of day, a most serious and, in my humble opinion, a most disturbing and erroneous proposition. I think Mr Moncrieff in his able address and citation of authority was right so to treat it.

Lord Salvesen elaborately argues and illustrates the point in Drylie.[1] It is fair to the learned judge to say that he indicates that in his view the pneumonia which supervened to the workman may have been causally attributable, not to the accidental exposure, but merely to neglect. But while this is so, the learned judge does appear to give some countenance to the idea that physical impact, or indeed direct lesion, is required

[1] 1913 S. C. 549.

April 28, 1914.

Brown v. John Watson, Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

in order to enable compensation to be given. He observes, for instance: "The only case decided in the House of Lords, so far as I am aware, where a death from a disease not preceded by some direct lesion was held to be a death resulting from injury by accident, is the well-known anthrax case.[1]" And in another passage he says: "In all such cases, if we are to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, it will be open for the arbitrator to find, if he were bold enough to attribute the disease to a particular exposure resulting from some accidental occurrence, that it was the result of an injury by accident within the meaning of the Act."

I pass by the form of the expression, "if he were bold enough to attribute," and take the learned judge to mean "if he found as a fact that" the disease arose from exposure, &c.

It must be observed that the statute itself in no way limits the causal connection between accident and disease to cases of physical impact, nor does it treat the connection itself as anything extraordinary. In the section dealing with industrial diseases (sec. 8 (9)) it provides that "nothing in this section shall affect the rights of a workman to recover compensation in respect of a disease to which this section does not apply if the disease is a personal injury by accident within the meaning of this Act."

In the second place, such a restriction, excluding all cases, however serious,—say of shock and the like—unless physical impact or lesion had occurred, has, in my opinion, no justification in the state of the authorities. The one case cited in its favour is Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas.[2] The case was decided by the Privy Council, and it is observable that the judgment of the Board was in form merely on the point of remoteness of damage. "Their Lordships . . . are of opinion that the first question, whether the damages are too remote, should have been answered in the affirmative, and on that ground, without saying that impact is necessary, that the judgment should have been for the defendants." But there undoubtedly are observations by Sir Richard Couch of a more definite character. For instance, the learned judge, deprecating the extension of liability, does say, "In every case where an accident caused by negligence had given a person a serious nervous shock there might be a claim for damages on account of mental injury," and he observes on the chance of a wide field for imaginary claims. In the present case and in Drylie[3] one may discern traces of similar views.

But in England, in Scotland, and in Ireland alike, the authority of Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas[2] has been questioned, and, to speak quite frankly, has been denied. I am humbly of opinion that the case can no longer be treated as a decision of guiding authority.

The subject was, if I may say so, examined with much erudition and care by the Lords Justices in Dulieu v. White,[4] and the Victorian case[2] was held not binding. I may be permitted respectfully to agree with the observations thereon of Kennedy, L.J., in his judgment. It may be added that these were in line with certain dicta of Lord Esher on the same topic in Pugh v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company.[5]

---

[1] Brintons, Limited, v. Turvey, [1905] A. C. 230
[2] 13 App. Cas. 222.
[3] 1913 S. C. 549.
[4] [1901] 2 K. B. 669.
[5] [1896] 2 Q. B. 248.

In Scotland that very learned Judge, Lord Stormonth-Darling, in Cooper v. Caledonian Railway Company,[1] stated broadly and emphatically that the Victorian Railway case[2] was no part of the law of Scotland. Probably, however, no better analysis of it has been made than by Palles, C.B., in the Irish case of Bell v. Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland,[3] and I desire to tender my respectful adhesion to and approval of that judgment. I should add that other cases were cited showing it to be fully established by authority—recent and strong authority—that physical impact or lesion is not a necessary element in the case of recovery of damage in ordinary cases of tort.

On principle, the distinction between cases of physical impact or lesion being necessary as a ground of liability for damage caused seems to have nothing in its favour—always on the footing that the causal connection between the injury and the occurrence is established. If compensation is to be recovered under the statute or at common law in respect of an occurrence which has caused dislocation of a limb, on what principle can it be denied if the same occurrence has caused unhinging of the mind? The personal injury in the latter case may be infinitely graver than in the former, and to what avail—in the incidence of justice, or the principle of law—is it to say that there is a distinction between things physical and mental? This is the broadest difference of all, and it carries with it no principle of legal distinction. Indeed it may be suggested that the proposition that injury so produced to the mind is unaccompanied by physical affection or change might itself be met by modern physiology or pathology with instant challenge.

The other case, of which the present is an example, is much narrower—a case of injury to the body, a physical injury, but a physical injury not caused by physical impact. On the point of the principle of liability, what is there to distinguish the case of a man who is drowned in a scuttled boat from that of another who is immersed and sustains a chill resulting in his death? Make the difference still narrower—as narrow, for instance, as between this case and Drylie.[4] The fatal pneumonia of one man is produced by his standing in cold water, and of a second by his standing in cold air. How the particular element which was the medium through which the producing cause operated towards the fatal result should have any legal effect in altering either the range or the canon of liability does not appear to my mind.

The truth is that the difference between all such cases is not one of principle. It is one of the things which becomes more notable as a point of difficulty in the practice of the law on the matter of proof. But whether the causal connection between occurrence and result be established, the principle to be applied is, as it ought to be, the same. The difficulty of establishing the causal connection may be, of course, much greater in the one case than in the other, and Courts of law are justified in demanding in all cases, and especially where external signs are wanting, that the relation of cause and effect be sufficiently established.

---

[1] (1902) 4 F. 880.
[2] 13 App. Cas. 222.
[3] 26 L. R. Ir. 428.
[4] 1913 S. C. 549.

April 28, 1914.

Brown v. John Watson, Limited.

If, however, it be established, then the liability in my humble judgment follows.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed with costs.

LORD PARMOOR.—This is an appeal against the decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland upon a case stated in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The arbitrator found that John Brown died from the effects of injuries by accident received by him on 26th June 1911 while in the employment of the respondents, and awarded compensation to the appellant.

The material facts are that between 8 and 9 o'clock on the morning of 26th June 1911, all the men in the pit where Brown was working were ordered to ascend to the surface in consequence of a wreck in the shaft. On their way they were met by an official, who told them to proceed by the communication road to the shaft of No. 1 pit. They had to wait at a mid-landing for about an hour and a half, until the men from the lower seam, who usually ascended by this shaft, had been raised. At the mid-landing, during the period of waiting, a strong current of air blew in on Brown and his fellow miners. When the men reached the surface Brown complained of feeling cold, and died from pneumonia due to the chill incurred while waiting at the mid-landing. Under these circumstances the arbitrator awarded compensation to the appellant; but the judges in the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland found that such award was not within the competency of the arbitrator.

It was not denied by counsel for the appellant that in order successfully to maintain a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, there must be an accident in the ordinary popular meaning of that term, and an injury attributable to such accident. The accident relied upon is the wreckage in the shaft, and the injury the chill from which Brown took pneumonia and died. The answer of the respondents is that the wreckage in the shaft should be considered merely as an historical incident in the narrative of the case, and as too remote a factor to which to attribute the injury, and that in any case the injury cannot fairly be attributed to the wreckage in the shaft.

I cannot assent to this argument on behalf of the respondents. The delay in the landing where the chill was caught appears to me to be clearly attributable to the wreckage in the shaft, and but for such wreckage it would not have occurred. The incidents are closely connected and cannot be treated as independent and detached factors. On the other hand, it is not questioned that the delay on the landing in a draught did cause the injury which resulted in Brown's death. There are both the necessary elements to maintain a claim, a definite accident and injury fairly attributable thereto. It is not material that the wreckage in the shaft did not result in physical impact causing physical injury, or that no one could have foreseen the delay on the landing, and the subsequent chill, as a probable or natural result of the wreckage in the shaft. Such considerations do not arise in a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The workman under the Act is as much entitled to compensation if death results from exposure consequent on and attributable to an accident as he would be if death had resulted from immediate physical injury.

A number of authorities were quoted by the counsel for the appellant. It is only necessary to refer to two of them. The case of Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas[1] was quoted as an authority for the doctrine that in ordinary accident cases some form of physical impact is a necessary element to found a claim for damage. The case does not appear to support this contention, nor do I think that any such contention could be supported. The following passage occurs in the judgment: "Their Lordships . . . are of opinion that the first question, whether the damages are too remote, should have been answered in the affirmative, and on that ground, without saying that impact is necessary, that the judgment should have been for the defendants."

The second case is Drylie v. Alloa Coal Company.[2] I am unable to distinguish that case from the present case. It cannot be material, for the purpose of a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, whether the chill resulted from exposure to a current of air or to cold water, so long as the exposure is attributable to the accident and has caused the injury on which the claim to compensation is founded.

In my opinion the appeal should be allowed, and the question of law stated by the arbitrator for the opinion of the Court should be answered in the affirmative.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed against reversed and award of the arbitrator restored, with costs.

DEACON & CO.—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—BEVERIDGE, GREIG, & CO.—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.

PETER WISHART, (Pursuer) Respondent.
GEORGE GIBSON & COMPANY, (Defenders) Appellants.—Macmillan, K.C.—Alex. Neilson.

No. 7.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Sched. (16)—Review of weekly payments—Date from which weekly payments may be ended or altered—Remedy of employer where workman charges for payment.

The employers of an injured workman, in terms of an award of an arbitrator, paid him compensation for total incapacity up to 24th September, at which date they ceased the payments, contending that his incapacity had ceased. On 4th November they presented an application for review of the compensation, asking that the payments should be terminated as at 24th September. The arbitrator found in fact that the workman had completely recovered his capacity at 24th September.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division) that the compensation fell to be terminated as at the date when the incapacity ceased, and not merely at the date of the application for review.

Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan, 1909 S. C. 1292, overruled.

Opinion (per Lord Atkinson) that the same principles would apply to an application to diminish or increase the weekly payments.

[1] 13 App. Cas. 222.

[2] 1913 S. C. 549.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Opinions reserved upon the question whether, if payments have de facto been made by an employer after the date of recovery, he can obtain repayment.

Observations, per Lord Shaw (concurred in by the Lord Chancellor), on the procedure to be adopted by an employer, who maintains that the workman has recovered and ceases the weekly payments, if the workman charges for payment.

Ld. Chancellor (Haldane).
Ld. Atkinson.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.
Ld. Parker of Waddington.
Lord Sumner.
Lord Parmoor.

(IN the Court of Session, 28th June 1913.)

George Gibson & Company, shipowners, Leith, applied to the arbitrator (Sheriff-substitute Guy) for review of the weekly payments of compensation payable by them in terms of an award of the arbitrator to Peter Wishart under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and, being dissatisfied with his award on the application, obtained a stated case for appeal.

The case set forth, inter alia:—

". . . The respondent on 11th May 1912 applied for an award of compensation against the appellants under the said Act at the rate of 14s. per week as from 23rd April 1912, in respect of injuries sustained by him on said last-mentioned date by accident to his right hand, arising out of and in the course of his employment with the appellants as a dock labourer. On 5th August 1912 I issued my award, in which I found that the respondent was then totally incapacitated, and found him entitled to compensation at the rate of 14s. per week from and after 23rd April 1912. The appellants paid the respondent compensation in terms of said award up to 24th September 1912. On 4th November 1912 the appellants presented an application for review of the compensation payable to the respondent, and craved me to end the compensation as at 24th September 1912, or diminish the same, or to do otherwise in the premises as might seem proper. They, inter alia, averred that the respondent had, since 24th September 1912, completely recovered from his said accident, and was working in England, and earning the ordinary rate of wages there. The respondent averred in his defences that he was at the date of his defences (18th November 1912) still incapacitated as the result of said accident, and was only earning 23s. per week, which was all that he was able to earn in consequence of his injuries. At the diet of proof on 24th December 1912 the respondent's counsel stated at the bar that he consented to the compensation being ended as at 4th November 1912. The appellants thereafter led evidence. The respondent led no evidence, did not cross-examine the appellants' witnesses, and took no part in the proof. . . .

"I found as a fact that on 24th September 1912 the respondent had recovered complete capacity for work.

"In these circumstances I ended the compensation payable by the appellants to the respondent under the award dated 5th August 1912, as at said 4th November 1912, the date of the presentation of this application for review, and I found the respondent liable to the appellants in expenses. I would have ended the compensation as at said 24th September 1912 had it been competent for me in this application to do so; but I held that it was not competent for me to do so, in respect that by doing so I would be disturbing a decree of Court as at a date when there was no proper application to enable this to be done."

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

The questions of law were—"(1) Was it competent for me to end the respondent's compensation at 24th September 1912? (2) Ought I to have ended the compensation at that date?"

On 28th June 1913 their Lordships of the Second Division (Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) answered the first question of law in the negative, stating in their opinions that they considered that the case was ruled by the decision of a Court of seven Judges in Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan, 1909 S. C. 1292, which they were bound to follow.

George Gibson & Company appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 21st April 1914.

Argued for the appellants;—The appeal was in effect an appeal from Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan[1] by which the Second Division were bound. It was there decided that the earliest date at which the arbitrator could terminate the compensation was the date of the application for review. That decision was both inequitable and illogical. It was inequitable because in an application such as the present it would necessarily often result in the employer having to pay compensation in respect of a period during which the workman had recovered his capacity, or, where the application was at the instance of a workman seeking an increase, in preventing his obtaining increased compensation for a period in respect of which he might be justly entitled to an increase. It was illogical, because, if review could not act retrospectively, the logical date must be the date of the award,[2] while, if it could act retrospectively, the logical date must be the alteration in the workman's condition. The date of the application for review was a purely arbitrary and meaningless date to select. Further, the decision in Donaldson[1] was inconsistent with the scheme and language of the Act,[3] which provided for payment of compensation only during incapacity, a provision which clearly involved the result that the date at which an arbitrator was to terminate compensation was the date of the workman's recovery, and the date from which he was to increase compensation was the date at which the workman's incapacity became increased. There was nothing in the language of paragraph 16 of the First Schedule inconsistent with this view. The words "on such review" did not mean at the date of the review, but in the course of the proceedings for review. Paragraph 9 of the Second Schedule, which provided for the recording of a memorandum of the award or agreement fixing the compensation, provided (with regard to proceedings in England) that "thereupon the memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a county court judgment," but it did not provide that it should for all purposes be equivalent to such a judgment, and it was upon a misapprehension of this provision that the Scottish decisions had proceeded. Further it was not necessary that there should be a formulated dispute as to the workman's incapacity in order to entitle the employer to apply for a review, and in any case the cesser of the weekly payment was sufficient evidence of a disupte.[4] Although the precise point had

---

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

[2] Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co., (1902) 5 F. 244.

[3] E.g., First Schedule, (1) (b).

[4] Tyne Tees Shipping Co. v. Whitlock, (1913) 6 Butterworth's W. C. C. 559.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

never actually arisen for decision in England opinions favourable to the appellants' contention had been expressed by the judges in several cases.[1]

There was no appearance for the respondent.

At delivering judgment on 14th May 1914,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—[In the Lord Chancellor's absence his opinion was read by Lord Atkinson]—The main facts out of which the question to be decided in this appeal arises may be stated briefly.

On 23rd April 1912 the respondent, who was a dock labourer in the employment of the appellants, sustained an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. On 5th August the Sheriff-substitute made an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, under which he decided that the respondent was totally incapacitated, and was entitled to compensation at the rate of 14s. a week from and after the date of the injury. The appellants paid this compensation up to 24th September 1912, but after that date they paid nothing. On 4th November they applied under the First Schedule to the statute for review of this compensation, and asked that it might be ended as from 24th September, on the ground that the respondent had then completely recovered, and had since been earning wages at the ordinary rate. The Sheriff-substitute found that this was so, and ordered the compensation to end as from 4th November, the date of the application for review. He stated that he would have ordered it to end as from 24th September had it been competent for him to do so, but that he considered that the law did not enable him to disturb a decree of the Court as at a date when there was no application to enable this to be done. The question is whether this decision was right.

The answer to this question must depend on the proper interpretation of the terms in which the Act of Parliament has set up the jurisdiction, a jurisdiction which is new and is the creature of the statute.

The learned judges of the Second Division were of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute, who stated the question of law for their decision, had no power to end the compensation as from a date antecedent to the application for review. They agreed with the Sheriff-substitute in thinking that the point had been disposed of by a case which bound them, Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan.[2] In that case the First Division, with three consulted judges of the Second Division, construed the statute as meaning that it was not competent to end compensation at a date antecedent to that of the application for review notwithstanding that it was proved that incapacity had ceased at an earlier date. They held that the proper date of ending was that of the presentation of the application to review. The basis of their decision was, in the words (at p. 1298) of the Lord President (Lord Dunedin), that "when compensation is once fixed, the only way to alter

[1] Morton & Co. v. Woodward, [1902] 2 K. B. 276; Upper Forest and Western Steel and Tinplate Co. v. Thomas, [1909] 2 K. B. 631; Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Co. v. Boots, [1909] 2 K. B. 640; Hosegood & Sons v. Wilson, [1911] 1 K. B. 30.

[2] 1909 S. C. 1292.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Chancellor.

it is that provided by the statute, an application to vary." Lord Dunedin went on to indicate that he differed from the view which had been suggested in certain decisions of the Court of Appeal in England. The Master of the Rolls (Lord Collins) said in Morton & Company v. Woodward[1] that "the scheme of the Act is that compensation is to be given during the period of incapacity—that is, incapacity of the workman to earn his wages. Therefore, when a dispute arose as to the man's incapacity for work, the essential question was his condition, not when the Court was able to give its attention to the matter, but when the dispute was formulated as to whether the man's incapacity had ceased or not." This view received varying degrees of countenance from the Judges of the Court of Appeal in Upper Forest and Western Steel and Tinplate Company v. Thomas,[2] Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Company v. Boots,[3] and Hosegood & Sons v. Wilson.[4]

The language of the statute on which depends the solution of this conflict between these judicial opinions leaves a good deal to be desired in point of precision. But after some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that the interpretation placed on it by the appellants is the true one. Paragraph 1 of the First Schedule provides that the amount of compensation, where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, is to be a weekly payment during the incapacity. The jurisdiction to award the weekly compensation is thus limited to the period of the incapacity. The arbitrator is to decide that there is incapacity, but he cannot make an award which will carry the compensation beyond that period. By paragraph 14 the workman receiving weekly payments is to submit himself, if so required, from time to time to examination by a doctor provided by the employer. By paragraph 15, if as the result an agreement is not reached as to the workman's condition, the question may be referred by the officer of the Court to a medical referee, whose certificate is to be conclusive. Paragraph 16 contains words which, taken by themselves, are ambiguous. It provides that "any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased." At first sight these words suggest that the right to payment up to the date of the review being a right arising from the previous finding, that finding and the title arising under it can only be got rid of by a second finding, that effecting the review, and only as from the date of the second finding and not retrospectively. But I do not, on consideration, think that this construction is consistent with the provision to which I have already referred, limiting the compensation to the period of incapacity. If on the review it is decided that payment of compensation ought to cease, on the ground that the workman, in fact, ceased to be incapable at a date previous to the application, I do not see how, this being a judicial review of the state of health subsequent to the previous decision, and the result of that decision having been limited to the period of incapacity, the workman can claim that payments should be made to him after he must be taken to have

[1] [1902] 2 K. B. 276, at p. 280.
[2] [1909] 2 K. B. 631.
[3] [1909] 2 K. B. 640.
[4] [1911] 1 K. B. 30.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Chancellor.

ceased to be incapable. What is brought under review is the continuance and duration of the incapacity.

In the case before us no question arises as to repayment to the appellants of money obtained from them after the incapacity ceased. In point of fact they paid nothing after 24th September. Had they paid, and were they now seeking to recover the money, another question would arise upon which I express no opinon. The weekly payments would have been made under a decree which was on the face of it valid, and which was not reviewed in any proceeding in the nature of an appeal, but stood until its effect was terminated by the exercise of a subsequent and original jurisdiction. It may be that what had been paid under the first decree could not have been recovered. As to this I say nothing, for no such point arises. The only question is whether the words in the schedule to which I have referred enabled the Sheriff-substitute to pronounce that the incapacity had ended before the application to review, in this case on 24th September. I think that they did. The alternative construction would allow the workman to claim payment notwithstanding that incapacity had ceased. I think the intention of the Act is to give compensation only during incapacity. If it has ceased, and the employer has not availed himself of his right to apply for review, it may be, as I have already said, that he cannot recover what he has paid while the first decree remained uninterrupted in its operation. But that would not involve the further conclusion that the judicial authority was precluded from subsequently determining the real date when the incapacity, during which alone the first decree could properly continue to operate undisturbed, had come to an end. It appears to me that the words "on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased" must, having regard to the provisions of paragraph 1 of the Schedule, be read as enabling a review to be made retrospectively. No doubt such a review is not in the nature of an appeal or a rehearing. Its character is, as I have already said, rather that of an original application. But I see no reason why the words should be read without reference to their context in the earlier provisions of the Schedule, and I think that so read they import the construction I have indicated.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

There is one further observation which I wish to make. There are differences between the procedure in Scotland and the procedure in this country which the statute recognises and provides for. I have had the advantage of reading the judgment of my noble and learned friend Lord Shaw, and I concur in the suggestion made at the end of that judgment as to the practical method of conforming to the requirements of Scottish procedure. It is important that on a point like this we should not introduce confusion about well-settled principles.

Lord Atkinson.—This case came before the Court of Session on a case stated by the Sheriff-substitute. The respondent was, by an award of the arbitrator dated 5th August 1912, awarded compensation, fixed at 14s. per week, from the date of the injury he had sustained, under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906, in respect of his total incapacity due to an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. This award has not been printed in the case, but it is clear from the provisions of the 1st section of the statute, coupled with those of paragraph 1, head (b), of the First Schedule annexed to the Act, that the arbitrator, the Sheriff-substitute in this case, had only jurisdiction to direct the weekly payments to be made during the respondent's incapacity. It must therefore be assumed, at least in the absence of the order, that it was in conformity with these enactments, and was expressly or impliedly qualified so as not to be ultra vires.

On 4th November 1912, the appellants presented an application for the review of those weekly payments under the provisions of the 16th paragraph of the First Schedule. In that application they averred, as a fact, that the respondent had by 24th September 1912 completely recovered from the effect of the accident, and had since that date been working in England and earning the ordinary rate of wages there. They, accordingly, claimed that the weekly payment should for these reasons be ended as from that date. The appellants had refused to make, and did not make, any weekly payments to the respondent after 24th September 1912. So that the question of the right of an employer to recover back from a workman weekly payments made after incapacity had in fact ended, but before review, does not arise in this case at all. Whenever it does arise much may turn on the special facts of the case in which it arises, and I therefore advisedly abstain from expressing any opinion upon a point which is not raised, and could not be raised in this case, and has necessarily not been argued. The Sheriff-substitute has found as a fact that on 24th September 1912 the respondent had recovered complete capacity for work. He states that he ended the compensation as at 4th November 1912, the date at which the appellants presented their application for review, but that he would have ended it on 24th September 1912 had he considered it was competent for him to do so. And the questions of law which he submitted for the opinion of the Court of Session are the following:—"(1) Was it competent for me to end the respondent's compensation at 24th September 1912? (2) Ought I to have ended the compensation on that date?" These are the only questions before your Lordships' House for decision, and the answers which should be given to them must, in my view, depend entirely on the proper construction of the statute and the schedules attached to it, and on that alone.

Now, the 1st section of the Act runs thus: "If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to this Act." On referring to the First Schedule, paragraph 1 (b), coupled with paragraph 3, it is clear that what was aimed at was, by the payment of weekly sums during incapacity, total or partial, to compensate the workman for the loss of the power to earn wages. But as this incapacity, whether total or partial, might diminish or cease altogether, and as partial incapacity might develop into total incapacity, it was necessary to provide machinery for the adjustment, in the interest of employer and workman alike, of the weekly payments according to the changing condition of the workman subsequent to the first award. Accordingly it is provided that any workman receiving weekly payments under the Act must, if required by the employer, from time to time submit himself for examination by a medical man, and elaborate provisions are made for the reference of the question of the workman's fitness for employment to a medical referee.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Ld. Atkinson.

Paragraph 16 deals with the review of these weekly payments, not a review in the nature of an appeal from the award made in the first instance by the arbitrator, who decides on the existence of incapacity when he makes his award, but a review directed to the question whether, owing to changed conditions, these weekly payments should be increased, diminished, or made to cease. It is a review, moreover, which may be effected under paragraph 16 by the agreement of the parties, and would more properly be styled a re-estimation or revision of the amount of compensation awarded rather than a review of the award itself. It is only when the parties fail to review by agreement that the matter is to be settled by arbitration. It was suggested in argument that the award of an arbitrator, whether original or made on a review under paragraph 16, is in the nature of a judgment of a county court. That this is an error is, in my view, clear from the provisions of paragraph 9 of the Second Schedule. By that paragraph the same effect is given to a memorandum embodying the terms of the agreement of the parties as is given to a memorandum embodying the decision of an arbitrator. The memorandum, when recorded, is, in either case, no doubt enforceable as a judgment of the county court, but that is a very different thing from saying that on registration it, in England, becomes a judgment of a county court. The judge of the county court is not functus officio when he makes his award in the first instance. Should the parties fail to agree to review the weekly payment, he is brought into touch with the matter again, and can himself do that for them, increasing or diminishing or making the payments to cease as to him shall seem necessary to meet the justice of the case. For myself I may say that I utterly fail to see upon what principle of justice a workman is, under a decision awarding to him weekly payments during his incapacity, entitled to receive a single payment after his incapacity has ceased, or that, when proceedings for review have been properly instituted, the employer is not entitled to have the weekly payments ended from the time the incapacity is proved to have ended, at all events where, as in the present case, the employer has by his application given the date when he alleges incapacity has ended in fact, and claims to have the payments ended from that date.

According to the rules to which your Lordships' attention has been called, the practice prescribed in England, when an employer raises a defence against the enforcing of the payment of a weekly sum on the ground that incapacity has ceased, is apparently to make the order for payment but to stay the execution of it until the employer has had an opportunity of making a proper application for review, on the terms, however, that the amount awarded should be paid into Court. This would appear to me to be a most convenient and proper course. My noble friend Lord Shaw has dealt with the Scotch practice. I am clearly of opinion that both the questions submitted by the Sheriff-substitute for the opinion of the Court should be answered in the affirmative. With all respect to the learned and distinguished judges who decided the case of Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan,[1] I am not quite sure that the peculiar nature of the awards of compensation under this statute was steadily kept in view.

It may well be that as a general rule judgments of Courts of law stand until they are reversed, and that when the right is claimed to modify them, the relief, when given, should only operate either from the time it is claimed, or from the time it is granted, according to the circumstances of the case; but where, as in this case, something is by an award directed or ordered to be done during the continuance of a certain state of circumstances or until the happening of a certain event, then that judgment or order by its very terms directs that this thing need not be done when those circumstances have altered in the way contemplated, or that event has occurred. And, all questions of laches or acquiescence apart, I can see no reason why, where it is proved in a proper proceeding that the particular state of circumstances has ceased, or that the particular event has occurred when the thing directed should cease to be done, the arbitrator should not be entitled to make an order, in truth only carrying into effect the first order, and direct that this thing need not be further done.

Though it is not necessary for the decision of this case to determine whether any different rule or principle should apply where it is merely claimed that the weekly payments should be diminished or increased, still I may say for myself that the inclination of my present opinion is that the same general principle should apply to the one case as to the other, and that the weekly payments should be varied from the time the circumstances justifying the change are shown to have occurred. I think the judgment appealed from was erroneous and should be reversed, and this appeal allowed, but without costs.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—This appeal arises out of an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The arbitration was in a process of review of a weekly payment made under a previous award. The facts must be taken as they are set forth in the stated case. They have been already fully adverted to.

From that case it appears that the respondent was on 5th August 1912 found by the Sheriff to be totally incapacitated for work. It is also "found as a fact that on 24th September 1912 the respondent had recovered complete capacity for work." Not only so, but since that date, or rather since 25th September, it is found that the respondent has been fully employed and earning wages. In these circumstances the respondent claims that the weekly payments awarded to him during incapacity should be continued to him after his incapacity has ceased and he has been earning wages elsewhere. I think that this claim cannot be defended on any principle of common honesty. Nor do I think that it can

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

be justified on any principle of law. For this reason I humbly agree that the judgments appealed from should be reversed.

The proceedings for review of the weekly compensation began on 4th November. It is clear that the learned arbitrator felt that to say that the cessation of incapacity then began was erroneous. The incapacity had ceased two months before. Quite correctly, however, interpreting the decision in Donaldson Brothers,[1] he felt himself prevented from getting back to the true date, or nearer thereto than the date of the petition for review. The judgment of the Court below in the present case also followed that of Donaldson.[1]

The case is not complicated by any payments having been made since the incapacity ceased. Where payments are in fact made, and repetition is demanded, there may be various considerations for and against such repetition: and pleas of bar, closed account, laches, and the like might come to be discussed. I humbly agree with the views on that subject expressed in the opinion of the noble and learned Lord Chancellor. These may be exceptional cases. But it may in general be said that, when both parties to an award do act in terms thereof, they will be presumed to do so on the footing of admitting that the conditions of the award were fulfilled and applied. It appears to me that so far as procedings under the Act are concerned—for I exclude other remedies grounded upon allegations of concealment, fraud, or the like—they ought not to be utilised so as to rip up concluded transactions.

In Scotland the effect of the recording of the award—an effect making it by the Act "enforceable" as a decree-arbitral—appears to some extent to have been emphasised at the expense of the consideration that the weekly payment was to be made during the continuance of the incapacity. I humbly look upon all the provisions as to procedure for review of the award to be provisions to enable Courts and arbitrators to get back to that cardinal point, to prevent compensation during incapacity being turned into compensation during capacity, and so to readjust awards of total or partial incapacity as to square with the facts.

An instance of what I mean is the judgment in the two cases of Steel [2] and Pumpherston Oil Company v. Cavaney.[3] A process of review may be lengthy, and judgment in it for many reasons may be much delayed. But these cases held that, until final judgment in the review was given, the old award (although proved to have been long out of accord with the facts) stood. This was never law in England, and is, of course, not now law in Scotland.

A great advance in Scotland was made by Donaldson.[1] This carried the change in liability a long step nearer to the change in the facts, and dated the former, not from the judgment in the application for review, but from the application itself. And I confess that, while I entirely agree that the case of Donaldson [1] was erroneous in not going further, I feel some of the difficulties alluded to in the Court of Session by Lord Dunedin. It is, of course, not of real assistance, however, that the award, or even the recorded agreement of parties, "shall be enforceable" as a decree of Court. For the enforceability cannot affect the liability for or the existence or the quantum of the debt. Assume, however, an award made and recorded, the practical question is how is it to be treated after a dispute arises? By this I mean, not in the sense of a legally formulated dispute, but in the sense of an actual difference between the parties as to whether the condition of incapacity continues. The parties differ. In one case the workman alleges that his partial incapacity has now become total incapacity, and that the award should be increased. In another case the employer alleges that the incapacity ceased as at a certain date, and that the compensation should cease then, and he, in fact, has stopped on that account all further payments. The latter instance is the present case. But assume that in such an instance the workman denies any change of circumstances, and that accordingly a charge for payment in execution of the award is made. In my opinion the duty of the employer in such circumstances is instantly to institute proceedings for review by the arbitrator under the statute. He cannot bring a suspension of the charge in the ordinary sense so as to review the disputed circumstances in that process; but if the charge is persisted in he may pro forma bring a suspension [1] and table his application to the arbitrator for review, and the Court would at once suspend in hoc statu and sist all procedure in the suspension to enable the proper and statutory review to proceed. This, in my opinion, is the sensible course. It is a course which is suitable in Scotland, and it is in substance analogous to the procedure in England.

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292. [2] 5 F. 244. [3] (1903) 5 F. 963.

I agree with your Lordships that the appeal should be allowed, and that the questions stated by the learned arbitrator should both be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Parker of Waddington.—[In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Shaw]—I agree. The liability imposed on the employer by section 1, subsection 1, of the Act of 1906 is a liability to pay compensation in accordance with the First Schedule to the Act; that is, in the case of total or partial incapacity resulting from the injury, to pay a weekly sum during the incapacity. By section 1, subsection 3, any question as to the amount or duration of the compensation is, in default of agreement, to be settled by arbitration. Any question as to the duration of the compensation must therefore in reality be a question whether the incapacity during which it is payable did or did not exist at the particular punctum temporis at which it is alleged that the compensation ceased to be payable.

In the present case the accident resulted in the total incapacity of the workman, and by the award of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 5th August 1912, the compensation payable was fixed at 14s. a week. The precise terms of this award are not in evidence, nor indeed do they appear to be material, for the duty of the Sheriff-substitute was merely to fix the amount of the weekly sum payable. He had no jurisdiction to determine prospectively—indeed it would be impossible to determine prospectively

[1] Note: cf. cases referred to by Lord Sumner, infra, p. 67, notes 1-4.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Ld. Parker of Waddington.

—the duration of the weekly payment, which depended on the duration of the incapacity. The weekly sum payable under the award was paid until 24th September 1912. As from that date the employer refused to pay it, on the ground that the incapacity had then determined. There thus arose a dispute as to the duration of the compensation, and, the parties having failed to come to an agreement, this dispute was referred, as provided by the Act. The Sheriff-substitute found that the incapacity had ceased on 24th September 1912. Logically, therefore, it followed that the weekly sum ceased to be payable on and after that date. The Sheriff-substitute, however, felt himself constrained to hold, on the authority of Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan,[1] that the weekly sum did not cease to be payable until 4th November 1912, being the date upon which the arbitration proceedings in which his award was given were initiated. In this he was upheld by the order of the Second Division, now appealed from.

The decision in Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan[1] turned on the true meaning and effect of the provisions of paragraph 9 of the Second Schedule and paragraph 16 of the First Schedule to the Act. By the first of those paragraphs it is provided that any agreement or award determining the amount of the compensation is to be recorded as therein mentioned, and when recorded may be enforced as a county court judgment in England and as a recorded decree-arbitral in Scotland. This provision may be somewhat inaccurately worded, but its meaning is clear. The agreement or award determining the amount of compensation is not in any sense a judgment or decree, nor does it create any liability. The liability is imposed by the Act, and the agreement or award determines its amount. When, however, the agreement or award is recorded, the liability may be enforced as though it were a liability under a judgment or decree. Now, where the liability is to pay a weekly sum, not for any definite period but during incapacity, it could not, even if embodied in a judgment of the county courts in England, be enforced without some further proceeding, in which the Court could be satisfied as to the amount actually due. If in this further proceeding it were alleged by the employer that nothing was due as from a particular date, because on that date the incapacity had determined, it would be the duty of the Court to grant an adjournment so that the dispute as to the duration of the compensation could be referred. If on such reference the arbitrator found that the incapacity had in fact determined on the date alleged, it would be the duty of the Court to refuse to enforce the weekly payment after that date. It appears from the judgment of Lord Shaw, which I have had the advantage of reading, that though the procedure for enforcing or suspending a decree-arbitral in Scotland is somewhat different, the same results would follow. There is, therefore, nothing in paragraph 9 of the Second Schedule in any way at variance with the earlier provisions of the Act.

Passing to the 16th paragraph of the First Schedule, it provides that any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the maximum thereinbefore provided, and the amount of payment is, in default of agreement, to be settled by arbitration. This paragraph contemplates (1) that the weekly sum payable has already been ascertained by agreement or arbitration; (2) that, notwithstanding such ascertainment, a dispute has arisen as to the amount payable under the Act; (3) that this dispute will be itself settled by a new agreement or arbitration; and (4) that the settlement of the dispute may involve the weekly payment originally agreed or awarded being ended, diminished, or increased. The process by which the last-mentioned result is to be effected is called a review, but there is, I think, no magic in the word.

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

In the present case 14s. a week was the original amount awarded. Subsequently there was a dispute as to whether it had not ceased to be payable on 24th September 1912, by reason of the incapacity during which alone it was payable having wholly ceased on that date. This dispute was in due course referred, and the arbitrator found that the incapacity had in fact wholly ceased on 24th September 1912. The result seems to be that the weekly payment wholly ceased on 24th September 1912. There has been a review, with the result that the liability to make the payment was ended on that date. If it had been a case of partial incapacity, and the workman had alleged a total incapacity as from 24th September 1912, and claimed 16s. instead of 14s. a week, and the arbitrator had found in his favour, can it be doubted that the 16s. a week would have been payable as from 24th September 1912? I think not. It would be clearly inequitable and contrary to the true intent of the Act so to hold; and it seems to me to be equally inequitable and contrary to the true intent of the Act to hold that a weekly payment continues after the incapacity during which it is payable has wholly ceased. With great respect to the learned judges who were parties to the decision in Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan,[1] it appears to me that they took too technical a view of the 9th paragraph of the Second Schedule and the 16th paragraph of the First Schedule to the Act. They treated the award by which the amount payable was originally settled as though for all purposes, and not only for the purposes of enforcement, it was a judgment or decree, and as if the subsequent arbitration proceedings were in the nature of an action to set aside or vary such judgment or decree, whereas in truth the arbitration tribunal set up by the statute is a tribunal for determining and adjusting from time to time, as circumstances alter, the extent and duration of the employer's liability under the Act.

I agree, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord Sumner.—[In his Lordship's absence his opinion was read by Lord Parmoor]—I agree, and would add nothing if it were not that your Lordships are reversing part of a unanimous decision, now five years old, of seven judges of the Court of Session, without having had the advantage, since the respondent does not appear, of any argument in support of

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Sumner.

it. Out of deference to those learned judges, I think that I ought to state my reasons for differing from them.

The Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles had before him an application by an employer, under paragraph 16 of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, dated 4th November 1912, to review, by terminating them as from 24th September previous, the weekly payments awarded to the workman under the original award. He found as a fact that the workman's incapacity had completely ceased on that day; and in fact, also, the employer had disputed the workman's right to be paid thereafter by the sufficient process of stopping the payments as from that day. The original award, though it is not before your Lordships, may be presumed to have been correctly worded, and so to have provided that the weekly payment was "to continue during the total or partial incapacity of" the respondent, "or until the same be ended, diminished, increased, or redeemed in accordance with the provisions" of the Act. The case states that "a decree of Court" was made thereon, but does not give any date or particulars.

The Sheriff-substitute stated in the case two questions of law: "(1) Was it competent for me to end the respondent's compensation at 24th September 1912? (2) Ought I to have ended the compensation at that date?" And he adds that but for the authorities as to the effect of the decree of Court he would have done so. The judges of the Second Division, following the case of Donaldson,[1] said "No" to the first question and nothing to the second. The appellants submit, and I think rightly, that the answer to both is "Yes."

In connection with the review of an award of weekly compensation there are four occurrences the dates of which are, or may be, material. (1) The alteration or cessation of the workman's incapacity in fact. (2) Default of agreement to deal with the compensation accordingly, which involves a contention actually raised inter partes as to the continuance of the original or any payment, and the absence of any agreement determining that contention. In point of time either of these occurrences may precede the other. (3) An application duly made to have the weekly payments reviewed. (4) An actual decision upon that application. Where, by that decision, a weekly payment has been varied or terminated, a memorandum thereof must be sent under paragraph 9 of the Second Schedule to the registrar of the County Court, and when it has been registered "the memorandum shall for all purposes be enforceable as a County Court judgment," or in Scotland as a "recorded decree-arbitral." Not until this has been done has the review resulted in any adjudication; until this has been done the original award, if duly recorded without stay or suspension, is a judicial act still in force. The application for review does not of itself affect or suspend the operation of the award, and it has been laid down in Scotland, though it is otherwise in England, that "if a workman registers a memorandum and by that means gets power of execution, then the only proper way of getting out of the liability which that memorandum imposes is for the employer to end it in the way provided by the statute, viz., by a petition under section (16), and that he cannot get out of it by any other process such as suspension": per the Lord President in M'Ewan v. William Baird & Company.[1] The same proposition, in substance, is to be found in Fife Coal Company v. Lindsay,[2] Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company v. Sinclair,[3] and in Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company v. Cairnduff.[4] On the other hand, if no memorandum has been recorded, and it is proved that the workman has acquiesced in a discontinuance or variation of the payments, then, as was held in Lochgelly Iron and Coal Company v. Sinclair,[5] suspension of the payments may be granted.

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

What, then, is the relation of the tribunal of review to the original recorded award? To what date, if any, prior to the date of its actual decision may its order relate? "Review" here does not, of course, mean appeal; for the review may be effected by the parties consensually, and there is besides a separate provision for an appeal against the original award. For the purposes of review the arbitrator who decides the second issue has co-ordinate jurisdiction with the arbitrator who decided the first, and often, as in the present case, is the same person. A review is a further arbitration and, as such, involves a submission which at the same time confers and limits jurisdiction.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it was held some years ago that the tribunal of review can discontinue or vary the prior payment only as from the date of its actual decision: Steel v. Oakbank Oil Company[6] and Pumpherston Oil Company v. Cavaney.[7] The ground was that "the judgment still subsisted, notwithstanding an application to review it, until it was reviewed, and a judgment in the review pronounced, and ought to have been obeyed, notwithstanding the application for review, so long as it remained unreviewed and unaltered": per Lord Young in the case of Steel.[8] "It is not stated" (in paragraph 12 of the First Schedule to the Act of 1897, to which the present paragraph 16 corresponds) "at or from what time the ending, diminution, or increase of the weekly payments is to be made, but it appears to me that upon a sound construction of the section it cannot be assumed to have been intended that the review should take effect at any time prior to the judgment upon the application": per the Lord President in the Pumpherston case.[9] This view never was taken in England. Before either of these cases had been decided Morton & Company v. Woodward,[10] in the Court of Appeal, had laid down the contrary rule; and the decision in the case of Donaldson[11] in 1909 definitely abandoned the principle of these two cases. The first question, therefore, is whether they were rightly overruled.

Morton's case[10] was decided on the principle that the function of the tribunal of review is to arbitrate upon such disputes as may be duly brought before it. Hence the arbitrator is not limited in his jurisdiction

---

[1] 1910 S. C. 436, at p. 440.
[2] 1908 S. C. 431.
[3] 1909 S. C. 922, at p. 930.
[4] 1911 S. C. 647, at p. 650.
[5] 1909 S. C. 922.
[6] (1902) 5 F. 244.
[7] (1903) 5 F. 963.
[8] 5 F., at p. 247.
[9] 5 F., at p. 966.
[10] [1902] 2 K. B. 276.
[11] 1909 S. C. 1292.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Sumner.

to deciding the existence or extent of the workman's incapacity at the date of his award; but may, and, if either party desires it, must, decide it on the date "when the matter was first initiated before the Court," that is, at the date of the application to review, provided that a dispute as to the workman's then condition is then distinctly formulated. As Cozens-Hardy, L.J., tersely puts it (p. 282), "The matter which was referred to the learned County Court Judge, and which he was competent to deal with, was whether, at the date of the initiation of these proceedings, the incapacity to work had ceased." The argument for the employers in that case did not make it necessary for the Court to consider whether there was jurisdiction to review the weekly payments as at any date anterior to that of the application to review.

Two cases on this subject came before the Court of Appeal in 1909, Upper Forest and Western Steel and Tinplate Company v. Thomas[1] and Charing Cross, Euston, and Hampstead Railway Company v. Boots.[2] In both the arbitrator terminated the weekly payment on review as from a date anterior to that of the application for review. In neither did the application state a date for the workman's alleged recovery. In the first case, on the workman's application to record, the County Court Judge, finding that it was opposed on an allegation that the incapacity had ceased, recorded the memorandum, but stayed execution to give time for an application for review. No exception seems to have been taken to this in the Court of Appeal, and the cases of the Fife Coal Company[3] and of the Lochgelly Company[4] were not cited. The Court of Appeal unanimously decided that on the form of the application to review the arbitrator had exceeded his jurisdiction, for "it was not referred to him to ascertain what was the state of the injured man at a previous date." The earliest competent date was, therefore, the date of the initiation of the review. The question whether, if the matter had been duly referred, he could have decided that the incapacity had ceased at a previous date was deliberately left open. In the second case the Court, now somewhat differently constituted, adhered to its former decisions that the arbitrator on a review cannot go outside the submission, and that he can review as from a date anterior to that of his own decision. Cozens-Hardy, M.R., intimated distinctly the opinion that "if there is a formulated dispute as to a workman's incapacity at a particular date, it is competent to the arbitrator to decide that dispute" (p. 644). He did not expressly put the case when the date particularized is anterior to the application for review itself, but there can be little doubt that his opinion was meant to cover that case. Kennedy, L.J., (p. 650) was also favourably inclined to that jurisdiction. Here again the County Court Judge, when recording the memorandum, had simultaneously stayed execution pending an application to review, and the majority of the Court of Appeal, expressing no doubts of its propriety, found authority for this course in paragraph 9 (b) of the Second Schedule. Buckley, L.J., held that the order to record the agreement ought to have been made, but so that the record

[1] [1909] 2 K. B. 631.
[2] [1909] 2 K. B. 640.
[3] 1908 S. C. 431.
[4] 1909 S. C. 922.

should not be enforceable as a judgment under the Second Schedule, paragraph 9. In other words, an order "that execution of the order for registration of the agreement be stayed" is right; an order "that execution of the judgment for enforcement of the agreement shall be stayed" would be wrong. He further considered that the facts sufficiently raised the question of the arbitrator's jurisdiction to terminate as from a date prior to that of the application to review, and that the form of the application also was adequate. Accordingly he held definitely that, as from such prior date, there was jurisdiction to decide that the workman was entitled to nothing. He expressly says "There is nothing in the statute to prevent it" (p. 648), an opinion in which I concur.

It is to be noted that the unanimous judgment of the Court continued the stay imposed in the County Court, which, whatever its form, effectually prevented the workman from getting payment, as from the date on which his incapacity was alleged to have ceased until the date of the employer's application to review, without making a further application for its removal, on which application cessation of incapacity prior to the date of the application to review could be alleged in answer and proved by the employer.

The conflict between the English and the Scotch decisions had attracted such attention that already in 1908 the question was mooted of bringing it before a fuller Bench in order to decide whether the cases of Steel[1] and of Pumpherston[2] should stand (see Southhook Fire Clay Company v. Laughland[3]), but all that was then decided was that if no memorandum had been recorded but mere voluntary payments had been made, there was nothing in the nature of an operative decree to stand against the fullest exercise of the power of review; and here the Court appeared to recognise that, in terms, paragraph 16 itself does not limit that exercise at all. This was the state of the authorities when Donaldson's[4] case fell to be decided.

The dates in that case are important. The workman got the agreement recorded on 5th October 1908. On 24th October 1908, as the Sheriff-substitute found, his incapacity entirely ceased. As from that date the employers had made no payment, and when, on 28th December, the workman charged them to make payment, they on 30th December brought a suspension of this charge. The Lord Ordinary refused the note of suspension, and the employers reclaimed. Meantime the Sheriff-substitute had heard the employers' application to review, which also was dated 30th December, and had stated a case with this question of law for the opinion of the Court: "Should the compensation payable to the respondent have been ended on the date of my judgment, viz., 23rd February 1909, or on the date on which the incapacity of the respondent had ceased, viz., 24th October 1908?" The stated case and the reclaiming note in the suspension were heard together. Upon the reclaiming note the Court, following the case of Lochgelly,[5] held that the suspension was

[1] 5 F. 244.
[2] 5 F. 963.
[3] 1908 S. C. 831.
[4] 1909 S. C. 1292.
[5] 1909 S. C. 922.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Sumner.

rightly refused by the Lord Ordinary. The Court, further, overruling the cases of Steel [1] and Pumpherston,[2] held that the date of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment was not the date at which the payment should have been terminated, but, instead of finding in terms of the question of law stated, directed that the compensation should have been ended as on the date of the application to review, and so remitted the case to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed as accords.

Part of the reasoning of the Court appears to have been that until the application to review is made there can be no "formulation of a dispute," to use the phrase which originated with Collins, M.R., in Morton & Company v. Woodward,[3] except in a sense so wide that it would include a mere case of cessation of payment by an employer, which, unless the workman acquiesces in it or the employer acts from carelessness or want of money, shows of itself that the parties are in difference about it; that this would amount to the employer's "determining at his own hand" when incapacity ceases by taking the law into his own hands and disregarding the terms of a recorded memorandum; and that he is bound to continue to pay in accordance with it at his peril unless and until on an application to review he gets the weekly payments altered.

It is to be regretted that the Court of Session only had the Charing Cross case[4] before it in the form in which it is reported in 25 Times Law Reports, 683, a form which, while stating the reasons of the Master of the Rolls at length, fails to report the other judgments at all, and gives a most meagre and unsatisfactory note of their effect. It is evident that the learned judges of the Court of Session felt some difficulty in apprehending the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in that case, and I cannot but think that a full report, and particularly the observations of Buckley, L.J., at p. 648 of the Law Reports, [1909] 2 K. B., might probably have led them to a different conclusion.

So far as the decision in the case of Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan [5] overruled the cases of Steel [1] and of Pumpherston,[2] and held that the review might go back to a date anterior to the decision on the review, it seems to me that it was indubitably right, and that Morton & Company v. Woodward,[3] too, was rightly decided. There is a marked difference between the scheme of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1897 and 1906, and the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Section 1 of the latter provided that "where . . . personal injury is caused to a workman . . . the workman . . . shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman." That right was to be asserted and those remedies pursued by action brought in the county court. The Workmen's Compensation Act provides otherwise. Section 1, while keeping alive an employer's pre-existing civil liability, declares that, "if . . . personal injury . . . is caused to a workman . . . his employer shall . . . be liable to pay compensation," and subsection 3 provides that, "if any

---

[1] 5 F. 244.
[2] 5 F. 963.
[3] [1902] 2 K. B. 276.
[4] [1909] 2 K. B. 640.
[5] 1909 S. C. 1292.

question arises in any proceedings" not only as to liability, but also "as to the amount or"—mark this—"duration of compensation under this Act, . . . the question, if not settled by agreement, shall be . . . settled by arbitration, in accordance with the Second Schedule to this Act." As my noble and learned friend Lord Kinnear says in the case of Pumpherston,[1] "Procedure under the Workmen's Compensation Act is not ordinary litigation, or indeed litigation at all. The right given to the workman is a new and statutory right, to be expiscated by arbitration, and not by an action-at-law; and we must consider what the statute says with reference to the way in which it may be determined or modified."

Now, although there is provision for giving effect to the arbitrator's various decisions as if they were judgments of a Court, the awards themselves are not judgments, and a special paragraph (9 of Second Schedule) is required to enable them, after being duly recorded, to be enforced as if they were. That enforcement in its turn is affected by the provision for review. The statute does not contemplate a judgment for a sum of money recovered once and for all as compensation for the cause of action, in which judgment the cause of action merges. In the case of an injured workman it creates a right in the workman and a liability in the employer to receive and make respectively a weekly payment during incapacity, which weekly payment may be reviewed, and on such review be ended, diminished, or increased. This right persists instead of merging in the award when made as it would do in a judgment when recovered upon an ordinary cause of action; and the employer continues liable not simply to perform that award but to pay compensation during the workman's incapacity. Again, the right to the weekly payments does not belong to the workman without restraint, as his general choses in action would do. This right is dependent on continued residence in the United Kingdom, subject to one exception, and it cannot be assigned, charged, or attached, nor does it pass by operation of law (paragraph 19 of First Schedule). So far does this go that, although the workman can agree with his employer for the redemption of the weekly payments by a lump sum, that lump sum itself he can neither assign nor charge. It is therefore plain that the ordinary incidents of a judgment in an action do not attach to the decree-arbitral on the original award, nor, in so far as concerns the fluctuations in the condition of the workman's health from time to time, does the original award operate as res judicata to estop either party from claiming to reopen it after a change of circumstances and on fresh materials: Sharman v. Holliday & Greenwood.[2] The question how long and how far the prior decree continues to be "operative" and "subsisting" depends entirely on the construction of paragraph 16. To ask how the decree or review can divest the vested right to payments which are due, overdue, or payable under the original award is only a different way of stating the same thing. There is nothing in the mere language of that paragraph to limit the power of review in respect of the date at which the decision on the review may begin to operate. The object of the [1] 5 F. 963, at p. 970. [2] [1904] 1 K. B. 235.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Sumner.

power of review obviously is to enable the tribunal to adjust the payment to the incapacity from time to time, so that, as far as possible and for the sake of justice to both parties, the amount payable may increase or diminish as the incapacity increases and diminishes, and so that both may terminate together.

Upon the second question, I think the case of Donaldson[1] cannot be supported. The Court apparently thought that the Legislature meant the injured workman to get his payments regularly. So I should think it did. It was then thought that a retrospective review, not restricted to the date of the application, would encourage the employer to stop the payments as soon as he suspected that the workman's health had mended, and would be inconsistent with the decision in the case of Lochgelly,[2] above stated. The first reason assumed that a payment once made could not be recalled, however far the review might relate back, and that an employer would be tempted to stop payments at once, since otherwise, though he might succeed on the review, some part of his success would be barren. The second assumed that the paragraph which provides the right of review was concerned with the means of enforcing a recorded award, a matter for which the statute makes adequate provision elsewhere. As to the latter, if the workman fails to get the award registered, and then to enforce it, he must abide the consequences of his own want of diligence. Those consequences are not to be cured by attaching to the right of review a restriction which is not expressed. In the former case the employer could always arrive at the same result by making his application to review synchronize with his cessation of payment; and thus the construction adopted in Donaldson's case[1] achieves nothing. For my part, I think there is here no question for decision, either of the employer's right to recover from the workman sums paid between the date of his restoration to health and that of the employer's application for review, or of the exact procedure to be adopted in order to regularize the cessation of such payments pending a decision on review. Regard must be had in England to the practice established as to county court judgments, and in Scotland to the special incidents of procedure which attach to the "decree-arbitral" as a "recorded decree." I am glad to think that a procedure may be adopted which in effect will leave the working of the Act identical and uniform in both countries, and I am clearly of opinion that both the scheme and the language of the Act itself suffice to prevent any inference adverse to the full retrospective effect of the review being drawn from the provision that the award is to have the force of a "recorded decree-arbitral." So, too, I think your Lordships are not now concerned with the other assumption, that the employer can never recover from the workman payments once actually made. On that topic contrary expressions of opinion are to be found, on the one hand by the Lord President and Lord Adam in the Pumpherston case,[3] on the other by Cozens-Hardy, M.R., and Fletcher Moulton and Farwell, L.JJ., in Hosegood & Sons v. Wilson.[4] I have no opinion to express about it, though I apprehend that

---

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.
[2] 1909 S. C. 922.
[3] 5 F. 963, at pp. 966 and 968.
[4] [1911] 1 K. B. 30.

the ordinary rules about money paid voluntarily, or under compulsion of law, or under mistake of fact, will suffice to decide the point.

When the language of the Legislature is clear, suppositions as to the policy of the Act can rarely assist in its interpretation. Here, however, the argumentum ab inconvenienti is not in favour of, but overwhelmingly against, the decision on this point in Donaldson's case.[1] If the decision stands, workman as well as employer must, in self-defence, apply for review at the first inkling of any change in the former's incapacity. Each will await the effect of time and resort to repeated examination or prolonged observation at his peril. Each will recoil from negotiating with a view to a settlement of the dispute by consent for fear of prolonging the interval during which the original award must be rigorously implemented, no matter how the workman's health may have altered for better or for worse in the meantime. Each will hasten to claim a review as early as possible, in order that the fruits of success may be as ample as possible. It is to be presumed that the Legislature foresaw and provided for these contingencies. One would expect the power of review to be expressed without limitation, in order that the workman's incapacity, on which his right to compensation depends, may be followed as closely as possible in its fluctuations by an award for an adequate payment; and, in my opinion, the power is so expressed.

The problem is not a new one, though the expression "review" is, I think, new in this kind of legislation. Under the Matrimonial Causes Acts, 1866, 1878, and 1884, various provisions were made for weekly or other periodical payments by a husband to a wife, and it was foreseen that the circumstances of either parties, or both, might so change as to require those payments to be from time to time increased, diminished, or suspended. To effect this object, power was given to the Court which ordered the payment to vary it by further order as under the circumstances should be just. So here, the Legislature has dealt with a similar necessity in a similar way, and, making the changes incidental to arbitration, it gives to the arbitrator full control over the weekly payments by means of review. How the dispute is to be formulated, how the absence of agreement to settle it is to be proved, how it is to be submitted to arbitration, and how it is to be notified to the other side, are questions belonging to a different category altogether, which need not now be discussed.

I think that in the present case the arbitrator had full power to terminate the payments as from the date at which he found that incapacity had ceased; that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment below should be set aside; that the questions in the stated case should both be answered in the affirmative; and that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed as accords.

Lord Parmoor.—I agree. The facts in this case are simple. The question for decision is the construction of certain statutory provisions under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The respondent in May,

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Parmoor.

1912, was awarded under the Act a sum of 14s. per week in respect of injuries by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a dock labourer with the appellants. In accordance with this award, the appellants paid compensation to the respondent up to 24th September 1912, at which date a dispute arose and the payments were discontinued. On 4th November 1912, the appellants presented an application for reviewing the compensation payable to the respondent, averring (inter alia) that the respondent had completely recovered from his incapacity by 24th September 1912, and asking (inter alia) that the payment of compensation should end as from that date. The Sheriff-substitute found as a fact that on 24th September 1912, the respondent had recovered completely from his incapacity for work; but held that it was not competent for him to end compensation at that date, since by doing so he would be disturbing a decree of the Court as at a date when there was no proper application enabling this to be done. Had it been competent for him to do so he would have ended the compensation at the date at which the incapacity of the respondent had ceased. The questions of law for the opinion of the Court are: (1) Was it competent for the Sheriff-substitute to end the respondent's compensation on 24th September 1912? (2) Ought the Sheriff-substitute to have ended the compensation at that date?

The case came on for hearing before the Second Division of the Court of Session. The first question of law was answered in the negative. No answer was given to the second question, and the determination of the Sheriff-substitute was affirmed. From this interlocutor the appellant appealed. The Second Division of the Court of Session in giving their decision held that they were bound by the case of Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan,[1] which it was not possible to distinguish. The question, therefore, is whether that case was rightly decided.

The general scheme of the Workmen's Compensation Act, in cases where total or partial incapacity for work results from injury, is to be found in section 1, subsection 1, and First Schedule, paragraph 1 (b). In such cases a weekly payment is provided as compensation during the incapacity of the workman, that is to say, during the period of time for which the workman is disabled from earning wages, either wholly or in part. For all ordinary cases an applicable form of award is given in the appendix to the Workmen's Compensation Rules. This form, following the scheme of the Act, orders that the weekly payment for compensation shall continue during the total or partial incapacity of the workman, or until the same shall be ended, diminished, increased, or redeemed, in accordance with the provisions of the Act. In the present case it was said that the award was in the ordinary form, so that under the terms of the award the weekly payment as compensation would only be payable during the total or partial incapacity of the respondent, but if a dispute arises whether and at what date total or partial incapacity has ended, this can only be determined under the statutory procedure in the Act. This procedure was put into operation at the instance of the appellants.

[1] 1909 S. C. 1292.

When an award of compensation has been made, a memorandum thereof is required to be recorded under the Second Schedule, paragraph 9. In the present case a memorandum of the weekly payment due to the respondent was duly recorded, and thereupon such memorandum became enforceable as a recorded decree-arbitral. In the same way a memorandum of variation in any weekly payments can be recorded, but to obtain such variation the statutory requirements must be followed. The Sheriff-substitute in refusing to end the compensation on 24th September 1912, at which date he found that the respondent had recovered complete capacity for work, based his decision on the ground that to do so would be to disturb a decree of Court at a date when there was no proper application to enable this to be done.

In my opinion, there is no ground for holding that the recorded memorandum is a decree of Court incapable of retroactive alteration by the Sheriff-substitute. Whether the recorded memorandum is to be regarded as a decree, or simply as a record of the terms of payment enforceable as a decree of Court, it is by express statutory provision open to variation and review under statutory procedure if conditions change.

The statutory requirements to be followed when it is desired to review any weekly payments ordered to be paid in a recorded memorandum are to be found in the First Schedule (16). It is enacted that in default of agreement, the ending, diminishing, or increasing of weekly payments shall be settled by arbitration under the Act. In the present case a dispute had arisen as to the continuance of the incapacity of the respondent, the appellants alleging that the incapacity of the respondent had ended on 24th September 1912, and ceasing to make payment from that date. There may be a difficulty in some cases in deciding at what date a dispute has arisen so as to determine the ambit of the jurisdiction of the arbitrator; but I think it is clear that such dispute did arise in the present case at the date of the cessation of the weekly payment. No agreement was made, and, in default thereof, the appellants applied to the Sheriff-substitute, averring that the respondent had at 24th September 1912 completely recovered from his accident, and asking that the weekly payment should be ended as from 24th September 1912. It was clearly within the jurisdiction and duty of the Sheriff-substitute to determine the dispute as to the date at which the incapacity of the respondent had ceased, and on this point he found in favour of the appellants. The further question is whether, having found the date in favour of the appellants, it was competent for him to alter the recorded memorandum in accordance with the finding. This further issue was undoubtedly submitted to him in the application to review. In my opinion it was within his power and jurisdiction to entertain it and he had competent authority to alter the time in the recorded memorandum by ending the compensation payable on 24th September 1912, this issue having been properly submitted to him under the statutory procedure. There is no limitation of time expressed in the statute and no reason why such a limitation should be inferred. I apprehend that the question is simply one of construction, and that considerations based on policy are irrelevant. I agree with the opinion expressed by Buckley, L.J., in the case of Charing

May 14, 1914.

Wishart v. Gibson & Co.

Lord Parmoor.

Cross, Euston and Hampstead Railway Company v. Boots,[1] that there is nothing in the statute which would prevent the Sheriff-substitute going back to the relevant date, and that the question is only one of what are the issues which have been presented to the tribunal in the case in which the decision is invited.

In the case of Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan,[2] a case of great authority, which was heard by seven Judges, it was held that the Sheriff-substitute had a power of retroactive decision, but limited to the date of the application to him. This limitation is adopted on the ground that when compensation is once fixed the only way to alter it is that provided by the statute, an application to vary. No doubt the only way to alter compensation is by the statutory procedure but the tribunal to which the application is made is not thereby placed under any disability to determine the whole dispute referred to it, including the alteration of the recorded memorandum so as to accord with its determination on questions of fact. Assuming, as the Court of Session held, that there may be retroactive alteration in a memorandum enforceable as a recorded decree-arbitral, I am unable to find any ground for limiting the period for retroactive alteration to the date of the application to review, although differing with hesitation from so authoritative a judgment. In England the recorded memorandum under the Act is enforceable as a county court judgment, but this difference does not, in my view, in any way affect the power of the arbitration tribunal to which the application for review is made.

I desire to express no opinion on questions of procedure which do not arise in the present case. In my view both questions should be answered in the affirmative, and the appeal allowed.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed against reversed and the questions of law answered in the affirmative, no costs being allowed to either side either in the House of Lords or in the Court of Session.

BOTTERELL & ROCHE—BOYD, JAMESON, & YOUNG, W.S.

No. 8.

July 14, 1914.

Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

THOMAS GOODALL NASMYTH AND OTHERS (A. H. Nasmyth's Trustees), Pursuers and Real Raisers.
THE NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN, (Claimants) Appellants.—Younger, K.C.—Church.
THE SCOTTISH NATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN, (Claimants) Respondents.—Clyde, K.C.—Hon. A. Shaw.

Succession— Testament— Construction— Proof— Admissibility of extrinsic evidence—Ambiguity in designation of beneficiary—Bequest to a society—Designation exactly corresponding only to a foreign society.

Where there is an ambiguity as to the identity of the party to whom a testator has bequeathed a legacy, the fact that the description of one only of the claimants corresponds exactly to the description of the legatee given by the testator does not per se conclude the

[1] [1909] 2 K. B. 640.

[2] 1909 S. C. 1292.

July 14, 1914.

Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

question in favour of that claimant, and does not preclude inquiry into the question whether another claimant, whose description does not exactly correspond, may not be the legatee intended by the testator; but there is a strong presumption in favour of the party exactly described which cannot be overcome except by cogent positive evidence.

A Scotsman, living in Scotland, left, among other legacies to charities, all of which were Scottish, a legacy to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children." In a competition between "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," a society working in England, and "The Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," a society working in Scotland,—

Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that the legacy fell to be paid to the English society in the absence of clear proof that the testator intended that it should go to the Scottish society.

(In the Court of Session, 17th December 1912—1913 S. C. 412. Also 5th July 1913.)

Earl Loreburn. Ld. Dunedin. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline. Lord Parmoor.

Following upon the interlocutor of the Second Division of 17th December 1912, a proof was taken before Lord Salvesen, of which the import appears from the opinions of their Lordships of the Second Division printed in the footnote infra.

On 5th July 1913 their Lordships pronounced an interlocutor preferring the Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children to the fund in medio.*

---

* Their Lordships delivered the following opinions:—

Lord Justice-Clerk.—There can be no doubt that this is not a very easy question in some respects, and it is the more difficult because the circumstances of the case are highly complicated—indeed, so complicated that I doubt if anyone, even if he got a book and made excerpts of everything about the Society, would thoroughly understand it.

The effect of what is proposed on the part of the Society of London is that a desire for the protection of children uttered by a Scotsman, and a bequest given by a Scotsman to aid that desire, is to be of no benefit whatever to any Scottish child, or to any society that protects children in Scotland, but that the money is to be carried off to London and none of it is to be applied for any Scottish purpose whatever. Now that is rather a strong thing to ask for, but of course one always says if it is the law it must be carried out.

This Society carries on work in London, and is no doubt under its charter a National Society for the Protection of Children. But it is a National Society which recognises that it has nothing to do with Scotland. It has no duties in Scotland; it says it has none, and it does not fulfil any. But the peculiarity of this case is that in the two societies which had been formed there was a movement for affiliation; and the Scottish Society was most willing to affiliate with the English Society upon one condition, very expressly indicated, that if any Scottish testator left money to the Society it was to belong to the Scottish branch. When things were in that position this gentleman left a sum of £500 to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and that sum necessarily, if he had died before 1907, must have come to Scotland. About that there cannot be a shadow of doubt. By the arrangement and the condition which the English Society agreed to that money would have come to Scotland.

Then it turned out that there was some legal difficulty about this affiliation. Apparently counsel both in England and in Scotland advised

July 14, 1914.

Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

The claimants, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 13th and 14th July 1914.*

that the Societies had no right to make it, and it was abrogated; but in no way did that alter the work that was carried on, because the work was carried on in England by the English people and in Scotland by the Scottish people. But there was nothing to indicate to the testator that any change had taken place at all. This affiliation subsisted until 1907. Now at the time that the testator made his will, could it be suggested for a moment that he did not intend the money to go to Scotland? If that was his intention, is it to be altered by the fact that these two societies separated once more and were no longer one parent stem of two branches, but each branch became once more a separate plant? I am unable to see it. It is no doubt perfectly true that if you take the word "national" in only one sense, it applies to England in this particular case. But that is a mere question of name, and has nothing to do with real nationality at all, because in this country there is a nationality as regards the State, which nationality is neither English nor Scottish nor Irish, but is the nationality of the United Kingdom. Nevertheless there is a nationality of the individual countries, and nowhere is that more clearly shown than in this country. We have never been absorbed in another country, but we are united to another country for practical purposes, and we retain our own laws. Therefore questions about nationality cannot be interpreted in every case in the same way.

I am not sure that, even if it had been brought home to the knowledge of this gentleman that the affiliation had been broken up, there might not have been considerable ground for saying still that upon the face of his proceedings he did intend to benefit Scotland and not to benefit England. That this bequest is mixed up with a number of other bequests is significant. He gave instructions to his solicitor to draw up his will in a particular form, and he gave instructions and notes. In note 22 we have a string of bequests, and each of these is a bequest for the purpose of helping some institution in Scotland except this one, if the contention of the London Society is sound. Practically in the middle of the list you have —the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children £500.

If there is room for interpretation at all in such a case, I should say that if there is a National Scottish Society for the purpose of preventing cruelty to children it would be reasonable to read his bequest as meaning that it is that Society he desires to favour. But I do not think there is any necessity to go upon that in the special circumstances of this case, where most undoubtedly at the time he gave these instructions the instructions meant that the £500 was to go to Scotland and not to England. That being so, I think it is vain to say that he must have seen—because he was a Scotsman—that some alteration had taken place as regards affiliation and that that made a difference. There is no evidence that he had seen it; and there is no evidence either of any desire on his

* The following cases were cited in the course of the argument:—Charter v. Charter, (1874) L. R., 7 H. L. 364; In re Kilvert's Trusts, (1871) L. R., 12 Eq. 183, 7 Ch. App. 170; In re Wolverton Mortgaged Estates, (1877) 7 Ch. D. 197; Higgins v. Dawson, [1902] A. C. 1, at p. 10; In re Fish, [1894] 2 Ch. 83; Henderson v. Henderson, [1905] 1 Ir. R. 353, at pp. 358-9; Wilson's Executors v. Scottish Society for the Conversion of Israel, (1869) 8 Macph. 233, at p. 237; Murdoch v. Magistrates and Ministers of Glasgow, (1827) 6 S. 186; Johstone's Executors v. Johnstone, (1902) 10 S. L. T. 42; Jarman on Wills, (6th edition) vol. i. pp. 513, 518.

EARL LOREBURN.—I greatly regret, and I am sure every one will greatly regret, that there should have been this unfortunate litigation between two most excellent societies, both of whom must command our entire sympathy; but, if there is any recompense to those who have heard the argument, we must find it in the excellence of the arguments which have been addressed to us on both sides.

In this case a Scotsman living in Scotland left, by a Scotch will, £500 to "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," using that name to describe the legatees. That is a society with its head-quarters in London, which does not appear actively to operate in Scotland. Now, there is a "Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" also in existence, and it claims that, under the circumstances, it is entitled to this bequest. The Courts in Scotland have part whatever to benefit the Society in England, whereas he did indicate an interest in the prevention of cruelty to children in his neighbourhood, and knew that there was a society and that it had officials for the purpose of carrying out the work of the society.

---

On the whole matter, and really without difficulty, I come to the conclusion that the judgment the Lord Ordinary pronounced has not been impinged upon by the proof which has been led, but rather supported, and that we ought to adhere to his interlocutor.

LORD SALVESEN.—I also agree that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary ought to be affirmed. I think, however, that we have got the grounds of judgment more clearly now that the facts have been inquired into. To use the language which is quoted by the Lord Ordinary from the opinion of Lord Chancellor Cairns in the case of Charter (L. R., 7 H. L. 364), the facts which were known to the testator at the time that he made his will ought to be known to the Court, so that the Court may place itself in the testator's position in order to ascertain the bearing and application of the language which he uses.

Now the facts as so ascertained are that this gentleman was a Scotsman whose whole interests were in Scotland, who very rarely visited England at all, who knew of the existence of the Scottish Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children in Scotland, and who was not known to have had any knowledge whatever of the English Society. The objects of his beneficence otherwise are purely Scottish. These being the ascertained facts of the case I think there can be no moral doubt that when the testator used the designation the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children he intended to benefit the Scottish Society. I agree with what your Lordship in the chair has said, that the word "national" may be used in two senses. A Scotsman generally speaks of institutions the full name of which may be "Scottish National" or the "National of Scotland" by using the description "National." He feels no occasion when he is speaking in Scotland to differentiate the institutions of this country from institutions similarly named in England. He speaks of a Scottish thing in Scotland, and he speaks of it as a Scotsman generally does.

This is not a case of a designation which does not fit a Scottish society such as the testator intended to benefit. No doubt it is true that the designation is the complete designation of the London Society, and is not the complete designation of the Scottish Society, because the London Society having come into existence first it was necessary to differentiate between the two by indicating that the sphere of operations of the Scottish Society was confined to Scotland. At the same time one cannot resist the view

July 14, 1914.

Naamyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Earl Loreburn.

said we will examine—and they did examine—the circumstances of the testator, and the evidence in regard to his presumed intention, and they came to the conclusion that the testator did really intend to benefit, not the society which he had by name designated, but the Scottish National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

I regret, as I always must do in differing from the Court of Session, that I am unable to come to that conclusion. When Mr Younger opened his argument he laid down, as a general proposition, that when once a persona is accurately named in a will then the rigid rule descends which forbids under any circumstances any further inquiry or consideration in regard to the person who is to take the benefit. I am not prepared to affirm so wide a statement. I do not enter upon it now. If I did so, the discussion would be academic, and it is not necessary for the decision that the testator's intention was to benefit the Scottish Society, of which he knew, and not to benefit a society with which he had never come in contact, and of which, so far as the evidence goes, he had no knowledge whatever.

---

It is an additional specialty of this case, to which your Lordship has referred, that at the time the will was drawn the funds bequeathed by Scottish testators to the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children would, under a domestic arrangement between the Scottish branch and the general Society, have gone to Scotland. But apart from that altogether, I think here there is sufficient ambiguity in the designation which the testator used to admit of proof of his intention, as that intention can be gathered from the language he used in relation to the surrounding circumstances and the state of the testator's knowledge.

On these grounds, which are substantially those on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded, I am of opinion that his interlocutor should be affirmed.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary had assumed certain facts which it was thought desirable should be investigated. I think the result of the proof is to show that the Lord Ordinary was right in the view he took of the facts, as well as in the result which he reached in reference to the will itself. With reference to the will, which was the second will, the testator was Scottish with none but Scottish interests, the trustees were Scottish, and, with the possible exception of the legacy in question, all the legacies are to Scottish beneficiaries, the one in question being embedded between a legacy to the Edinburgh Deaf and Dumb Benevolent Society and a legacy to the Edinburgh Hospital for Incurables, the Longmore Hospital.

It is certainly not impossible, even in such circumstances, that the testator might have desired to benefit the English Society, which no doubt is in itself an excellent Society, and is dealing incidentally with Scottish children in England. But certainly, although not impossible, it would not be probable that, being interested as he evidently was in children, he should make a bequest to a society which is purely an English Society, having only an incidental and remote interest, the one I have mentioned, in Scottish children.

Mr Constable argued that there was no room here for evidence at all, because the description of the English Society, which he represents, is exactly given by the testator, and that is a description which does not fit any other society; and he maintained that, if his clients were in that position, the Court was bound to give effect to his claim without any other consideration. It is not necessary to consider what the result might be of this case. I will only take leave to observe that an extreme danger is apt to lurk in general rules like that. Some unforeseen circumstances may arise. No one—not even a Judge—can prophesy all the events of the future, and the Court may find itself confronted by a rule, which, applied in unexpected conditions, might lead to something quite shocking to its sense of justice. After that had happened a series of refinements upon that rule might find their way into the Law Reports, until in the end the Courts would rebel against further subtlety. Quite recently a venerable rule of equity—or supposed rule of equity—which had been long undermined, was finally and of necessity exploded by a decision of this House.

I think that the true ground upon which to base a decision in this case is this, that the accurate use of a name in a will creates a strong presumption against any rival claiming who is not the possessor of the name mentioned in the will. It is a very strong presumption, and one which cannot be overcome except in exceptional circumstances. I use, as a convenient method of expressing one's thought, the term presumption. What I mean is that what a man has said ought to be acted upon, unless it is clearly proved that he meant something different from what he said. Mr Shaw, in an argument from which I derived profit as well as pleasure, said that you have first to establish an ambiguity, and that then the scales would be even. The statement in itself, if you do establish an ambiguity, is an accurate statement. In that way he proposed to displace presumption.

---

in a case where you had a description which did not contain any word that was possibly ambiguous, such as some of the illustrations which were given to us in the course of the argument. Here you certainly have the adjective "national," a word which seems to me to introduce such ambiguity as makes it possible for evidence to be competently submitted to the Court.

If evidence is to be considered, then it appears that the parties are agreed as to the origin of this bequest. It goes back to the year 1904, at which time a legacy, in the terms here contained, would have gone to the Scottish Society, and would have been spent for the benefit of children in Scotland. Moreover, these notes, which are under that date, were the foundation of the will of 1906, the first will he made. At that time the same result would have followed, because it was not until 1907 that the alteration was made under which we are now considering the present question.

The will of 1911 which we are now considering is, however, admitted to be, in the words of Mr Constable's clients, "a verbatim copy of an earlier will made by him in 1906." That seems to me, as your Lordship in the chair has said, to be a special element, which would be sufficient for the decision of this case; but if one looks at evidence contained in the proof and other matters, it appears that the testator, so far as we know, never heard of the English Society. He was not a member of the Scottish Society and did not contribute to it, but he certainly knew about it and had an interest in it, that interest being in regard to a particular case connected with his own estate, which got the benefit of the Society's operations.

On the whole matter I think there can be no moral doubt whatever of the man's intention; and I think there are ample legal grounds for supporting the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

July 14, 1914.

Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Earl Loreburn.

I do not think that in this case any ambiguity has been established. The position is that the name of a certain society has been used, and it is necessary for those who question the right of that society to displace that. Counsel for the respondents sought to do so by saying that the name of a society is not necessarily to be treated in the same way as that of an individual, and the presumption is not so strong that the Society was intended, as in the case of an individual. It is a circumstance perhaps to be considered, but I confess I do not see that there is much difference between the two.

It was then urged that in the mouth of a Scotsman the use of the term "National Society" would of itself mean the Scottish Society; but it must be remembered that the testator here used this term, not as expressive of his own thoughts, but as part of a title or name which had been adopted by people living outside Scotland. It was then urged that the other charitable bequests in the will were given to Scottish charities. I do not see what conclusion is to be derived from that. Perhaps that is a reason for thinking that in this part of the will England should participate. It was said that, being a Scotsman, he probably meant to benefit Scotsmen. I should think that very likely; but I do not know why he would not also wish to benefit others of his countrymen living in the southern part of the island. We were told that all his interest and his residence were to be found in Scotland, and that he actually knew of a case, and had had brought to his notice a case, in which the Scottish National Society had intervened.

I think that concludes the evidence by which it is sought to strike out from a will the name of the Society designated in that will to receive the bounty of the testator, and to substitute the name of another society, of which there is actually no proof that the testator ever heard. With the utmost respect to their Lordships of the Court of Session, I am quite unable to accept that view, and I think this appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord Dunedin.—I candidly regret that I do not see my way to differ from the opinion that has just been expressed, because I cannot help having the moral feeling that this money is probably going to the society to which, if we could have asked him, the testator would not have sent it. But that is not the question for a court of law, the question for a court of law is, taking the will as it stands, who is the beneficiary—what is the meaning of the words used? On the one hand we have a perfectly full and perfectly accurate description of an existing society, of the existence of which the testator may quite well have known, although upon that matter our minds must necessarily be a blank. On the other hand we have a description which, if taken as the description of another society, is not fully accurate.

I think that the argument, as is really almost conceded now, of the appellants' learned counsel in this matter went too far. He would have it that so long as you had an accurate description of one person, and that accurate description did not exactly fit in its terms another person, no ambiguity could arise. I do not think that is the law. I think that the test whether the ambiguity does arise would be quite fairly indicated in what I ventured to put at a very early stage of the argument, namely, Would the description, standing as it does, supposing there had been no competitor who had the exact name, have fitted the second competitor? If that is so, I think the question of ambiguity arises; but then that question of ambiguity has to be solved. The effect of a question of ambiguity arising is this, that it allows of an inquiry not into intention, but into any such facts and circumstances as may help to give you a key to the meaning of the words which the testator used.

Now, we have gone into that inquiry. I do not myself put it, so much as my noble and learned friend who has just spoken has done, as a presumption, but I put it thus: that here you have an accurate description of the one person, and a description which is admittedly not quite accurate of the other. You must, I think have positive evidence of some cogent sort to make you prefer the latter to the former. Such evidence, unfortunately, in this case I do not find. I do not think there is anything here in the very meagre facts which are before us which can make me prefer a description which is admittedly short of perfect accuracy to one which suffers under no such defect; and I therefore concur in the motion which my noble and learned friend proposes to make.

Lord Atkinson.—I concur with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. I think that in this case the testator has used the well-known name of a certain society. In the name itself there is nothing ambiguous or difficult to construe and, prima facie, of course, those words in which he describes it should receive their ordinary meaning.

Now, it is sought to show that he meant some other society, not the society which he so describes; but it appears to me that this one circumstance disposes of the case, that there is no sufficient evidence to show that he intended to benefit any society different from that which he has accurately described. His language is in no way ambiguous. He selects the name and description of the society, which it bears and which no other society bears. I think therefore that there is no just reason for applying any principles applicable to a case where an ambiguity is raised on the face of a man's will to a will whose terminology is clear and unambiguous.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—I agree with the judgment pronounced by the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack.

Lord Parmoor.—I agree with the judgment pronounced by the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack. I think the leading principle in all cases of this character is that the Court has not to make a will but to interpret the words which the testator has used. On this occasion I can find no ambiguity. The words he used are "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children," which are the actual words to be found in the charter which was granted to this society a few years ago. I also agree—as was said by the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack—that it is important to remember that the descriptive words in this case were not selected by the testator. The arguments which we have had addressed to us as to the use of the word "National" are hardly relevant to the present case. The words here to which attention has been called are not the words of the testator at all, but are descriptive words taken from an outside document.

July 14, 1914.

Nasmyth's Trustees v. National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

So far as the extrinsic facts are concerned, I think that most of the evidence here is quite irrelevant and inadmissible, but so far as it is relevant and admissible it appears to me to be of little or no assistance.

Lord Parmoor.

I agree with the view put forward by the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack, that the accurate use of the name "The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children" creates a very strong presumption in favour of the institution so named, a presumption which can only be rebutted in some abnormal case of a special character. I think that no evidence has been brought before your Lordships' House which in any way interferes with the principle that the language used by the testator should be given its ordinary natural meaning, and I think that the language is precise and accurate.

I agree with the motion of the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed with costs.

CHURCH, RACKHAM & Co.—JOHN BURNS, W.S.—LITHGOW & PEFFER—R. C. GRAY & PATON, S.S.C.

No. 9.

July 16, 1914.

THE FARMERS' MART, LIMITED, (Pursuers) Appellants.—Sandeman, K.C.—Holman Gregory, K.C.—W. Mitchell.
JOHN MILNE, (Defender) Respondent.—Younger, K.C.—Wilton.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Contract—Pactum illicitum—Trustee in bankruptcy—Agreement to share fees with certain creditors.

A firm of land-agents agreed with their manager that all fees which he earned from any appointment which he might obtain as trustee or factor on any estate should be pooled with all fees which they derived as salesmen or valuators in connection with that estate, and that the fees so pooled, after payment to the firm of the balance of any debt due to them by such estate, should be divided equally between the parties.

In an action by the firm against their manager to recover, under this agreement, a proportion of fees alleged to have been earned by him as trustee on various insolvent estates.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division, but on different grounds) that the agreement was illegal and therefore unenforceable, in respect that it involved a violation of the fundamental principle of bankruptcy law providing for the equal distribution of assets among creditors; and action dismissed.

Ld. Dunedin. Ld. Atkinson. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

(IN the Court of Session, 9th December 1913—infra, Court of Session Cases, p. 129.)

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 14th and 16th July 1914.[1]

[1] The following cases which were not referred to in the argument in the Court of Session were cited in the House of Lords:—Waugh v. Morris, (1873) L. R., 8 Q. B. 202, at p. 208; Hire Purchase Furnishing Co., Limited v. Richens, (1888) 20 Q. B. D. 387, at p. 389; Lewis v. Davison, (1839) 8 L. J. Exch. 78; Holman v. Johnson, (1775) 1 Cowper, 341.

July 16, 1914.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

LORD DUNEDIN.—In this case the pursuers and appellants are a firm of auctioneers who carry on business also as valuers, and they made an agreement with the defender, the respondent, to act for them as manager. The agreement dealt with the terms of his employment, and included a fifth clause, upon which the question arises. The fifth clause provides that "The second party"—that is the defender—"shall be entitled, but shall not be bound, to undertake any factorship or trusteeship on, or other office involving the management of, any estate, provided always that before undertaking any such factorship, trusteeship, or office, he shall first obtain the consent of the first parties, unless in the case of a testamentary or other gratuitous trusteeship, executorship, or factorship, any of which he shall be entitled to accept without the consent of the first parties," that is the pursuers; and then it provides that any fees that the second party derives from such employment shall (I am reading the clause short) "be pooled with all fees and commissions, including fees for measurements derived by the first parties from any sales or valuations in connection with any such estate . . . and the proceeds therefore shall be divided in the proportion of one-half to the first parties, and the other half to the second party, provided always that before any such division shall take place there shall out of said proceeds be paid to the first parties the balance of any debt remaining due to them from such estate, after giving credit for all sums received, or falling to be received, on account of such debt, and that whether from the principal or any subsidiary or collateral obligant therefor, or from the respective estate of any such obligants."

The effect of that agreement is not doubtful. If the defender acted as a trustee in a sequestration he would in terms of this agreement be bound to put the fees that he got as remuneration as trustee into a pool with any fees which they, the pursuers, got for employment which he gave them as trustee, and then in the division there would not be absolutely equal division of those pooled fees, but before anything else the pursuers, if they were creditors on the estate on which he was a trustee, would receive such an allowance over and above the dividends which they would get in common with ordinary creditors as would give them 20s. in the £. The action is raised in the form of a count and reckoning by the pursuers against the defender, in which he is asked for a count and reckoning of the particulars set forth of three particular occasions on which he acted as trustee and in respect of which transactions they say there is money due to them upon an accounting, if the accounting is worked out in terms of that very clause which I have just read. To that action the defender pled by his third plea that "The agreement founded upon by the pursuers being void, in respect it is corrupt and illegal, the pursuers cannot maintain the present action, and the same ought to be dismissed"; and that is the plea to which the learned Judges of the Second Division have given effect.

As to the general proposition that you cannot sue upon an illegal contract, there is, of course, no doubt; the question is whether a contract of this sort is an illegal contract. Now, taking it upon Scotch authority first, before coming to English authority, I find that the matter is very

July 16, 1914.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Ld. Dunedin.

clearly dealt with, as it always is, by Mr Bell in his Principles. After setting forth that there are such things as illegal and immoral contracts, he deals in section 37 with contracts void at common law. He first sets forth contracts properly immoral, contra bonos mores, then certain rules as to pactum illicitum, and so on; and then he says this: "Contracts for indecent or mischievous purposes or considerations, or prejudicial or offensive to the public or to third parties, or inconsistent with public law or arrangements are invalid." One best sees what is the true meaning of the words he there uses by going to the illustrations that he gives in the note in which he sets forth the cases on which his proposition is founded; and in the clause which I have read,—"prejudicial or offensive to the public or to third parties"—he adds this "such are, exempli gratia, agreements in which a creditor in fraud of an agreement to accept a composition stipulates for a preference to himself"; and he gives a reference to his well-known work—the large work—Commentaries on the Law of Scotland. Now the Commentaries give more than one illustration of this matter. They give the one I have just read, and they give also a case where a creditor has got a sum in order to accede to a trustee; that is a case, not of regular sequestration, but of private arrangement with the creditor where his concurrence has been bought. And another very good instance of the same thing is given by a case which is referred to in Lord Hunter's judgment and has been cited to your Lordships—the case of M'Gown v. Tod in the Faculty Collection.[1]

Now the truth is that a case of this sort really comes in either division; it is not only prejudicial to third parties, but it is inconsistent with public law and arrangement; and it is equally inconsistent with public law and arrangement whether it contravenes an actual section of the Bankruptcy Act, of which Thomas v. Waddell[2] may be taken as an example, or whether it goes against those general principles which are just as much applied to private arrangements even in Scotland—as trust deeds—as they are to the general arrangements which are prescribed in a sequestration.

I have so far kept only to Scotch authority. In English authority the matter is dealt with in precisely the same way. I note in the admirable work on Contracts by Sir Frederick Pollock that he expresses the matter in almost the same terms as Mr Bell, where he says[3]: "An agreement will generally be illegal, though the matter of it may not be an indictable offence, and though the formation of it may not amount to the offence of conspiracy, if it contemplates any civil injury to third persons." And then he goes on and points out that when you come to this question of agreement in fraud of creditors you may really look at it from either point of view—either bearing directly on the sentence I have just read, or bearing on the general idea of being an interference with general arrangements of justice. So that if you look at the agreement and take it as it stands with this provision that in certain circumstances—that is to say, whenever these people are creditors—they are to eke out their dividends by getting from the trustee part of his remuneration, I think it is clearly an illegal bargain.

[1] 13th December 1808, F. C. [2] (1869) 7 Macph. 558.
[3] 8th ed., at p. 292.

But that does not quite end the matter, because it might be said that the persons who really are prejudiced in this way are the other creditors, and this litigation is not a matter with which the other creditors have anything to do. There, again, I think the matter has been settled by a long course of decisions. The test was laid down so long ago as 1816 in the case of Simpson v. Bloss,[1] and the headnote there expresses it perfectly correctly: "The test, whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law, is whether the plaintiff requires any aid from the illegal transaction to establish his case." The same thing was again said in the very celebrated case of Fivaz v. Nicholls,[2] in which Chief Justice Tindal says[3]: "I think that this case may be determined on the short ground that the plaintiff is unable to establish his claim as stated upon the record, without relying upon the illegal agreement originally entered into between himself and the defendant." It was repeated again in 1869 in the case of Taylor v. Chester,[4] where Mr Justice Mellor says: "The true test for determining whether or not the plaintiff and the defendant were in pari delicto" (he is there referring to the words of Lord Mansfield in the leading case of Holman v. Jackson,[5] which was quoted to your Lordships) "is by considering whether the plaintiff could make out his case otherwise than through the medium and by the aid of the illegal transaction to which he was himself a party." And it was again applied in the case of Scott v. Brown, Doering, M'Nab, & Company, in 1892.[6]

Now, taking that test here, it seems to me to solve the whole matter. The pursuers have solved it for themselves, because they cannot get the accounting they seek without getting it through the aid of that very clause which I have already said was illegal; they want that very clause to help them. And it is this test that really turns the flank of all those cases which have been quoted by Mr Holman Gregory. There are certain cases where an agreement is so divisible that it may be that the pursuer or plaintiff can enforce his demand without having recourse to the illegal part of the agreement, but here the pursuers cannot do so, because the only reason why they want this accounting is in order that, when the money has been pooled, they may be allowed to get 20s. in the £ in respect of the three transactions set forth.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from is right, and I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord Atkinson.—I entirely concur. I think this is a case of the greatest possible simplicity. The pursuers sue for an account of certain moneys received by the defender, and they base their right to get an account on a certain clause in this agreement. The moneys in respect of which they ask for an account are moneys received in three bankruptcy matters in which the defender was trustee. It is alleged that there were [1] (1816) 7 Taunton, 246.

[2] (1846) 2 C. B. 501.
[3] Ibid., at p. 512.
[4] (1869) L. R., 4 Q. B. 309, at p. 314.
[5] 1 Cowper, 341.
[6] [1892] 2 Q. B. 724.

July 16, 1914.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Ld. Atkinson.

other matters in which he was trustee, but they are not specifically mentioned. The pursuers, however, sue for an account in reference to the moneys he received as trustee.

Now what is the particular clause of this agreement on which they base their right to that relief? There may be a dozen other clauses on which they would have other relief, but the particular clause that they wish to enforce here, and upon which they base their right to the relief that they claim, is the fifth clause, which to my mind is simply a device between the pursuers and the defender, in fraud of the bankruptcy laws, to secure to the pursuers a larger dividend than the other creditors in that estate are receiving. It is that, and nothing less. The provision is that this gentleman cannot act as trustee without their consent, and the clause of the agreement on which they rest their case might, I think, be conveniently stated thus: that, in consideration that they would consent to the defender acting as trustee in certain bankruptcy matters in which they were creditors, he would allow part of his remuneration, which was paid out of the assets, to be applied in part to secure to the plaintiffs a larger dividend than the other creditors in those bankruptcy matters were receiving.

I have not the slightest hesitation in holding that such an agreement is a fraud upon the bankruptcy laws, the great object of which, as distinguished from the Statute of Elizabeth, is not merely to secure that the assets of a bankrupt shall be distributed amongst his creditors, but that they shall be distributed equally. Equality is the great object and virtue of the Bankruptcy Acts, and it is to defeat that equality that this agreement was entered into.

For that, and for other reasons which have been given by the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack at greater length, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that this is an agreement which should not be enforced. Therefore the appeal must be dismissed, and the judgment below affirmed.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline:—This is an appeal from a decision of the Second Division of the Court of Session. Having looked carefully through the judgments of the learned Lords, I agree with the conclusion reached therein. But I do not find myself in agreement with the opinions and grounds of judgment stated by their Lordships, and it is only in view of this that I venture to add any observations of my own.

I agree with my noble and learned friends who have preceded me. I think this action is pivoted upon one fact, and essentially, in so far as it is relevant, upon one fact alone. It is an action directed by the former employers of the respondent, Mr Milne, in order to obtain from him an accounting with regard to certain receipts that he obtained in respect of transactions carried out under the terms of a certain agreement. That agreement under head 5 provides that Mr Milne, being the acting manager and valuator and auctioneer for this farmers' mart, should be entitled to accept, inter alia, trusteeships under arrangements with creditors, or under bankruptcy, and that his fees as trustee should be dealt with in the manner to which I will presently allude. In head 5 it is indicated that, being trustee of those estates, he shall, although there is no clause compelling him to do so, be entitled to employ his own firm for all purposes of valuations and the like.

The judgments in the Court below, in my opinion most unfortunately, give prominence, and, in the case of the Inner House, give entire prominence, to the relations thus existing between Mr Milne and his firm; and the ground upon which this agreement is said by the Second Division to be an improper arrangement which cannot be maintained is a ground of what their Lordships call double interest.

There are many cases in Scotland in which one member of a legal firm or a member of a firm of accountants becomes a trustee in bankruptcy also, and I have listened with some surprise to the argument that, because the firm of which that individual is a partner is employed without any suggestion of overcharges or the like in the business of the trust or the bankrupt estate, therefore a double interest has been created which entitles the parties to void the entire bargain.

All I will say upon that head at present is this: that in affirming the conclusion reached by the Second Division I must not (and I assume your Lordships are in the same position) be held to commit myself to any one of the propositions under which the Second Division reached that conclusion. It would require a very great deal of argument, as I am at present advised, to enable me to assent to the general and somewhat astonishing proposition of the Lord Justice-Clerk that "A contract of this kind may be innocent in the sense that it may be possible to carry it out without committing any illegality"; and his Lordship proceeds to say that if an innocent contract which might be carried out without any illegality might also be carried out by way of illegality, therefore the contract itself is a void contract. In building transactions there are what are known as time and lime contracts; in many transactions in which tradesmen are employed the customer is at the mercy of a tradesman, who, if he be dishonest, can act illegally and make overcharges and the like. There is hardly any innocent contract for the doing of an act or rendering of a service which may not, by reason of dishonesty, be converted into something improper. But I have never yet heard it suggested that that is a reason for voiding such a contract. And I withhold my assent entirely from the argument contained in the judgments both of the Lord Justice-Clerk and of Lord Guthrie under the head of there being that double interest which made this contract a voidable bargain.

But there is a much simpler approach to real justice in this case, and it is that which I am glad to think your Lordships have taken. Under head 5 of this agreement it is provided that when the fees of the trustee in bankruptcy come to be pooled along with the auctioneering and other charges of the firm by which he was employed, then out of these proceeds there shall be paid to the first parties—that is to say, to the appellants—the balance of any debt remaining due to them from such estate. I agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson in the language he has just employed. That is a distinct bargain of an illicit character.

This does not depend in Scotland on any Act of Parliament although,

July 16, 1914.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

if the statute of 1856 and other Bankruptcy Acts were applied to it, it would be found that there is confirmation, in every line of those provisions against illegal preferences, of the proposition that when once an estate is thrown into bankruptcy every creditor upon that estate is entitled in the distribution of its assets to equal terms and nothing but equal terms. Special preferences created under special contracts or by special circumstances there may be, but that is the general rule. But equality of treatment is destroyed if, in respect of any services rendered by the trustee, he has a private bargain with certain creditors that out of his fees they shall be preferred as to the balance unpaid to them out of the estate in general. It is manifest that the trustee in such circumstances is in the position of having to distribute a part of his fees to one set of creditors in preference to others. If that part of his fees was distributable among creditors at all, it was distributable among the whole body. Accordingly, on that ground I should be prepared to affirm the conclusion reached by the learned Lords of the Second Division, although by no means for any of the reasons assigned in their judgments.

I have dwelt upon this because it occurred to me, when I read the judgment of the Second Division, that this case could surely not have been argued as it was presented at your Lordships' bar in the Court below. But Mr Wilton has assured me that it was so argued, and I call your Lordships' attention to a passage in the judgment of Lord Hunter upon this subject. Anything under the hand of Lord Hunter is entitled to great weight, and his Lordship puts the matter in this way: "The stipulation as to the pursuers receiving payment in full of any debt due to them by the bankrupt out of the fees of the defender as trustee appears to me to be an unfortunate condition, but I have not been able to satisfy myself that it is corrupt or of such a character as to justify me in sustaining the defender's plea to the effect of wholly disregarding the agreement between the parties." In the view that I take it is much more than an unfortunate condition; it is a condition expressly contrary to that equality of honest distribution of the estate which ought to prevail in all bargains with respect to trusteeships of sequestrated estates in Scotland.

But Mr Holman Gregory said, and said with much force, that this occurs only in one clause of the contract; and the action is a general one for count and reckoning, and may apply to a series of circumstances in which it did not operate. Most unhappily for such an argument, the language of the condescendence of the pursuers makes this unavailing. I find on a perusal of this record that the broad proposition radically affecting the finance of the matter and the claims of the appellants occurs in cond. 5, where there is a reference to an unpaid balance of £168 due from the estate of a Mr John Fairweather. With regard to that unpaid balance, the scheme of the present count and reckoning is this, that that unpaid balance, in the language of cond. 5, "falls to be first paid to the pursuers out of the sum pooled in terms of said article fifth," that is to say, it falls to be paid out of the trustee's own remuneration.

I do not think Mr Wilton, in drawing these pleadings, was wrong when he stated that "such a transaction if carried out would be a fraud upon the other creditors who accepted their dividends in the belief that all the creditors, including the pursuers, were receiving equality of treatment from the defender as trustee." I think that is a sound proposition; it is in accordance with all that equitable distribution of assets under the law of Scotland. (I may say in passing that I have not heard anything in the argument to suggest to me that any different rule from that prevailing north of the Tweed prevails to the south of it.)

July 16, 1914.
Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

I agree with the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

APPEAL dismissed with costs.

HELDER, ROBERTS, WALTON, & GILES—TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—GRAHAMES, CURREY, & SPENS—J. C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.

No. 10.

MRS MARY KERR OR LENDRUM AND ANOTHER, (Pursuers) Appellants.
Clement A. Edwards—W. T. Wetenhall.
AYR STEAM SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED, (Defenders) Respondents.
—Horne, K.C.—Alex. Neilson.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Unexplained death—Seaman found drowned—Inference from proved facts.

In a claim for compensation by the dependants of a ship steward, who was last seen alive in his bunk, and was found drowned next day in the harbour near to the place where his ship had been lying, the arbitrator awarded compensation.

Circumstances in which the House of Lords (rev. judgment of the Second Division) diss. Lord Dunedin and Lord Atkinson, affirmed the award of the arbitrator, holding that there was evidence from which a reasonable man might draw the inference that the accident which caused death arose out of the employment.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58)—C. A. S. 1913, L. xiii. 17 (g)—Process—Appeal by Stated Case—Remit to arbitrator for further information.

Observations on the principles which should guide the Court in remitting stated cases back to the arbitrator for further information.

(IN the Court of Session, 5th December 1912—1913 S. C. 331.)
The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords.
The case was heard on 16th July 1914.[1]
At delivering judgment on 17th July 1914,—

Earl Loreburn.
Ld. Dunedin.
Ld. Atkinson.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.
Lord Parmoor.

EARL LOREBURN.—In this case the arbitrator found that the applicant came within the statute, and awarded compensation accordingly. The Court of Session set aside the award, and the question before your Lordships is simply this—Was the conclusion of the arbitrator such as a reasonable man could reach? In the case of Mackinnon v. Miller,[2] Lord Dunedin laid down that principle and it is now quite ascertained. Any

[1] The following cases which were not referred to in the argument in the Court of Session were cited in the House of Lords:—Hawkins v. Powells Tillery Steam Coal Co., [1911] 1 K. B. 988; Macdonald v. Owners of s.s. "Banana," [1908] 2 K. B. 926.

[2] 1909 S. C. 373.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Earl Loreburn.

of us may think that we can see the truth better than the arbitrator. Perhaps we may be right, perhaps we may be wrong. It is, however, no business of ours. We have no jurisdiction to decide the question of fact as we think right. Our jurisdiction is confined to the more modest duty already described.

The deceased was steward on a ship lying in harbour. He was lying in his bunk. The captain told him to get tea ready for the men. The next thing known is that he disappeared and was found some time later drowned in the sea. He was sober. He was subject to nausea. The bulwarks were 3 feet 5 inches above the deck. These are, to my mind, the material facts found by the arbitrator in the case stated.

This class of case has led to much refinement. I do not find it very profitable to consider whether the arbitrator's award proceeded on inference or on some kind of speculation, which was described in argument by four words successively, namely, conjecture, probability, guess, and surmise. I am not qualified, and I do not know anyone who is qualified, to draw a precise line between the thoughts suggested by these several words. They seem to me to run into one another. Nor can I define wherein any of them differ from an inference.

Nor am I impressed by arguments proceeding upon a comparison between the facts of one case and the facts of another. Precedents are valuable and authoritative when they lay down a principle. They are otherwise merely illustrations of the way in which Judges look at facts. Unfortunately, Judges are human like other people, and different Judges look at facts differently. Nothing has struck me more than this circumstance. When the question is whether or not an arbitrator, as a reasonable man, could arrive at a particular conclusion, I find that in some instances Courts have held that he could not, while some of the Judges who took part in the decision have actually agreed in the conclusion. That is my position to-day. I hope I am a reasonable man, but if I had been the arbitrator, I should, on the facts that he has found, have come to exactly the same conclusion. I think the moral is that we should regard these awards in a very broad way, and constantly remember that we are not the tribunal to decide. I shall always be slow to say that no reasonable person could think differently from myself.

This man was in his bed, and a few minutes afterwards he was in the water. Murder is negatived. Suicide is negatived. No suggestion was made either of the one or the other, and the arbitrator has negatived both. He was on the ship—a place of some danger if you are careless—in pursuance of his duty. It was not found that he had withdrawn himself from his duty. I really do not know whether he fell overboard because he was trying to vomit over the ship's side. I think he must have fallen over by accident while on board as his duty required. But my opinion is not the point. The point is that the arbitrator took that view; and though I could understand his taking a different view, I think there was evidence which justified him in inferring that the man died by accident arising out of his employment. It surely cannot be necessary to show either the particular way in which he fell or the particular thing he was doing when he fell. An applicant has to prove his case, but he is not required to demonstrate his case or to exclude by evidence every possibility that may be suggested.

Accordingly, I think this appeal should be allowed.

I desire to add a few words about the remit. Where a case is stated incompletely or ambiguously, a Court may remit for further information. But I think that here the remit went beyond that. Among other things, it asked some questions which must have been suggested at the bar from perusal of the evidence, the answers to which would not affect the question whether or not there was sufficient evidence to support the award. A remit is not intended to assist the Court in substituting itself for the arbitrator.

Lord Atkinson.—I regret that with every disposition to come to the same conclusion as my noble and learned friends I have been unable to do so. I concur, however, on the question of remit. I think that cases should be remitted where the findings of the arbitrator are incomplete and ambiguous or obscure. Since the superior Court cannot look at the evidence, it is necessary that the findings on important facts should be clear and precise, and if they are neither clear nor precise it is, I think, the privilege and the duty of the Court before which the case comes to remit it to the arbitrator in order that he may make complete what was incomplete, and make plain what was obscure. I concur, however, that in this case the remit was directed to matters that were really not relevant or bearing upon the important facts.

In this case the widow of Edward Lendrum, deceased, and Edward Lendrum, her son, sued the respondents under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 to recover compensation in respect of the death on the 16th December 1911 of the deceased, alleged to be caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a steward in a ship of the appellant company named the "Turnberry." The arbitrator, the Sheriff-substitute, has found in favour of the applicants' claim (1) that the deceased met his death by an accident arising out of his employment, and (2) that he met with this accident in the course of his employment. And the question of law put by the arbitrator in the case stated for the opinion of the Second Division is, to use his own language, whether on the facts admitted and proved he was justified in so finding. By the word "justified" he must, on the authorities, be held, I think, to have meant whether upon the evidence in the case his findings on these two points were conclusions which, as a reasonable man, he might in good faith have arrived at. It is not disputed that the employment of the deceased was a continuous employment as distinguished from an intermittent employment. In my view, however, that consideration is wholly immaterial. Whether a workman's employment be continuous or intermittent, those claiming compensation in respect of his death are bound to prove that the death resulted from an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the workman's employment. That burden of proof is as heavy in the one case as in the other, and it must be discharged by the same means and according to the same rules of evidence in the one case as in the other. It is not, I think, legitimate in the case of a continuous employment any more than it would be in the case of an intermittent employment if suicide and external violence be negatived, as it was said to be, to assume that an unexplained accident, as it has been styled, arose out of the workman's employment. By an unexplained accident in this connection I mean an accident the evidence as to which does not show how it occurred, or shows with equal cogency that it may have occurred in two or more distinct and different ways, or be the result of two or more distinct and different causes.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Ld. Atkinson.

I think the case of Wakelin v. The London and South-Western Railway Company,[1] which has been so often referred to, decided by Lords Halsbury, Watson, Blackburn, and Fitzgerald, has a bearing upon this case. There the action was brought against the railway company for so negligently and unskilfully driving their train across a certain level-crossing, and so neglecting to take precautions in respect of the train at the level-crossing, that the train struck and killed the plaintiff's husband, whose dead body was found near the level-crossing in a condition which showed that he was struck by the passing train. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. It was necessary for the plaintiff to show that the company were guilty of negligence which caused her husband's death. It was assumed for the purpose of the decision that the company had been guilty of negligence in not whistling as the train approached the level-crossing, but it was held that there was no evidence to connect that negligence with the accident, that there was therefore no case to go to the jury, and that the company were not liable. Lord Halsbury, at page 45 of the Report, is reported to have expressed himself thus: "In this case I am unable to see any evidence of how this unfortunate calamity occurred. One may surmise, and it is but surmise and not evidence, that the unfortunate man was knocked down by a passing train while on the level-crossing; but, assuming in the plaintiff's favour that fact to be established, is there anything to show that the train ran over the man rather than that the man ran against the train?" And Lord Watson, with whose judgment Lord Blackburn expressed his agreement said, at page 49: "The evidence appears to me to show that the injuries which caused the death of Henry Wakelin were occasioned by contact with an engine or a train belonging to the respondents, and I am willing to assume, although I am by no means satisfied that it has also been proved, that they [the company] were in certain respects negligent. The evidence goes no further. It affords ample materials for conjecturing that the death may possibly have been occasioned by that negligence, but it furnishes no data from which an inference can be reasonably drawn that as a matter of fact it was so occasioned."

I feel that I follow a good example in using the language of those noble Lords. I think the principle of that judgment applies to the present case. In this case, as in that, the claimant, the plaintiff or plaintiffs, was or were bound to produce evidence furnishing data from which an inference could reasonably be drawn as a matter of fact that the particular fact or circumstance from which liability arose existed. In that case this fact was the existence of negligence causing the injury. In the present case the fact is that the accident arose out of and in the course of her husband's employment. If the evidence be equally consistent with the accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and not arising out of and in the course of his employment, the burden of proof which lay upon the plaintiffs has not been discharged. If there be no evidence to support the affirmative issue rather than the negative, the evidence in truth becomes perfectly neutral. And the conclusions of the arbitrator, however confidently and positively asserted to be findings of fact, are in truth mere guesses or surmises, which, with equal justification and plausibility, might have taken quite an opposite form.

[1] (1886) 12 App. Cas. 41.

Now I turn to the evidence. This vessel, the "Turnberry," was on the 16th of December 1911 lying in the harbour of Larne. There is no evidence as to the state of the weather, or as to where or how the ship was moored, or whether she was motionless or to any extent labouring. A map of the ship was produced and proved, but beyond such evidence as this map affords there is no evidence whatever as to the condition of the vessel's deck, whether it was slippery and encumbered or dry and clean. From the map it appears that the rail of the bulwarks was 3 feet 5 inches above the ship's deck, and it is found that the deceased man was 5 feet 6 inches in stature. The deceased served the crew of the ship with breakfast in the usual way. The crew then rested. The ship was to sail at 6 P.M. on this day, and until shortly before that hour the deceased had no meal to prepare. It was customary for him to rest in the afternoon, especially on the afternoon of Saturday, as he would get little sleep on Friday night, when his work was heavy. From the map it appears that there is a deck-house on this vessel containing a saloon, an ill-ventilated room, containing the bunk in which the deceased slept, a pantry off this room, and a lavatory, which was the lavatory used by the deceased when on board. The room containing this bunk was entered directly from the saloon, and in going from it to the saloon the deceased would pass this lavatory. About four o'clock the captain of the ship went to the bunk of the deceased and told him to prepare tea for the crew before the ship sailed. Lendrum turned in his bunk, looked at the captain, but made no reply. The captain then saw that Lendrum had his waistcoat on, but could not tell whether he had his trousers or his coat on. Nor did he observe whether any of the clothes of the deceased were in the saloon. The captain some time afterwards sent the chief officer to see if Lendrum was preparing tea for the crew. This officer could not find him, and he and the captain went to search for him at about 5.30 P.M. and failed to find him, but they found on a settee in the saloon Lendrum's jacket, waistcoat, trousers, cap, neck-tie, collar, boots, purse, and watch, the latter two of which were not in his clothes, but on the settee beside his clothes. No underclothing was found. The body of the deceased dressed in his underclothing was found next day in the sea at a point between where the stern of the ship lay on the 16th of December and a certain neighbouring slip. It does not appear from the evidence what was the distance between this slip and the berth of the steamer, or whether the harbour was tidal or not, or, if so, what was the set of the tide at any time between the finding of the body and the departure of the ship, or whether the action of the screw or the paddles of the steamer as she started would have had any effect upon the body. It was plain from the evidence that the deceased met his death by drowning. No marks of violence were found upon him. Evidence was given as to a strange occurrence which took place when this ship apparently was lying in the harbour of Ayr. The deceased was seen hanging over her side by a rope which was fastened to the taffrail at one end and tied round his waist at the other, that he was holding on by the rope with both his hands held over his head, but was not in the water, and that he afterwards explained he did this to recover a towel which fell overboard. No date whatever is given for this occurrence, and no evidence as to whether any towel was seen overboard, or had fallen overboard, or what the man's condition or state of health was when this occurrence took place. The Sheriff-substitute finds that he was a good, temperate, sociable man, able to do his work, and pleasant to deal with, and though not a teetotaller, was never seen by his captain to be the worse for intoxicating liquor. He further finds that the deceased on this same night left his bunk, went on deck, and accidentally fell overboard and was drowned, and apparently that he did not commit suicide. If the learned Sheriff-substitute meant by this latter finding that it was not proved that the deceased committed suicide, and, the presumption being against suicide, that he, relying on that presumption, found against suicide, I think he was right; but if he meant that the evidence established affirmatively that the death was brought about by some cause other than suicide, I think he was clearly wrong. I find in several cases that the expression "suicide being negatived" is used in cases on this Act as if the evidence justified the conclusion that it was affirmatively proved that the death was due to some cause other than suicide, and not merely that the presumption against crime not having been rebutted the Judge was justified in finding against suicide. Stated baldly it is, I think, a most misleading expression. The evidence in this case, in my view, left the accident entirely unexplained, and, apart from this presumption against the commission of the crime of felo-de-se, was quite as consistent with suicide as with any other cause. An effort was made, however, to show how the deceased came to get into the water. It is stated in the case that the deceased "was subject to attacks of nausea and sickness, and was seen on previous occasions vomiting over the side of the ship." In the supplemental report sent in by the Sheriff-substitute in consequence of the remit I find the following passage: "The said plan accompanies this report, and shows the half-rounds where Lendrum was seen vomiting on two occasions previous to his death." Whether this means that these were the only occasions when he was seen vomiting, or the only occasions on which he was seen vomiting at this particular place, is, like many other matters in this ill-drawn and loosely-stated case, left in doubt, but there is no evidence whatever when and under what circumstances this vomiting took place—whether it was at sea or in harbour, in fair weather or in foul, in a calm or in stormy water, or what state of health the man was in at the time, or what he had eaten or drunk before the attack. There is not a particle of evidence that he was ill on the 16th of December 1911, or that he complained of being ill, or that to anybody who saw him he appeared to be ill. Two of the rails comprising the bulwarks are removed at these places called the half-rounds for the purpose, apparently, of facilitating the mooring of the vessel. It is possible, no doubt, that a man might, if he got on his hands and knees, crawl through these spaces, but it is not suggested that when, on the two occasions Lendrum was seen vomiting near this place, he assumed that attitude. No evidence was given as to whether this vessel was lighted up or not, whether anyone was about the deck or not, whether any cry for help was heard or not—everything is left vague and uncertain. No explanation is given or suggested as to why all the clothes, watch, &c., of the deceased were found in the saloon. No evidence to indicate whether he had commenced making the tea or not, but a conjecture is made that the deceased was attacked with nausea, rushed to the side of the ship to vomit, and fell over the bulwarks, only 25 inches lower than his own head. The only other suggestion is that he crawled through one of the open spaces I have mentioned. That conjecture, if it be a conjecture, remains the same though it be styled by the Sheriff-substitute an inference of fact.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Ld. Atkinson.

In my view this case comes within the principle of Wakelin's case,[1] and is distinguishable from Swansea Vale v. Rice,[2] where an officer in a sick and giddy condition is sent to perform duties which would necessitate his being sometimes on the bridge of the ship and sometimes on the deck of the ship. I think it is also distinguishable from the case of Mackinnon v. Miller.[3] There the deck of the ship was found to be greatly encumbered; the bulwarks were only 20 inches high, the passage along between those bulwarks and the engine-house was very narrow. The deck of the ship was in absolute darkness. The body of the deceased was found dressed in his ordinary sleeping-clothes, his working-clothes being laid beside his bunk. It would have been necessary for the deceased to have traversed this encumbered deck from the cabin where he slept to a fire-hole forward, used as a lavatory, if he wanted to get to it for the purposes of nature, and if he tripped or made a false step the low bulwarks would have been more of a trap than a protection. The rule as to the burden of proof may press hardly on claimants in cases such as this as it does in cases such as Wakelin's,[1] but if the law is to be altered to meet them, it should, I think, be done by legislation. I think the decision appealed from was therefore right and should be upheld, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—I agree with my noble and learned friend who has preceded me in reference to the point as to the remit made by the Court of Session in this case. A remit can only, in my opinion, properly be made when the material furnished in the statement of the case is such as to raise doubt and difficulty as to its completeness or its clearness. When I examine this remit I find in it two striking paragraphs, referring to additional particulars and details of evidence,

[1] 12 App. Cas. 41. [2] [1912] A. C. 238. [3] 1909 S. C. 373.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

which must have been mentioned at the bar of the Court of Session; and the remit is made to the learned judge to state as arbitrator whether these statements at the bar as to little details of the facts were proved.

Anything of that sort appears to me to be a procedure accompanied by some danger. I admit that it is right, and, indeed, in some circumstances, it would be the duty of the Court of Session, to clear up an ambiguity on the line mentioned by my noble and learned friend who preceded me. But I look with much disrelish upon any procedure which would go further than that; because, observe to what consequences it would lead. If the employers' counsel makes the statement that certain items of fact ought to have been stated which might affect the mind of the Court, I presume that common justice would dictate that in every case the counsel for the workman might say the same thing, and you would have an interminable series of discussions as to whether the learned judge, charged by the Legislature with the duty of stating a case, had with meticulous completeness stated all the particular facts leading up to his conclusions. I could imagine a procedure of that kind to be productive of inconvenience, sometimes to be accompanied by a distortion of the balance of evidence, and never very likely to show confidence in the arbitrator.

In regard to the merits of the case, I much regret the difference of opinion in your Lordships' House. I should state my main proposition thus: that we in this House are not considering whether we would have come to the same conclusion upon the facts stated as that at which the learned arbitrator has arrived. Our duty is a very different—a strikingly different—one. It is to consider whether the arbitrator appointed to be the judge of the facts, and having the advantage of hearing and seeing the witnesses, has come to a conclusion which could not have been reached by a reasonable man. Had I been the arbitrator, had the noble Earl on the woolsack been the arbitrator, had my noble and learned friend on my left (Lord Parmoor) been the arbitrator, we should each of us have reached the same conclusion as that reached by the arbitrator in this case. Had my noble and learned friends opposite, either of them, been the arbitrator, they would have reached an opposite conclusion. I let it be freely granted that we are all reasonable men, and I will also freely grant that as such each of us is willing to concede of the others that the conclusions which we respectively reach on the same facts, although quite opposite conclusions, are such in each case as might have been reached by a reasonable man. I ask myself what right have we to deny similar treatment, not in this case to each other, but to the arbitrator set up by the Legislature to determine the facts in the first instance. I could conceive of no circumstance more luminously favourable to the proposition that we are not here determining evidence for ourselves, but we are settling the main proposition, and that alone, whether the arbitrator appointed by the Legislature has reached a conclusion as to which we here, differing among ourselves, are able to affirm that he could not have been a reasonable man in coming to that conclusion. So stated, the proposition in favour of supporting this judgment seems to be completely self-destructive.

On the facts I will only say this: that I see no occasion to invoke authority. As we have experienced, authority in this case is too often a source of much confusion; because, when you enter the region of authority in discussing propositions in fact so elementary and so simple as occur here, you are extremely apt, as a Court of law, to be led by the temptation of legal formulæ into what is essentially a usurpation; that is to say, into the position of upsetting, for a supposed legal reason, something which exists and remains from beginning to end in the region of fact.

As I look at this case, a steward on board ship is lying in his bunk, and is ordered to leave his bunk to make tea for his comrades, and he leaves his bunk. All that is admitted. I infer that he left his bunk because he got an order to do so, and obeyed it. Is that a surmise, or is it a conjecture? I am responsible, I observe, in some of these decisions for raising a distinction between an inference and a conjecture. The distinction is as broad as philosophy itself. It is that an inference rests upon premises of fact and a conjecture does not. Now, when you come to the region of inference, no one has ever suggested that the inference should be in syllogistic form, so that all the points of its premises shall with apt and exact completeness justify the conclusion reached. Whenever you are in the position of saying that what you are determining is what a reasonable man would have done, ex concessis you admit that you are in a region in which from premises, more or less ample, a conclusion may be reached in one direction or another. Accordingly, being out of the syllogistic region and into the work-a-day region of inference from fact, I ask myself, was I wrong to infer that this steward when he obtained the order to go and make tea, he being then in his bunk, left his bunk in obedience to the order?

Next, what sort of a man was it who thus left his bunk? In the first place, he was a man subject to attacks of nausea and sickness; secondly, he was a man who at this odious call of nature had been in the habit of relieving his sickness by going to the ship's side. I infer that this sick man, suddenly ordered to leave his close bunk, took refuge at once in the fresh air and just did what he had done, as is proved, frequently before—he went to the side of the ship.

It is precisely in those cases where I think the Legislature, with great wisdom, has said, let the man who sees and hears things at first hand and has to consider the main issue determine it for himself. He has determined it favourably to this proposition with which he concludes, that this man sustained his death by an accident arising out of his employment.

I will add now to the narrative which I have given these further facts: that it is conceded in this case, firstly, that insobriety is not proved; it is conceded, secondly, that suicide is not proved; and, thirdly, it is conceded that homicide is not proved; and, therefore, insobriety, suicide, and homicide being out of the case, accident remains to a seaman occurring immediately after an order, in circumstances which, if the order was normally conformed to, would place him exactly where he had been before, his constitution in the few days not having changed from one which was apt to be attacked by nausea and sickness.

Were it not that my noble and learned friends opposite differ from this

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.

I should say that a fairer case, upon the whole, for the inference that this unfortunate man met his death by an accident arising out of his employment I could not conceive. There are no judicial differences in these cases greater, strange to say, than the difference between Judges as to whether a reasonable man could have come to a certain conclusion; and I again repeat that, if the arbitrator appointed by the Legislature has come to that conclusion, and if even among ourselves we differ with regard to it, how can we charge as against him appointed by the Legislature that his conclusion was so unreasonable that no Court of law can support it?

It appears to me that to do so would be a usurpation upon the part of a Court of law. I have used, in more than one of these cases before, the expression that Courts of law must take care that they do not usurp a function consigned to another quarter. I think it would be usurpation, because it is making a Court of law enter the arbitrament of fact, and in that arbitrament I think the arbitrator is the final judge, unless the conclusion which he reaches can be declared to be so unreasonable as necessarily to involve its being upset.

I say nothing further on this case, except that I view with satisfaction the judgment of Lord Guthrie, who appears, although he differs from myself in regard to the facts, to have taken what I humbly regard as the correct judicial view of this subject when he says that it was not for him to form a conclusion himself, but he says: "It appears to me that we"—that is, the Division of the Court—"are not asked to draw any inference. What we are asked to do is to consider whether a certain inference could be reasonably drawn." I think that states the proposition with complete accuracy, and I cannot take upon myself the responsibility of saying that this arbitrator did not reasonably reach the inference to which he came.

Lord Parmoor.—On the general question I agree with the noble Earl, but I desire to add a few words, since I am differing from the carefully-prepared judgments of a majority of the Judges in the Court of Session.

I cannot, however, say that the case appears to me to be one of any serious difficulty, or that it requires a close analysis of the differing conceptions involved in inference and conjecture. I have found no assistance by reference to cases which depend on different circumstances.

The only question of law which arises on the appeal is the competency of the arbitrator making the award which he has made in favour of the appellant. It is competent for him to make the award, unless there are no relevant facts found by him which would support his conclusion, or the relevant facts found by him are of such a character that it is not possible for a reasonable man to come to the same conclusion. No question as to the weight of the evidence adduced before the arbitrator, on which his findings of fact are based, comes, or can come, before your Lordships. This House is not concerned with the evidence before the arbitrator in any way, and I cannot think that in this respect this House can go behind the findings as stated in the special case. I agree with the protest made by counsel for the respondents against printing in the appendix the evidence taken before the arbitrator, but no reference was attempted to be made to it in the course of the argument. The point of law to be determined depends upon the special circumstances of the particular case. I agree with what was said in this respect by Lord Dunedin in the case of Mackinnon[1]: "It seems to me" (these are the words of his Lordship) "that each case must be dealt with and decided upon its own circumstances, and that inferences may be drawn from circumstances just as much as results may be arrived at from direct testimony."

In this case the appellant was the wife of Lendrum, who was cook and steward of the s.s. "Turnberry" at the time when he was drowned. The first question for the determination of the arbitrator is whether the drowning was an accident as distinguished from violence or suicide. I cannot doubt that there are relevant facts on which it was competent for the arbitrator to come to the conclusion that the death of Lendrum was due to accident. It is not challenged that the accident occurred in the course of Lendrum's employment, and the real objection, as stated in the able argument on behalf of the respondents, is that there is no evidence, or at least that there is no relevant evidence, on which it is possible for the arbitrator to come to the conclusion that the death of Lendrum was due to an accident arising out of his employment, and that his decision is founded on mere conjecture. I cannot assent to this argument, and I agree with the judgment of Lord Guthrie.

It is not necessary, after the full analysis by Lord Guthrie, to restate the facts found by the arbitrator on which he bases his decision; but there are special factors which appear to me conclusive in favour of the case for the appellant.

Lendrum was drowned while employed on a vessel, and his death therefore resulted from an accident which might naturally arise out of his employment. This consideration appears to me to answer the somewhat extravagant general propositions which it was said might result from upholding the claim of the appellant, and to bring the case within much narrower lines. It was further proved that shortly before the accident Lendrum was ordered by his captain to prepare and serve tea for the crew, and it was quite within the competency of the arbitrator to infer that he left his bunk for the purpose of fulfilling this duty. It was also proved that he had never been seen by the captain of the ship to be the worse for intoxicating liquor, but was subject to attacks of nausea and sickness, and was seen on some occasions vomiting over the side of the ship. I can see nothing impossible in a reasonable person drawing the inference that the accident happened during a vomiting fit while Lendrum was carrying out the orders of his captain. There are other factors which point in the same direction, but I do not propose to carry the analysis further. In my opinion it is not necessary to do so, so soon as the conclusion is formed that the finding of the arbitrator is not impossible on the recognised test.

I wish to express no opinion either way on the reasonableness of the finding in itself as long as it is a possible finding for a reasonable man.

---

[1] 1909 S. C., at p. 380.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Stripping Co., Limited.

This consideration is not only, in my opinion, quite irrelevant, but to enter upon it in any form opens a door which should be kept shut.

I am of opinion the appeal should be allowed.

LORD DUNEDIN.—While I agree with what has been said by the noble Earl on the woolsack and by my noble and learned friend beside me as to the principles on which remits should be made, I confess I am just a little apprehensive that the remarks made by your Lordships to-day may be taken as going rather further than they were intended to go. Your Lordships will pardon me for saying that I am really here now rather speaking from my experience in the Court of Session, and my knowledge of how impossible it would be to do justice to many of these cases without having remits. And I think it not out of place to remind your Lordships that this remit did not spring from any idea of the judges in this case, but is exactly in terms of section 17, subsection (g), of the Act of Sederunt,[1] which is equivalent to what your Lordships are familiar with as rules of Court in England, and as to which power is given by statute to the Court to make them, and which, dealing with these cases, says: "They," that is the Court, "may also before giving their determination send back the case to the Sheriff for amendment." That is the real basis of a remit. The Court has got to deal with the case stated, and, if the case is in itself incomplete, the Court has the right to have it made complete. Certainly the only facts which the Court is entitled to ask the Sheriff to give are facts which are relevant to the discussion before it, and the discussion before it is limited to a question of law, and therefore the only facts are facts which are necessary to raise the question of law, including in it, of course, the question whether there has been any evidence. I may say that there was certainly an attempt made in one quarter at one time to stop the Court of Session in this matter by refusing to state facts. That was dealt with in the case of Euman v. Dalziel[2] in the year 1912, in which I said at the time, and I have no cause to go back upon what I said: "It has been conclusively settled by decisions of the House of Lords and of this Court that, although such [general] appeals are by statute limited to questions of law, nevertheless they are competent when the question is whether such findings as these can be supported upon the evidence submitted, for that has been held to be a question of law. The criterion is whether anyone could reasonably have come to that conclusion. It has been said more than once that this criterion is, if not exactly the same, at least strictly analogous to the criterion we are in use to apply where we are asked to direct a new trial on the ground that the verdict of a jury is contrary to evidence. It is not a question of whether the decision is right or wrong, but a question of whether there was evidence led upon which the decision can be supported. I think, as soon as that position is laid down, it is quite impossible for us to direct our minds intelligently to the question unless we have before us a stated case which will give us a description of what the evidence that was led was."

Now, I admit that when I look at this particular remit I find certain facts in it which I consider of more than doubtful relevancy. At the same time the first two of the facts are facts upon which I think it was quite proper for the Court of Session to have the finding of the Sheriff, because they bore directly on the fact whether there was evidence upon which he could go or not; and I should have rather hesitated to express myself as strongly as some of your Lordships have done, because, although I admit that I do not myself see the relevancy of other facts, yet we do not know the precise reasons that made the learned judges give the remit upon that point, and I hesitate to condemn them unheard. And, in particular, I would say this: first, that I do not see how it is possible that the learned judges should discover that the case is incomplete except upon the statements of counsel who are before them; and, secondly, that so far as I know by experience the motions for amendment of a case come just as often from one side as they do from the other.

[1] C. A. S., 1913, L. xiii. 17 (g).

[2] 1912 S. C. 966.

Now, having said so much upon the remit, I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with any views of mine upon the general question. I had to consider the matter in the case of Mackinnon v. Miller[1]—a case with which, I apprehend, none of your Lordships disagree—and I refer to my judgment in that case. The conclusion that I came to of the criterion, as it is not long, I shall here repeat. I said in that case, and I repeat it in this: "It seems to me that each case must be dealt with and decided upon its own circumstances, and that inferences may be drawn from circumstances just as much as results may be arrived at from direct testimony," and then in that case I went on to say: "Here the learned Sheriff-substitute cannot be said to have drawn an inference which no reasonable man could draw, and that being so, that it is not for your Lordships to interfere with his decision." Now, that criterion commends itself to all your Lordships, because you have really expressed the same thing in other, and I doubt not in better, words.

I am bound to say that if the matter was open to me I should agree—in fact I do agree—with the views of my noble and learned friend beside me (Lord Atkinson), and if I may say so, I feel still more certain of this, that if I had been sitting in the Second Division I should have come to the same conclusion as they did; and I should have come to that conclusion not so much upon what I thought myself, but because I should have thought I was loyally carrying out the views of this House as expressed in Marshall v. "The Wild Rose,"[2] and more particularly would I have thought I should have carried out the views of my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Shaw) as expressed in that case—although I agree that his argument in one sense cannot be controverted. I quite agree that, taking the criterion as I have set it down, I must admit myself out of court when three of your Lordships say that you would have come to the same conclusion as the arbitrator. I can only say that I look in vain for any evidence in this case. It all turns upon one point, whether there is any evidence which, so to speak, associates this man's duty with his being at the side of the ship. I can find none. I say no more, because my noble and learned friend beside me (Lord Atkinson) has dealt at

[1] 1909 S. C. 373, at p. 380.

[2] [1910] A. C. 486.

July 17, 1914.

Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

length with that matter. I should not even have dissented were it not for this, that, although the opinions of my noble and learned friend beside me and of myself cannot influence the decision of your Lordships, at least I hope they may serve as a hint to some arbitrators that they really must go upon facts and not confine themselves to guesses.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed, and award of the Sheriff-substitute restored.

ALEXANDER SMITH—LINDSAY COOK & DICKSON, S.S.C.—BOTTERELL & ROCHE—MACLAY, MURRAY, & SPENS.

No. 11.

July 17, 1914.

Clark v. Taylor & Co.

HUGH CLARK, (Pursuer) Respondent.—Moncrieff, K.C.—A. M. Stuart.

GEORGE TAYLOR & COMPANY, (Defenders) Appellants.—Horne, K.C.—Fenton.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (1) (b)—Where incapacity "results from the injury"—Natural tendency to obesity increased by enforced inactivity following injury.

A miner, aged sixty, received injuries by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, which for a time totally incapacitated him for active work. Three years after the accident he had recovered from the direct effects of it, but had become unfit for any except sedentary work. This partial incapacity for work was due to age and obesity; and the obesity was the result of a natural tendency increased by the enforced inactivity following on the accident.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator found that the partial incapacity did not result from the accident, and terminated the compensation.

Held (rev. judgment of the First Division) that there was evidence to justify the arbitrator's finding; and his decision affirmed.

Opinions that in order to entitle a workman to compensation it is not necessary that the incapacity in respect of which he makes his claim should be the direct result of the accidental injury, or that there should be no contributory source of weakness in the workman.

Earl Loreburn.
Ld. Dunedin.
Ld. Atkinson.
Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.
Lord Parmoor.

(IN the Court of Session, 6th March 1914—Infra, Court of Session Cases, p. 432.)

George Taylor & Company appealed to the House of Lords.

The case was heard on 17th July 1914.[1]

EARL LOREBURN.—If I were to act upon my own opinion of the merits of this case, and regarded that as being within my province, I should draw a conclusion from the evidence as contained in the case the same as that which was drawn by the Court of Session. I agree with the reasoning, and the conclusions they arrived at were the same conclusions as I myself should have come to. That, however, is not what we have to consider.

[1] The following case, which was not referred to in the argument in the Court of Session, was cited in the House of Lords:—Hargreave v. Haughead Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 70.

In this case the only point raised before the arbitrator was whether the present incapacity of this man resulted from his injury. The arbitrator concluded that it did not result from his injury. We may not go into the evidence outside of the award for the purpose of seeing whether we should agree with him; we must take the findings of the Sheriff as to the effect of the evidence as the findings upon which his conclusion rests, and we may look at that conclusion and ask whether a reasonable man could arrive at it or not.

Now, the arbitrator says that the partial incapacity on the 8th of October 1913, which is the crucial date, did not result from the injury sustained by the applicant on the 7th October 1910, and I ask whether that is such a conclusion that I can say a reasonable man could not have arrived at it. The learned arbitrator might think that the increase of obesity and age were, as a matter of substance and looking at it broadly, the real causes which led to this incapacity,—that the incapacity resulted from that and not from the injury. You cannot analyse the chain of causation too closely or you will get into all the labyrinth of argument and disputation which has constantly surrounded the discussion of this subject. The arbitrator may, after puzzling over these considerations, have said to himself in the end, "I think on the whole that it was the disease and the age which were the cause of his incapacity," and, in fact, he has said so.

Mr Moncrieff addressed to us an argument with very remarkable ability, very concise, very powerful, and very much to the point. He said that the arbitrator had made an error in law because he had assumed that, in order to bring the case within the statute, the incapacity must be the direct consequence of the injury, and that the injury must be the exclusive cause of the incapacity. If that were so, then I should think it was an error of law. It is not, as a matter of law, necessary that the incapacity should be the direct result of the injury. It is not necessary that there should be no contributory source of weakness. But in this case I think that the arbitrator may have arrived, and very likely did arrive, at his conclusions from the considerations to which I have referred. When you ask in the language of the statute whether something results from the injury, if we are to refine we may in turn ask what is the meaning of resulting,—how far back are you to carry the chain? It is a question of fact in each case. Each of us must judge in each case how near or how remote the injury is. I do not know how you could lay down a rule of law prescribing the degree of remoteness which excludes the case from the statute, nor could you lay down any formula to guide people to the conclusion that this quantum or that quantum of contributory cause suffices to exclude. How much other causes contributed, if at all, what is the degree of connection which is necessary between the incapacity and the injury, are, in my opinion, questions of fact. It is absolutely impossible to lay down a measure. It must be treated as a matter of common sense.

I do not, therefore, find that the learned arbitrator acted on a wrong view of the law. I do not find that a reasonable man must have decided in a different sense, and therefore I think that his award ought to be restored; and in saying so I will expressly repeat that if I had to form an opinion upon the facts of this case I should have come to the same opinion as that which the Court of Session has arrived at.

July 17, 1914.

Clark v. Taylor & Co.

LORD DUNEDIN.—I think that this case is truly a corollary of the last.[1] I do not find that there is any necessity for me to think that the arbitrator here made a mistake in law. The test of that always is this:—assume the law to be rightly stated, and then put to yourself the question, Could he have arrived at the result that he did with that law so rightly stated? I think he could upon a certain view of the facts, and I think there were sufficient facts for him to come to that result.

I say no more except that I agree with the judgment of Lord Johnston, and I concur in the remarks which have just fallen from the noble Earl on the woolsack.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur with the judgment delivered by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack. At the same time I must confess that I am not at all certain that the arbitrator did not arrive at the conclusion to which he has come under the mistaken view of the law that, under section 1, subsection (b), of the First Schedule, the injury must be the direct result of the accident. That upon the case is left obscure, but if there be any obscurity about it, I think it is entirely due to the way in which the parties have thought proper to conduct the case.

Practically the case was decided upon the medical evidence of the gentleman most wisely selected as the person who was to be, in reality, the medical witness of both parties, and I think that the parties should, if they desired to raise this question, have endeavoured to get a more definite statement from the learned judge in the case he was about to submit upon this point. That being so, I do not feel that there are materials before us which enable me to say that the Sheriff-substitute misdirected himself upon a point of law, or came to a wrong conclusion in point of law upon the construction of the statute. As to the question of fact, if he did not misdirect himself and took a proper view of the true meaning of the statute, I do not think upon the findings of fact that his award can be disturbed.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—In the last case[1] upon the facts I agreed with the arbitrator; in the present case I should have come to a different conclusion from the arbitrator. In both cases alike, however, I hold that it would be invading the arbitrator's province to reverse his verdict. And for brevity's sake I may say that, for the reasons shown by me and explained in the case of Lendrum, I agree to the course now proposed in this case of Taylor.

LORD PARMOOR.—I concur. I think the only possible ground on which the arbitrator's decision could have been questioned would be the ground that he had made a mistake in law in excluding matters of indirect damage. For a time I thought that might be so, having regard to the able argument of Mr Moncrieff; but I have satisfied myself that no such mistake of law has been committed by the arbitrator, and I entirely concur in the judgment of the noble and learned Earl on the woolsack.

[1] Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Co., Limited, supra p. 91.

July 17, 1914.
Clark v. Taylor & Co.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from reversed, and determination of the Sheriff-substitute restored, with costs.

R. S. TAYLOR, SON & HUMBERT—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—BELL & SUGDEN—SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

1913-1914.

HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Lord-Adv. Ure—W. Mitchell, A.-D.
PATRICK HIGGINS, Panel.—Kemp.

No. 1.

Sept. 11, 1913.

H. M. Advocate v. Higgins.

Crime—Murder—Culpable homicide—Insanity—Mental degeneracy not amounting to insanity.

At the trial of a person on a charge of murder direction to the jury (per Lord Johnston) that mental degeneracy, not amounting to insanity, at the date when the alleged murder was committed is not an extenuating circumstance which can reduce the crime from that of murder to that of culpable homicide.

Dicta* of Lord Deas in H. M. Advocate v. Dingwall, (1867) 5 Irv. 466, commented on and doubted.

HIGH COURT. Ld. Johnston.

PATRICK HIGGINS was charged on an indictment in the High Court at Edinburgh with the murder of his two sons, which he was alleged to have committed sometime between 25th October 1911 and 1st January 1912.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and also stated a special defence that he was insane at the time when the crime was alleged to have been committed.

The case was tried before Lord Johnston and a jury on 10th and 11th September 1913.

Counsel for the panel in the course of his speech maintained that, even if the panel were not insane at the time when the crime was alleged to have been committed, his mental condition was so impaired by disease that, assuming him to have killed his sons, the crime was culpable homicide and not murder.

LORD JOHNSTON.—[In the course of his charge to the jury]— . . . On considering the whole evidence, you will make up your minds whether the boys' deaths were caused by their father, the panel now under trial. If so, it is for you to say whether he is guilty as libelled—that is to say, guilty of murder. But it is my duty at the same time to tell you that if there are no extenuating circumstances proved in evidence, the crime is one of murder in the eye of the law, unless you are satisfied that, in the then condition of the panel's mind, he was at the date of the act insane, and therefore not responsible for his actions. Now, I would tell you at once that there is not a single circumstance in the case which could conceivably be regarded as of an extenuating or exculpatory character, unless there is any force in the concluding argument advanced by panel's counsel. But by the line which counsel took considerable difficulty has been thrown in the way of the simple disposal of the case. A special defence of insanity at the date of the crime charged was lodged. But it was not persisted in by counsel, and the evidence led by him, and the burden of his speech to you, all went to support something which is less than insanity, and which is represented as an extenuating, though not an exculpatory, circumstance. Panel's counsel did not, however, withdraw the plea of insanity, and I am by no means clear that it was within his mandate to do so, or that once such a plea is tabled it can be disposed of except by the jury. And I think that, if not necessary, it is at least safer that it be so disposed of by you.

Sept. 11, 1913.

H. M. Advocate v. Higgins.

Ld. Johnston.

Now, with regard to the question of the sanity of an accused person, I have to tell you that if a panel is found by the jury to be insane at the date of trial, the trial cannot proceed further. The jury find to that effect, and the panel is then detained in custody during His Majesty's pleasure. On the other hand, if the jury are satisfied that the panel is sane at the time of the trial, and therefore can plead, but that he was insane at the date of the crime alleged, then, even though he did the deed, he cannot be convicted of the crime by reason of his insanity and consequent irresponsibility for his actions. In that case the jury, in acquitting him, are bound to declare that they acquit him on account of his insanity, and he is then in the same way detained during His Majesty's pleasure. All this is statutory.

You are not called upon directly by the panel to consider whether he is sane at the date of trial, that is, at the present moment. And I do not wish to suggest to you that there is any real question on that point, I only tell you that it is within your competency to consider it. But you are, as I have said, called upon to consider whether he was sane at the date of the act charged in respect of the special defence of insanity lodged by him, and I must therefore ask you when you return your verdict to inform me whether in your opinion this special defence, though not persisted in by the panel's counsel, is or is not established to your satisfaction.

But I must now say a few further words to you on the attitude adopted by the panel's counsel. He maintained in effect this proposition, viz., that though the panel was not insane in the end of 1911, his mental condition was so impaired by the effect of a disease from which he suffered that, assuming him to have been guilty of the homicide, it was open to you to find that that homicide did not in his case amount to murder, but only to culpable homicide, and that you ought so to find. Let us consider what that really means. There is no doubt that in homicide there are degrees of guilt. Homicide may amount to murder, or to culpable homicide, or to justifiable homicide; that is to say, given that there has been a homicide, the circumstances may be such as to extenuate the offence, and reduce it from murder to culpable homicide, or the circumstances may be such as to exculpate and render it justifiable. According to my understanding such extenuating or exculpatory circumstances must be

Sept. 11, 1913.

H. M. Advocate v. Higgins.

Ld. Johnston.

truly surrounding circumstances, external to the accused, perhaps I may term them objective. To take instances, grievous provocation is an example of an extenuating, self-defence of an exculpatory, circumstance. But I fail to see how what I shall call, for shortness, mental degeneracy, which is a purely subjective circumstance, can be regarded as an extenuating circumstance, unless it amounts to insanity, in which case it is an exculpatory circumstance. To regard it as extenuating, and so affecting the quality of the crime, and reducing its punishment, would appear to me to throw loose altogether the conception of criminal responsibility which has hitherto ruled. I refer in particular to Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Milne's case,[1] Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in Barr's case,[2] and to the English case of M'Naghten.[3] It is true that it is the province of the jury to determine whether a crime is murder or culpable homicide, but in doing so they are bound to be actuated by legitimate considerations. The moment that they begin to give weight to impressions of mental degeneracy—it may be congenital, it may be the result of illness, it may be the result of dissipation or immorality, for I fail to distinguish—of mental degeneracy which is not insanity, but leaves to the accused a modicum of responsibility, they must at once fall to drawing impossible distinctions between individual and individual, and therefore to giving weight to considerations which I cannot think to be legitimate. For to say that that man is mentally capable of murder and this man only mentally capable of culpable homicide, that that man is capable of a capital offence, but this one only of an offence not capital, is a proposition which would, I think, unsettle the administration of criminal law. Personally I have very great difficulty in following the chain of reasoning involved in the panel's contention. I can understand limited liability in the case of civil obligation, but I cannot understand limited responsibility for a criminal act. I can understand irresponsibility, but I cannot understand limited responsibility—responsibility which is yet an inferior grade of responsibility.

The argument of counsel is based on a passage in the charge of Lord Deas in the case of Dingwall,[4] to the effect that the state of mind of a prisoner might be regarded as an extenuating circumstance although not such as to warrant an acquittal on the ground of insanity, and therefore was one which might be taken into consideration by the jury along with the whole circumstances of the case in determining whether the crime assumed the quality of murder or merely of culpable homicide. Lord Deas returns to the question in two or three subsequent cases, and his doctrine appears to have received some countenance from other Judges. While I am bound to regard their views with the utmost respect, I desire very humbly to enter my protest against this doctrine being accepted as part of the criminal law and practice of Scotland, until the matter is more deliberately dealt with by a larger Court than usually sits nowadays for the trial of criminal cases, and is authoritatively defined and explained. In particular, I cannot help feeling that the combination of the idea of defective, or

---

[1] (1863) 4 Irv. 301, at p. 343.
[2] (1876) 3 Coup. 261, at p. 264.
[3] (1843) 10 Cl. & Fin. 200, and 59 R. R. 85.
[4] (1867) 5 Irv. 466, at p. 479.

Sept. 11, 1913.

H. M. Advocate v. Higgins.

impaired, or degenerate, mental condition with the whole other circumstances of the case is fallacious, and really leads either to a groping after temporary insanity or to involving the jury in the assumption of the quality of mercy which resides with the Crown.

Ld. Johnston.

But I am glad to think that I am not called upon to act in opposition to the above opinion of Lord Deas, because I do not think that the substratum on which it must rest has been established in this case. The suggestion is that the panel is an epileptic. [His Lordship criticised adversely the evidence upon which this suggestion was based]—I think, therefore, it is my duty to tell you that, where a panel sets up a defence of insanity—and it would equally hold in relation to this suggestion of impaired mental condition if it were a competent consideration—he is bound to prove it clearly, and that, whether the argument of the panel's counsel could be accepted or not in other circumstances, it is in this case based on an hypothesis, which is not, in my opinion, borne out by the evidence, and which may therefore be disregarded by you. I have also to point out to you that if you are to regard the surrounding circumstances, this homicide was no case of sudden impulse, but of callous deliberation. If you are of the same opinion your plain duty is to consider whether the panel is sane now, so that he may be competently tried, whether he did commit the act alleged, and, if so, whether or not he was sane in the ordinary sense at the time he so committed it. If you are satisfied that he did the deed alleged and was not insane when he did it, then I am afraid that you have no alternative but to bring in a verdict of guilty as libelled; though it is open to you to add such recommendation as you think proper.

The jury found the panel guilty as libelled, with a recommendation to mercy, and he was sentenced to death.

Sir William S. Haldane, W.S., Crown Agent—T. E. Gilbert Taylor, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 2.

Nov. 6, 1913.

Auld v. Pearson.

William Auld (Procurator-Fiscal, Renfrewshire), Complainer (Appellant).—Sol.-Gen. Morison—W. Mitchell, A.-D.
James Black Pearson, Respondent.—Lippe.

Statutory Offences—Motor car—Heavy motor car—Charge of exceeding speed limit—Speed limit fixed according to axle-weight—Car having one axle above and another below specified axle-weight—Heavy Motor Car (Scotland) Order, 1905, Art. VII.

The Heavy Motor Car (Scotland) Order, 1905, Art. VII., provides that if a heavy motor car has all its wheels fitted with pneumatic tyres, the speed at which it may be driven on the highway shall not exceed "(a) Twelve miles an hour—where the registered axle-weight of any axle does not exceed six tons; and (b) Eight miles an hour—where the registered axle-weight of any axle exceeds six tons."

Held (dub. Lord Johnston) that the speed limit for a car of the class referred to, of which the registered axle-weight of the front axle was 2 tons 2 cwts. and that of the back axle over 6 tons, was eight, and not twelve, miles an hour.

Nov. 6, 1913.

Auld v. Pearson.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Johnston. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Skerrington.

JAMES BLACK PEARSON, chauffeur, Greenock, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Greenock, on a summary complaint, at the instance of William Auld, Procurator-fiscal of the Lower Ward of Renfrewshire, with having, on 13th May 1913, in a public highway in the burgh of Greenock, driven a heavy motor car "the registered axle-weight of the back axle of which weighs more than six tons . . . at the rate of twelve miles an hour, being a speed exceeding eight miles an hour, contrary to the Heavy Motor (Scotland) Order, 1905, Article VII., duly made and issued by His Majesty's Secretary for Scotland in virtue of the Motor Car Acts, 1896 and 1903." *

The Sheriff-substitute (Welsh) having found the accused not guilty, the Procurator-fiscal appealed on a stated case.

The case set forth:—

"The following minute of admission was engrossed on the complaint:—'Greenock, 6th June 1913.—The Procurator-fiscal and Mr John Cameron, solicitor, Greenock, as agent for accused, admit the facts as set forth in the complaint, and further that the registered axle-weight of the front axle of the car does not exceed six tons, being of the weight of 2 tons 2 cwts., and that the car has pneumatic tyres on all its wheels.' On the facts thus admitted the question arose whether, looking to the terms of headings '(a)' and '(b)' of that part of Article VII. of the Heavy Motor (Scotland) Order, 1905, which relates to heavy motor cars which have all their wheels fitted with pneumatic tyres, the respondent had contravened the provisions of that article.

"On a consideration of these provisions of that article, I was of the opinion that, although the respondent was entitled to drive on the occasion in question at eight miles an hour in respect that the registered axle-weight of the back axle of his car exceeded six tons, that being in terms of heading (b) above referred to, 'the registered axle-weight of any axle,' he was nevertheless, notwithstanding the terms of the second proviso of Article VII. of said Order, entitled to drive at the greater speed of twelve miles an hour in respect that the registered axle-weight of the front axle of his car did not exceed six tons, that being in terms of heading (a) above referred to, 'the registered axle-weight of any axle.'

"I accordingly held that, looking to the registered axle-weight of the front axle of the car which the respondent was driving on the occasion in question, he was not guilty of the charge libelled."

The question of law was:—"On the admitted facts, was I right in holding that the respondent was not guilty of the offence charged?"

The case was heard on 6th November 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The provisos (a) and (b) of the Motor Car Order which were in question were to be read together, as they easily could be, so as to form a consistent code. As the respondent's car had one axle of a registered axle-weight exceeding six tons, it clearly fell under proviso (b), and was unaffected by proviso (a). Therefore the speed limit applicable to this car was eight miles an hour.

* The Heavy Motor Car (Scotland) Order, 1905, issued by the Secretary for Scotland in virtue of the Motor Car Acts, 1896 and 1903 (59 and 60 Vict. cap. 36, and 3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), provides:—Article VII. "The speed at which a heavy motor car is driven on any highway shall not exceed eight miles an hour: Provided that . . . if the heavy motor car has all its wheels fitted with pneumatic tyres or with tyres made of a soft or elastic material, the speed at which the heavy motor car may be driven on any highway shall not exceed—(a) twelve miles an hour—where the registered axle-weight of any axle does not exceed six tons; and (b) eight miles an hour—where the registered axle-weight of any axle exceeds six tons."

Nov. 6, 1913.

Auld v. Pearson.

Argued for the respondent;—Under proviso (a) in question a car might be driven at twelve miles an hour if the registered axle-weight of any axle of the car did not exceed six tons, and as the respondent's car had an axle with an axle-weight of only 2 tons 2 cwts. the speed limit was fixed for it by that proviso. It was therefore unnecessary to consider proviso (b); but, if its terms created any ambiguity, then the Order should be read, in a question involving penal consequences, in a manner favourable to the respondent.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—This stated case raises a somewhat difficult and interesting question upon the terms of an Order issued by the Secretary for Scotland in terms of the Motor Car Acts, 1896 and 1903. It appears that the respondent's car was a "heavy motor car" in the sense of the Order, and that its back axle exceeded in registered axle-weight six tons, but its front axle was under six tons, being some 2 tons 2 cwts.; and the question is whether or no a car of that weight and description when driven at twelve miles an hour was contravening the order which we have to construe.

It is certain that if you read clause (b), the second of the two branches into which this part of the Order is divided, the respondent did commit an offence. He drove a heavy motor car on the highway at a speed greater than eight miles an hour, to wit, at twelve miles an hour, and the registered axle-weight of his back axle exceeded six tons. Now clause (b) says that, if he does so where the registered axle-weight of any axle exceeds six tons, he commits an offence. That would be plain enough were it not that the immediately preceding clause provides that the speed is not to exceed twelve miles where the registered axle-weight of any axle does not exceed 6 tons, and it is said that, inasmuch as the axle-weight of one of the axles here was under 6 tons, the restriction prescribed by clause (b) does not apply.

I think that is a wrong construction. I think that the construction which the Solicitor-General put to us in the most concise way is right; that (b) is applicable to this case and that (a) is not applicable; and accordingly that the respondent has committed the offence with which he was charged.

LORD JOHNSTON.—If I had sat in this case alone I should have come to the conclusion that the reading which the learned Solicitor-General placed upon this Order is probably what its draughtsman intended. But I certainly could not have come to the conclusion that he had expressed himself so intelligibly that an accused could be held bound to understand the offence intended to be created. But as your Lordships are of a different opinion, I do not carry my doubt to the point of a dissent.

LORD MACKENZIE and LORD SKERRINGTON concurred with the Lord Justice-General.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—DOUGLAS & MILLER, W.S.—Agents.

CHARLES HERON, Appellant.—Milne.
HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—W. Mitchell, A.-D.

No. 3.
Nov. 6, 1913.

Heron v. H. M. Advocate.

Crime—Habitual Criminality—Evidence—Review—Duty of Court of Criminal Appeal.

Held that, in an appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal against a verdict on a charge of being a habitual criminal, it is the duty of the Court to consider the case on its merits, and not merely to consider whether there was evidence upon which the jury could reasonably return the verdict appealed against.

Observations as to the evidence which may legitimately be taken into consideration by a jury in dealing with such a charge, and by the Court of Criminal Appeal in disposing of such an appeal.

Opinion (per Lord Mackenzie) that the Judge who presided at the trial should not sit as a member of the Court of Appeal.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Johnston. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Skerrington.

CHARLES HERON was tried before Lord Mackenzie and a jury in the High Court at Glasgow on 10th July 1913, on a charge of attempting to steal, and on a charge of being a habitual criminal. He was convicted on both charges, and was sentenced to three years' penal servitude and five years' preventive detention.

The accused appealed against the latter sentence, on the ground that there was no evidence to warrant a conviction on the charge of being a habitual criminal.

The case was heard before the Court of Criminal Appeal on 6th November 1913. The undernoted cases were referred to.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The prisoner in this case was convicted at the recent Glasgow Circuit of the crime of attempted theft, and was sentenced to a term of penal servitude. After his trial and conviction for that crime he was tried and was convicted on a charge of being a habitual criminal under the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908. The jury came to the conclusion, on the evidence laid before them, that the charge of being a habitual criminal was established.

The question which we have to consider in this case is whether the jury came to a right conclusion upon the evidence laid before them. I purposely state the question in that way, because, in my view, we, sitting in this Court, are called upon to review the conclusion at which the jury arrived exactly as if the jury were a Court of first instance—Sheriff, it may be, or Lord Ordinary—which had decided a question of fact that a Court of Appeal was called upon to consider and review. The evidence upon which the jury came to the conclusion at which they arrived is before us, and we have now to say whether in our judgment it was sufficient to warrant a conviction.

I am satisfied, on an examination of the evidence which was then given, that there was sufficient to entitle the jury to come to the conclusion at [1] For the appellant.—H. M. Advocate v. Gillan, 1910 S. C. (J.) 84, 6 Adam, 256; Stirling v. H. M. Advocate, 1911 S. C. (J.) 84, 6 Adam, 451; Baggot, (1910) 4 Cr. App. R. 67. For the respondent.—Williams, (1912) 8 Cr. App. R. 49; Hadley, (1910) 4 Cr. App. R. 36.

Nov. 6, 1913.

Heron v. H. M. Advocate.

Lord Justice-General.

which they arrived. In other words, I am of opinion that this verdict was right. The prisoner seems, for a long period of years, not only to have committed a variety of crimes but, furthermore, to have been constantly associating with convicted criminals. I take as a sample of the type of evidence given before the jury the evidence of Detective-Inspector M'Lelland, one of several officers of police examined. He says he has known the accused for fifteen years; that he has almost never been out of prison during that time. "When he has been at liberty I have had occasion to see the kind of people he associated with, and they were convicted thieves and registered criminals—men known to me, as a member of the police, as convicted thieves. When he has been at liberty I have seen him at all hours, from eight in the morning till ten or eleven at night. I have never seen him engaged at work. He occupies his time going about the streets drunk in company with thieves."

Now, if that evidence is to be believed—and the jury apparently did believe it—and is confirmed—and it seems to be confirmed—by the other evidence in the case, I think it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that this man was, in the terms of the statute, "leading persistently a dishonest or criminal life."[1] No doubt it is said on his behalf that since he last came out of prison, after serving his last sentence, he had made some attempts to procure work—desultory attempts they certainly were; and it is said that he lost the employment which he managed to secure, not because of any fault of his, but because of a certain physical infirmity which is spoken of. All that may be so, but it does not, in my judgment, infer—as we were asked to infer—that he had taken to leading an honest life, and had ceased to lead persistently a dishonest or criminal life. No doubt when people, who have been convicted of crime and have served sentences such as this man has done, make attempts to get back to honest life the difficulties in their way are many, but there are other alternatives to securing and engaging in regular employment besides continuous association with thieves and convicted criminals.

It appears to me that the jury had ample evidence before them on which they could arrive at the conclusion they have reached. I think it unnecessary to say what other evidence the jury might legitimately have before them when considering the question whether a prisoner convicted of a primary offence has also been guilty of the secondary offence charged —that of being a habitual criminal. The same jury tries the man for both offences, and it is, of course, impossible for them to dislodge from their minds, when they come to consider the second question, the evidence which has been given in relation to the primary charge. That evidence is not before us. We are in an inferior position to the jury; and every Court of Appeal must necessarily be in an inferior position to a Court of first instance in reviewing evidence. They had the advantage, which we do not enjoy, of having seen and heard the witnesses, and the conclusion at which they arrived is no doubt strengthened by that fact, and every Court of Appeal will give more or less weight to that circumstance. We do not disregard that circumstance here, but on the whole I am inclined to agree with the opinion expressed by Lord Dundas in the case of Stirling[1] cited to us, in which he says that "the question whether a man is 'persistently leading a dishonest or criminal life' is one which must be viewed broadly and fairly, and not in a minute and finical spirit." With that I entirely agree; and, applying it, I come to the conclusion in this case that the verdict which the jury gave was right.

[1] Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 59), sec. 10 (2) (a).

LORD JOHNSTON.—I entirely agree with what your Lordship has said, and particularly that the question before us is not whether there was evidence on which the jury might reasonably come to the conclusion which they reached, but whether the jury in coming to that conclusion were right.

I think there is sufficient before us to satisfy us that they were right, although they had necessarily before them the proof of the main charge on which they had just convicted the prisoner, which we have not. I proceed entirely upon the evidence led in the subsidiary charge of habitual criminality, and it is sufficient to satisfy me that the verdict on that subsidiary issue was sound. Looking at that question, as I think we must look at it, in a broad way, I am, I think, bound to look not merely to what has occurred since the last liberation of the panel from prison, but to what we know of his career generally.

Now we know that three convictions of assault and robbery were proved against him between 1903 and 1906. We also know that after he came out of prison from the last of these convictions in March 1910, he was, in 1911 and 1912, frequently before the Police Court for breaches of the peace, and (I take this from the extract conviction of assault and attempt to steal of date 13th April 1912) that he was again convicted on that date, although the punishment must have been a short one. Then on 8th January 1913 he was again sentenced in the Sheriff Court for dishonest appropriation of property. He only came out of prison in March 1913, and again came before the Court in the present case in June of the same year. When I take that series of offences along with the evidence which we have from several members of the police force, that they have known him during these three years since he last left Peterhead in 1910, and have known him to be in constant association with thieves and other disreputable characters, I cannot come to any other conclusion than this, that the jury were fully justified in the verdict which they brought in.

But I should like to say in conclusion that, while I think that it is impossible that the jury should divest themselves of what they have learnt in trying the main issue placed before them, it is, in my opinion, right that they should consider the circumstances so proved and necessarily fresh in their recollection, because in many instances those circumstances throw the most important light upon the life that the panel has been leading during the period preceding the trial. I do not know the circumstances of this case. I do not know whether they did throw such light here. I can only say that they frequently do, and that they are perfectly legitimate considerations for the jury to keep before them. If it were

[1] 1911 S. C. (J.) 84, at p. 86, 6 Adam, 451.

Nov. 6, 1913.

Heron v. H. M. Advocate.

Ld. Johnston.

necessary in order properly to dispose of this appeal that we should be placed in the same position as the jury, I think it would be a question for the Court to consider whether they should not in such a case call for the notes of the main trial made by the Judge who presides; but I do not think that that question arises here, because the more limited facts that we have are amply sufficient to satisfy the Court that the conclusion of the jury was sound.

LORD MACKENZIE.—Your Lordships have arrived at a decision entirely independently of any view that I may have upon the case. I tried the case, and I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. But I think it my duty to say that in arriving at that conclusion it was necessary for me, as far as possible, to divest myself of knowledge that I had of the case, consisting of the evidence of the circumstances attending the crime of which the prisoner was convicted on indictment of an attempt to steal, because, sitting as a member of a Court of Appeal, all that I am entitled to know of the case is what is contained in the print before us.

It is certainly the fact, as has been pointed out, that when a case goes to a jury they as well as the Judge necessarily have before them all the evidence led in Court with reference to the panel. It would be impossible for the jury to divest themselves of the knowledge they had so obtained, and in my opinion it is a necessary consequence of the provisions of the Act that the jury shall take these circumstances into consideration in forming an opinion whether the man is leading persistently a dishonest life.

When, however, the case comes up here on appeal, all that the Court are entitled to look at are the notes of evidence before them. It may in certain circumstances be difficult for the Judge who tried the case to divest himself of knowledge beyond these notes. Whether he is successful in doing so or not it does, in my judgment, lead to objection if the Judge who tried the case sits as a member of the Court of Appeal. If the sentence is confirmed, it may always be open to the prisoner at the bar to think that his case has, in a certain measure, been prejudiced, and that he has not got what he is entitled to under the Act—a judgment upon the notes of evidence alone. It does not appear to me that the case is analogous to that of a Judge who, having tried a civil jury case, sits as a member of the Court to decide whether or not a new trial should be granted. That, as has already been explained by your Lordships, is not the kind of question the Court here has to consider. It is not a motion for a new trial. It is an appeal against a finding of a jury, and the question to be considered is whether that finding is correct or not.

Therefore, with all deference, I submit that it is a matter for consideration whether the Judge who tried a case of this description should sit as a member of the Court of Appeal. In my opinion he should not.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with your Lordships in the conclusion at which you have arrived, and I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

W. LESLIE CHRISTIE, W.S.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

PETER REILLY, Complainer.—Maclaren.
JOHN JAMES M'INTYRE (Police Court Procurator-Fiscal, Glasgow), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—M. P. Fraser.

No. 4.
Nov. 6, 1913.

Reilly v. M'Intyre.

Statutory Offences—Loitering with intent to commit felony—Relevancy of complaint libelling mere theft, without aggravation, as a felony—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. cap. 83), sec. 4—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 15—Penal Servitude Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 69), sec. 7.

By the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (as amended and applied to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1891), it is made a punishable offence for a suspected person or reputed thief to loiter "with intent to commit felony"; and the word "felony" is defined as including "any theft, which in respect of aggravation or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude."

A complaint charging a suspected person and reputed thief with loitering "with intent to commit a felony, viz., theft," held irrelevant, in respect that "theft" simpliciter was not a "felony" within the statutory definition.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Johnston. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Skerrington.

ON 23rd July 1913 Peter Reilly was charged in the Police Court at Glasgow on a complaint at the instance of John James M'Intyre, procurator-fiscal, which set forth that "you are charged at the instance of the complainer that, being a suspected person and a reputed thief, you did, on the 19th day of July 1913, frequent and loiter about in St Enoch Station, Glasgow, said station being a place adjacent to a street, viz., St Enoch Square, Glasgow, with intent to commit a felony, videlicet, theft, contrary to section 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as amended and extended to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, section 15, and as further amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, section 7,* whereby you are liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three calendar months, with hard labour. And you have been previously convicted as in the list annexed." The list annexed contained one previous conviction, obtained in Greenock Police Court for the offence of being a "Suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting and loitering with intent to commit a felony," the sentence being thirty days' imprisonment.

The Stipendiary Magistrate found the accused guilty as libelled, and sentenced him to ninety days' imprisonment.

Reilly presented a bill of suspension, in which he averred:—(Stat. 2) "On complainer being called upon to plead to said complaint, his agent objected to the relevany thereof, in respect of want of specifica-

* The Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV. cap. 83), sec. 4 (as amended and applied to Scotland by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 15, and the Penal Servitude Act, 1891, sec. 7), enacts:—"Every suspected person or reputed thief frequenting or loitering about or in . . . any street, or any highway, or any place adjacent to a street or highway, with intent to commit felony . . . shall be liable to imprisonment for three months."

The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 15, enacts further:—" . . . For the purposes of this section, in Scotland the word felony shall mean any of the pleas of the Crown, any theft, which in respect of aggravation, or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude, any forgery, and any uttering of any forged writing."

Nov. 6, 1913.

Reilly v. M'Intyre.

tion of the felony libelled. The Court repelled the objection. . . ." (Stat. 3) "In repelling said objection to relevancy, allowing evidence to be led, and convicting and sentencing the complainer, the Stipendiary Magistrate was in error. Said section 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, inter alia, enacts:—'For the purposes of this section, in Scotland the word felony shall mean any of the pleas of the Crown, any theft, which in respect of aggravation or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude, any forgery, and any uttering of any forged writing.' Said complaint does not allege any aggravation in the substantive charge, nor anything regarding value in money nor otherwise, and in respect thereof, it is wanting in specification, and irrelevant. Moreover, the previous conviction libelled is not necessarily a conviction aggravating the offence charged."

The complainer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said conviction and sentence ought to be suspended simpliciter, and the complainer set at liberty, in respect that the complaint against him is irrelevant on the grounds stated in the objections thereto and as herein founded on.

The case was heard before the High Court on 6th November 1913.

Argued for the complainer;—The complaint was irrelevant, in respect that it charged the accused with intent to commit theft pure and simple, whereas theft per se was not a felony in the sense of the Acts creating the statutory offence charged. The only theft which fell within the statutory definition of felony was a theft which might be punished with penal servitude, either because it was an aggravated theft (e.g., a theft following upon previous convictions applicable to the crime of theft), or because the crime was of such gravity as to lead to indictment in the High Court. The complaint here did not attempt to apply either of these qualifications to the theft which the accused was charged with the intention of committing, and was accordingly irrelevant. It was true that a previous conviction was annexed to the complaint, but it was libelled as an aggravation of the statutory charge and had no application to the word "theft"; and, in any event, it could not have been put in evidence as an aggravation of the crime of theft, because the only convictions which could be so used were convictions of the crimes and offences contained in the exhaustive list of crimes given in section 63 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,[1] and that list did not include the offence of loitering with intent,—the offence of which a conviction was annexed to this complaint.

Argued for the respondent;—The complaint was relevant and sufficiently specific, in respect that it gave an exhaustive reference to the statutory provisions constituting the offence and fixing the penalty.[2] Further, theft was a felony according to the definition, because, to quote the words of Lord Dunedin in M'Intyre v. Morton,[3] the section "says theft which may be punished by penal servitude, and according to Scots law every theft is so punishable."

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I am satisfied that this conviction cannot

[1] 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35.

[2] Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), secs. 5 and 19 (1) (2); Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 9.

[3] 1912 S. C. (J.) 58, at p. 62, 6 Adam, 634.

Nov. 6, 1913.

Reilly v. M'Intyre.

Lord Justice-General.

stand. The accused was charged before the Stipendiary Magistrate in Glasgow in that, being a suspected person and a reputed thief, he did on a certain date, which is specified, frequent and loiter about a certain place, which is specified, with intent to commit a felony, viz., theft, contrary to certain statutes which are specified. It is plain upon these statutes, the terms of which have been brought under our notice, that theft simpliciter is not a felony in the sense of the statute founded upon. Theft, in order to constitute a felony in the sense of these Acts, must be "theft, which in respect of aggravation or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude."

There is an observation made by Lord Justice-General Dunedin in the case of M'Intyre,[1] which was brought under our notice with which I entirely agree, where he says that an examination of the section of the statute of 1871 shows clearly that the gentleman who drew that section had not a very correct notion of Scots law, because the section speaks of theft which may be punished by penal servitude, and, says his Lordship, according to Scots law every theft is so punishable. That was said in a case where the question was whether or no this particular Act of Parliament applied to Scotland, and it was argued, as I understand, on internal evidence gathered from the statute itself that it was plainly inapplicable to this part of the United Kingdom. That argument was repelled, and it does not, in any degree, help either of the parties in this case; no more than it helped in the case before the High Court in which the opinion of the Lord Justice-General to which I have just referred was given.

Here it appears that the complainer was in a position to have libelled quite correctly the crime which he intended to charge, because the accused had been—so we are told—guilty of theft, and had been convicted of theft, on several previous occasions. But, if that is so, I cannot understand why it was that the complaint was framed in the terms which are before us, which seem to me to be plainly irrelevant, when they could have been made perfectly relevant by specifying clearly—and the accused was entitled to have them specified—the previous convictions which made the crime of theft an aggravated crime, a crime punishable by penal servitude. For that is the language of the statute of 1871. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the complaint as it stands is plainly irrelevant and seriously lacking in specification, and accordingly that the conviction which proceeded upon it cannot stand.

Lord Johnston.—I concur. I confess that I think it almost hopeless in Scotland to apply the provisions of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, as amended by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 15, because of the inherent absurdity of the explanatory definition of the word felony. The only remedy really is legislation, for though it may be possible to comprehend what is meant by a theft which in respect of aggravation may be punished by penal servitude, it is impossible to realise what is meant in Scotland by a theft which in respect of the value of the articles

[1] 1912 S. C. (J.) 58, at p. 62, 6 Adam, 634.

Nov. 6, 1913.

Reilly v. M'Intyre.

Ld. Johnston.

stolen may be so punished, particularly when we have to apply the definition here to be applied, not to a case of theft, but to one of hanging about with intent to steal. But this complaint is clearly wanting in specification, because it only charges intent to commit theft, without either of the qualifications contained in the statutory definition above referred to.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree that this conviction should be quashed. The complainer is charged with a statutory offence. That statutory offence is that, being a suspected person and a reputed thief, he did frequent and loiter about a certain place with intent to commit a felony, viz., theft. The complaint winds up: "And you have been previously convicted as in the list annexed," and then follows a schedule in which there is one conviction of being a suspected person or reputed thief, frequenting and loitering with intent to commit a felony. One thing is perfectly clear upon that, viz., that that previous conviction has no application to the word "theft"; it is libelled as an aggravation of the statutory charge.

Inasmuch as this is a statutory charge, it is necessary to go to section 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871. The concluding words of the section are: "For the purposes of this section, in Scotland the word felony shall mean any of the pleas of the Crown, any theft," and the section does not stop there, if it did, then the complaint would be good; it goes on—any theft "which, in respect of aggravation or of the amount in value of the money, goods, or thing stolen, may be punished with penal servitude, any forgery, and any uttering of any forged writing."

It may be difficult to spell out of intent to commit a theft intent that the theft shall be of money or goods of a certain value; but it is quite possible to libel that the person charged has such a record that theft in his case would involve a sentence of penal servitude. This would constitute an aggravation as contemplated by the statute. I read the section as meaning this, that if you find a suspected person or a reputed thief loitering about under such circumstances that you are entitled to infer that his intent was to commit a felony, viz., theft, and if you libel that his previous record (specifying his previous convictions) has been such that a theft of any article which it may reasonably be supposed he intended to steal would carry a sentence of penal servitude, then you may proceed under this section.

It appears from what we are told at the bar that there was apparently sufficient material in this case to warrant a conviction of the complainer. But then the question we have to decide is whether he had any information from the terms of the complaint of what was to be proved against him. As the complaint stands, it is absolutely bare of any reference to any previous conviction at all applicable to the charge of theft. There is not a word in the complaint that the man had been previously convicted. If it is intended to draft a relevant complaint under this section, in my opinion it is necessary to set out, after the word "theft," the aggravation in respect of which the Procurator-fiscal says the prisoner charged may be punished with penal servitude.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with the opinions delivered by your Lordship in the chair and by Lord Mackenzie. Nov. 6, 1913. Reilly v. M'Intyre.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

R. D. CAMPBELL M'KECHNIE, Solicitor—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 5.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. Lavelle.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Morton, A.-D.
JOHN LAVELLE, Panel.—Sandeman, K.C.—Haldane.

Procedure—Instance—Indictment—Removal of Lord Advocate from office—Lord Advocate appointed to the bench—Indictment at instance of Solicitor-General during vacancy in office of Lord Advocate—Competency—Solicitor-General appointed to bench prior to sentence—Lapse of indictment—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 2 and 3.

An indictment dated after the Lord Advocate has been raised to, and has taken his seat upon, the bench, and before the appointment of his successor, rightly proceeds in name of the Solicitor-General and may be signed by a procurator-fiscal, "by authority of the Solicitor-General." Further, the fact that the Solicitor-General has been raised to the bench prior to the conclusion of the case does not cause the indictment to lapse.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Johnston. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Skerrington.

ON 22nd October 1913 John Lavelle, a prisoner in the prison of Glasgow, was, under section 31 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, served with an indictment charging him with theft by housebreaking, and libelling previous convictions. The indictment was "at the instance of Andrew Macbeth Anderson, Esquire, Solicitor-General for Scotland," and was signed "by authority of the Solicitor-General, James N. Hart, Procurator-Fiscal."

The fact that the indictment was at the instance of and was signed by the authority of the Solicitor-General, instead of the Lord Advocate, arose from the circumstance that the Right Honourable Alexander Ure, the Lord Advocate, was appointed to the office of Lord Justice-General on 15th October 1913 and took his seat upon the bench on 17th October, and that his successor, Mr Robert Munro, K.C., was not appointed Lord Advocate until 31st October.

The prisoner pleaded guilty and was remitted to the High Court for sentence.

On 4th November 1913, when the panel was brought before the Lord Justice-Clerk, his counsel stated objections on his behalf to the form of the indictment in respect that when it was served there was no warrant (1) for the Solicitor-General's instance, (2) for the procurator-fiscal's signature "by authority of the Solicitor-General." *

* The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), enacts:—Section 2. "All prosecutions for the public interest before the High Court of Justiciary and before the Sheriff Court where the Sheriff is sitting with a jury, shall proceed on indictment in name of Her Majesty's Advocate . . . and such indictment . . . shall be signed by Her Majesty's Advocate or one of his deputes, or by a procurator-fiscal, and the words 'By authority of Her Majesty's Advocate' shall be prefixed to the signature of such procurator-fiscal."

Section 3. "The Lord Advocate and his deputes shall not demit office

Nov. 8, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. Lavelle.

The Lord Justice-Clerk continued the diet that the objections might be considered by a fuller bench, and the prisoner was again brought before the High Court on 6th November 1913.

Argued for the panel;—(1) There was no warrant for indictment at the instance of the Solicitor-General at the time when the present indictment was served. The only warrant for an indictment at the instance of a Solicitor-General was that given by section 3 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, and as that was a permission to interfere with the liberty of the subject it must be strictly construed. The warrant was limited to cases where the Lord Advocate had died or had been "removed from office." Neither of these events had occurred in the present case. The word "removed" implied a termination of office against the will of the holder, and therefore could not apply where the Lord Advocate had accepted the office of Lord Justice-General. That acceptance might imply a resignation of office as Lord Advocate, but the resignation did not take effect until another Lord Advocate was appointed.[1] A Lord Advocate on becoming a Judge did not necessarily cease to be Lord Advocate, there being nothing inherently inconsistent in the two offices, as was shown by the fact that prosecutions were originally instituted by the Justice-Clerk at the command of the Justiciar.[2] Accordingly the indictment should have been at the instance of the Right Hon. Alexander Ure, the Lord Advocate. (2) The procurator-fiscal had no warrant to sign the indictment "by authority of the Solicitor-General," because it was only "by authority of His Majesty's Advocate" that indictments could ever be signed by procurators-fiscal.[3]

Argued for the Crown;—(1) It was impossible for anyone to hold at the same time the office of Lord Advocate and the office of a Lord Commissioner of Justiciary, and therefore when a Lord Advocate was appointed by His Majesty to be a Judge, he was "removed from office" in the sense of the Act—which clearly differentiated between resignation and removal. Accordingly the provisions relating to the case of removal applied, viz., that, during the interregnum between the Lord Advocates, indictments should run in the name of the Solicitor-General—the provisions relating to the case of resignation being inapplicable.[4] (2) The panel having been indicted at the instance of the Solicitor-General in accordance with statutory requirements, it on the resignation of the Lord Advocate, but shall continue in office until their successors respectively receive their appointments . . . and all indictments which have been raised by any Lord Advocate shall continue in force and effect notwithstanding such resignation and may be taken up and proceeded with by his successor; and where any Lord Advocate shall die during his tenure of office, or otherwise be removed from office, it shall be lawful to indict persons accused in name of the Solicitor-General then in office until another Lord Advocate is appointed, and the Advocates-Depute and procurators-fiscal shall have power, notwithstanding such death or removal from office of the Lord Advocate, to take up and proceed with any indictments already raised in name of such Lord Advocate, and any indictments that may be raised in name of such Solicitor-General."

---

[1] Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 3; Halliday v. Wilson, (1891) 19 R. (J.) 3, 3 White, 38.

[2] Hume on Crimes (3rd ed.), vol. ii., 130-131.

[3] Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 2; Macdonald's Criminal Law, (3rd ed.) 285.

[4] Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 3.

followed logically that the indictment should bear the signature of the procurator-fiscal "by authority of the Solicitor-General," because the statute placed procurators-fiscal in the same position as Advocates-depute, and conferred upon them power to take up and proceed with any indictments raised in the name of the Solicitor-General.[1]

Nov. 8, 1913. Solicitor-General v. Lavelle.

At advising on 8th November 1913,—

Lord Johnston.—The prisoner in this case having applied to have his case taken under the 31st section of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, was served with an indictment and notice under that section and the relative Schedule L. The date of his indictment must admittedly be taken as the date of service, and that date was 22nd October 1913. The late Lord Advocate, now Lord Justice-General, had not only received his appointment as Lord Justice-General in the technical sense on 15th, but had presented it to the Court of Justiciary on the 17th October 1913. His successor did not receive his appointment as Lord Advocate until the 31st of that month. Accordingly, on the assumption that, in the interim between the 15th and 31st October, there was no Lord Advocate, the indictment of the prisoner (1) proceeded at the instance of the Solicitor-General, and (2) was signed by his authority by the procurator-fiscal. Exception is taken to the instance. I do not experience any difficulty in repelling the objection, though I think that it is necessary to distinguish the case from that of Halliday.[2]

The question depends upon the second and third sections of the Act of 1887. Section 2 provides that all prosecutions for the public interest before the High Court shall proceed on indictment, in name of His Majesty's Advocate, and shall be signed by His Majesty's Advocate, or by one of his deputes, or by a procurator-fiscal, and that the words "by authority of His Majesty's Advocate" shall be prefixed to the signature of such procurator-fiscal. Section 3 provides for the interregnum which must occur on the resignation, death, or removal of a Lord Advocate. And it deals differently with the situation created by resignation, and that created by death or removal. In the case of resignation the Lord Advocate does not demit office on his resignation, but continues in office until his successor receives his appointment, and his deputes do the same. On the other hand, if the Lord Advocate dies during his tenure of office or is otherwise removed from office, it is declared to be lawful to indict accused persons in name of the Solicitor-General "until another Lord Advocate is appointed."

Under what category, then, comes the case of a Lord Advocate demitting office by reason that he is appointed to the office of Lord Justice-General? It is not, in my opinion, a case of resignation, nor is it a case of death, but it is, I think a case of removal. It is always in the power of the Crown to remove a Lord Advocate at pleasure, and I think that the Crown by implication removes him from the office of Lord Advocate when it appoints him to the office of Lord Justice-General, the tenure of

[1] Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 3.
[2] 19 R. (J.) 3.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. Lavelle.

Ld. Johnston.

which is inconsistent with that of Lord Advocate, and accordingly that, during the interval which elapses between one Lord Advocate receiving an appointment to the office of Lord Justice-General and the appointment of another Lord Advocate in his place, indictments lawfully run in name of the Solicitor-General, and therefore that, so far, there is no good objection to the instance here.

But objection is taken to the signature of the indictment by the procurator-fiscal. I should have thought that by necessary implication the provision at the end of section 2, empowering the procurator-fiscal to sign by authority of His Majesty's Advocate, includes power to him to sign by authority of His Majesty's Solicitor, where pro tempore the Solicitor-General comes vi statuti in place of the Lord Advocate. But if there is any doubt, I think it is entirely removed by the last clause of section 3, which provides that the Advocates-depute, whose deputations have ex hypothesi fallen, and procurators-fiscal, shall have power, notwithstanding the removal from office of the Lord Advocate, to proceed with any indictments which may be raised in name of such Solicitor-General. I think that this, if it were necessary, confers on the procurator-fiscal power to prefix to his signature to indictments legally running at the instance of the Solicitor-General the words "by authority of" that officer. In my opinion, therefore, the second objection also fails.

At first sight the case of Halliday[1] might appear to lead to a different conclusion. But I do not think that it is really inconsistent with the above judgment. I refer to the report in Rettie, for that in 3 White, 38, is too imperfect to disclose the circumstances. These were, that on 1st October 1891 a letter passed the Flying Seal giving the Royal approval to the appointment of Sir Charles Pearson, as Lord Advocate, in room of Lord Advocate Robertson; that on 6th October a warrant, also under the Flying Seal, was received at the Crown Office for issuing Sir Charles's commission; and that on 13th October the commission was issued. The report does not give the date on which Lord Robertson received his commission as Lord Justice-General, but I have ascertained that it was dated 21st September 1891, and was therefore presumbly received on that or the following day. There was therefore an interval from 21st or 22nd September to 6th or to 13th October 1891—whichever of these latter dates is to be held the date of the receipt of his appointment by Lord Advocate Sir Charles Pearson—between the two appointments.

Halliday's indictment proceeded in the name of Lord Advocate Robertson and was dated 3rd October 1891. But the objection taken to it was inept, because the plea taken was that the indictment should have proceeded at the instance of Sir Charles Pearson, as the new Lord Advocate, instead of at the instance of Lord Advocate Robertson as the old Lord Advocate; whereas the plea ought to have been, that it should have proceeded in the name of neither Lord Advocate, but of the Solicitor-General of the day. It was thus that the sole question debated in the case came to be what is to be taken as the date of the reception by the Lord Advocate of his appointment. It was certainly held that neither the issue of the letter

[1] 19 R. (J.) 3.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. Lavelle.

Ld. Johnston.

under the Flying Seal approving the appointment nor its publication in the Gazette was the receipt of such appointment in the sense of the statute of 1887. And as the date of the indictment was 3rd October 1891, and so before the issue even of the warrant, that seemed enough for the decision of the question, and the validity of the instance was sustained; though had the proper objection to the instance been taken, the objection would have been sustained. But the judgment leaves it doubtful whether the receipt by the Crown Office on 6th October of the warrant to issue the commission, or the issue of the commission itself on 13th October, is to be taken as the statutory receipt by the Lord Advocate of his appointment, and therefore his authority to act. I should have thought the latter, because until his commission is issued nothing reaches the Lord Advocate designate on which he can act, or which he can produce as his authority for requiring the Court to receive him. But it was immaterial in the case of Halliday[1] to determine the point. It was enough that, as at the date of the indictment in question nothing had occurred except the intimation of the Royal approval and the Gazette notice, Sir Charles Pearson had in no view as yet received his appointment. No other question was raised or considered, and thus the attention of the Court was, I think, diverted from the true question. Certainly the question raised in the present case was not before the Court.

The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL, LORD MACKENZIE, and LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

Counsel for the Crown moved for sentence.

Counsel for the panel objected to the motion and argued;—As the Solicitor-General at whose instance the panel was indicted had become a Judge,* the instance had lapsed, as in the case of the death of a private prosecutor whose heir or executor could not be sisted.[2] The instance having lapsed there was no indictment, because the present Solicitor-General could not proceed with a prosecution instituted by his predecessor; though a Lord Advocate could because his instance subsisted notwithstanding any change in the identity of the holder of his office, the indictment in his name being really at the instance of His Majesty. Even the Lord Advocate could not proceed with an indictment at the instance of the Solicitor-General, because the statute which gave the only mandate for such indictment conferred no power upon the Lord Advocate to do so.[3]

Argued for the Crown;—Section 3 of the Act of 1887, which authorised an indictment such as the present at the instance of the Solicitor-General, also authorised Advocates-depute (which included the Solicitor-General) and procurators-fiscal to "take up and proceed with" such an indictment.

THE COURT repelled the objection and sentenced the panel.

Sir WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—J. MAXWELL YOUNG, S.S.C.—Agents.

---

[1] 19 R. (J.) 3.

* Lord Anderson took his seat upon the bench on 4th November 1913.

[2] Hume on Crimes, ii. 123.

[3] Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, sec. 3.

No. 6.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

JOHN THOMSON WILSON, Complainer (Appellant).—Blackburn, K.C.—Keith.

WILLIAM FLEMING, Respondent.—Sandeman, K.C.—A. M. Stuart.

Public Health—Food and Drugs—Sale of milk deficient in fat—Sale by servant of accused—Complaint—Specification of modus—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. 63), sec. 6—Master and Servant.

Where, in a prosecution under a complaint charging a dairyman with selling milk which was not genuine, in contravention of sec. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, it appeared at the proof that the sale was effected, not by the accused, but by his servant—

Held (diss. Lord Johnston) that the complaint was lacking in specification, in respect that it did not set forth that the sale was effected by the hand of a servant; and complaint dismissed.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Johnston. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Skerrington.

WILLIAM FLEMING, dairyman, Dalserf, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton on a complaint at the instance of John Thomson Wilson, Medical Officer of Health for the county of Lanark, under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1907. The charge against the accused was:—"That on 19th March 1913, at Dunlop Place, Dalserf, opposite to No. 37 thereof, you did, in response to a demand made for the complainer by Charles MacAra, County Buildings, Hamilton, an inspector appointed by the County Council of the County of Lanark as Local Authority for the said county, under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1907, to assist the complainer in the execution of the said Acts, for three-halfpence worth of sweet milk, sell to the complainer milk which was not genuine, as it contained less than 3 per cent of milk fat, contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, section 6."

The Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) after a proof dismissed the complaint, whereupon the complainer appealed on a stated case.

The case set forth that the following facts were proved:—

"On the date libelled the respondent's milk cart was in charge of his son, Robert Fleming, as his servant. On that date at the place libelled Charles MacAra, a duly authorised inspector acting on the complainer's (appellant's) behalf, demanded from Robert Fleming, and was supplied by him with three-halfpence worth of sweet milk. The respondent himself was not present at the time of the demand or the sale, being then at his farm. The milk contained only 2·73 per cent of milk fat, and the evidence led for the respondent did not in my opinion prove that the milk was genuine.

"I found that the respondent had failed to discharge the onus resting on him of proving that the milk was genuine. But I held that the facts proved did not establish the charge contained in the complaint, because the complaint prima facie narrates a demand made on the respondent personally, and a sale and delivery made by him personally. In my opinion, proof of demand to and delivery by the respondent's servant in the respondent's absence was not sufficient to prove sale by the respondent in response to a demand by the inspector, as narrated in the complaint. I held that in the circumstances of the present case the complainer was bound as a matter of reasonable specification to state in the complaint that the demand was made to a servant of the respondent, and that the complaint as framed could not be reasonably interpreted as covering such a case.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

I therefore refused to convict the respondent, and dismissed the complaint."

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was:—"On the facts proved, ought I to have convicted the respondent?"

The case was heard on 7th November 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was sufficiently specific. It gave the accused due notice of the facts which he had to meet, and the Sheriff-substitute should have convicted him. "Selling" under the Act was not limited to the actual operation of handing over the article and receiving the price, but was used in its ordinary commercial sense of supplying in return for payment. It was accordingly immaterial whether the sale was actually effected by the true purveyor of the milk or by his servant; in both cases the former had sold the milk, provided always the servant, if he carried out the sale, was employed to sell, and was thus acting within the scope of his employment. This principle had been recognised in many cases dealing with sales, and particularly in prosecutions for breach of public-house licences, where the actual sales were effected by servants of the publicans.[1] The offence charged was in no sense a personal offence and it did not necessarily involve any moral stigma, because, if the milk which was sold was in fact not genuine, and if the salesman who sold it was authorised by the master to sell, the master was guilty of a contravention of the statute, even although the milk had been adulterated without his knowledge by his servant or by some other party[2]; guilty intention being, as in other cases of statutory offences,[3] not essential to the constitution of the offence. Macaulay v. Mackirdy,[4] which was the exact converse of the present case, directly supported the appellant's contention. A different ratio, of course, applied if the offence was one personal to the servant, as in Downie v. Fraser,[5] a case of cruelty to a horse, or in Gray & Company v. Mackenna,[6] a case of a contravention of the Truck Acts. Admittedly the accused must be given proper notice of the case which was to be made against him, but he had in fact had ample notice, because, although the servant was not named in the complaint, the time and place of the sale of milk were specified, which sufficiently informed the respondent that the sale in respect of which he was charged must have been carried out by a servant whom he could at once identify. Further, the complaint was in the form prescribed by statute.[7]

Argued for the respondent;—The question in the case was not whether the accused was responsible for a sale carried out by a servant, but whether the complaint gave fair notice that the charge was made, not in respect of anything done by himself, but in respect of

---

[1] Linton v. Stirling, (1893) 20 R. (J.) 71, 1 Adam, 61; Patrick v. Kirkhope, (1894) 21 R. (J.) 27, 1 Adam, 360; Galbraith's Stores, Limited, v. M'Intyre, 1912 S. C. (J.) 66, 6 Adam, 641; Galloway v. Weber, (1889) 16 R. (J.) 46, 2 White, 171.

[2] Parker v. Alder, [1899] 1 Q. B. 20, Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., at p. 25.

[3] Cf. O'Brien v. Macgregor, (1903) 5 F. (J.) 74, 4 Adam, 202.

[4] (1893) 20 R. (J.) 58, 3 White, 464.

[5] (1893) 1 Adam, 80.

[6] (1899) 1 F. (J.) 65, Lord Moncreiff, at p. 68, 2 Adam, 691.

[7] Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), secs. 18, 19, and Sched. C.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

something done by his servant. In a quasi-criminal charge it was the duty of the prosecutor to specify the modus of the offence charged, and, if the act complained of was not that of the accused personally, then the name of the party by whom it was alleged to have been committed should be specified, or at all events the act should be described as that of a servant of the accused whose name was unknown.[1] Such specification was important in the present case because it was not admitted that the respondent's servant had authority to sell milk,[2] and if he was unauthorised the respondent was not responsible for his acts.[3] As regarded the public-house cases founded on by the appellant, the sales were by shopmen in their employers' shops, and their authority to sell could not be questioned; moreover, the charge in these cases was merely of breach of certificate, and, further, the question of sufficiency of specification was not raised.

At advising on 8th November 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The respondent here was charged with an offence under the 6th section of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1875. The complaint sets out that, on the 19th March 1913, at a specified place, he (the respondent) sold to the complainer a certain quantity of milk which was not genuine because it contained less than 3 per cent of milk fat.

When we turn to the stated case, we find that it was proved that not the respondent but his son, acting as his servant in charge of his milk cart at the time, supplied to the prosecutor the quantity of milk specified. Now, on these facts so stated, I should have been of opinion that it was impossible to convict under this complaint, because the vital fact that there was a sale is nowhere found to be stated in the facts set out as proved in the stated case. For aught that appears this case is identical with the case of Lindsay v. Dempster,[2] where this Court held, affirming the decision of the Sheriff-substitute at Edinburgh, that no sale had been effected where not the master but a servant had supplied the milk—milk which was in his hands solely for delivery to a customer to whom it had already been sold. Accordingly, if the question put to us had been whether an offence was proved under this Act, it being merely found that there had been a supply of milk by the respondent's servant to the prosecutor, I should have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute was right in dismissing the complaint.

But apparently that was not the ground upon which the Sheriff-substitute here proceeded when he found the charge not proven; for we see from the stated case that his ground of judgment was this, that he was unable to hold that the complaint charging the respondent with the offence was sufficient to cover the case proved before him, which was the supply of milk, not by the respondent, but by a servant of the respondent. The Sheriff-substitute thought that in all fairness to the accused he ought to have been told in the complaint that the charge was not that he (the respondent) had made the sale, but that one of his servants had

[1] Gray & Co. v. Mackenna, 1 F. (J.) 65, 2 Adam, 691.
[2] Lindsay v. Dempster, 1912 S. C. (J.) 110, 6 Adam, 707.
[3] Kearley and Another v. Tonge, (1891) 60 L. J. Mag. Cas. 159.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

Lord Justice-General.

made the sale; he thought, in short, that the complaint was lacking in specification, and did not give the respondent the notice to which he was entitled of the character of the offence which it was intended to prove against him. In my opinion the Sheriff-substitute was right. If this had been an ordinary crime, a crime pure and simple, there would be no question that a conviction of William Fleming for the act of Robert Fleming could never stand. And, on the other hand, if this were a pure breach of civil contract, then I think a sale by the respondent would be quite accurately and precisely described in a civil pleading as a sale by him although it was actually effected by his servant or authorised agent. Qui facit per alium facit per se. But in the present instance we have to deal with an offence charged under a certain statute which imposes a very substantial penalty for breach of its provisions, and the question we have to consider is whether or no the respondent had sufficient specification of the modus of the offence.

In my opinion he had not, and in so holding I think we are following and applying the principle which was laid down and applied, certainly not for the first time, in the case of Gray & Company v. Mackenna.[1] I freely allow that the terms of the Truck Acts which were there under the consideration of the Court do differ, in some respects, from the terms of such statutes as the Food and Drugs Act of 1875. By the terms of the Truck Statutes it seems to be made very clear that the offences struck at were offences personal to the doer. It was individuals alone that were to be charged. That is brought out very clearly in the opinion of Lord Moncreiff, although it is beyond doubt that the judgment of the Lord Justice-Clerk, and of Lord Trayner who concurred in it, was based upon the broader ground. But it is not immaterial to observe that an offence can be committed under the Truck Acts by an employer acting through an authorised agent, and in that respect an offence under the Truck Acts stands distinguished from an ordinary crime as to which the maxim culpa tenet suos auctores always applies.

Now it was urged upon us in this case that an offence charged under the 6th section of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, really dealt with an ordinary commercial sale, that it signified nothing whether that sale was effected by the master or by his authorised servant, and that a conviction under that section inflicted no personal stigma and reflected no blame upon the accused who was convicted—that the mens rea, in short, was not necessary to a conviction under this 6th section. All that may be true, but it does not appear to me to affect the question which we have to decide, which is whether or no there was sufficient specification here to give the accused fair notice of the precise mode in which it was proposed to prove that he had committed the offence charged.

We were referred to a case said to be very like the present—Macaulay v. Mackirdy[2]—which counsel for the appellant urged upon us was to be regarded as the converse of the case which we have before us. It, too, was a complaint under the 6th section of the Food and Drugs Act, and the complaint alleged that the purchase of the milk had been made by the

[1] 1 F. (J.) 65, 2 Adam, 691.

[2] 20 R. (J.) 58, 3 White, 464.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

Lord Justice-General.

prosecutor, whereas the actual purchase had been made by his assistant, who went to the milkman and paid the money to the milkman. The complaint was held to be unobjectionable; and, although at first sight it might appear to be the converse of the present case, upon examination it will be found to be entirely different, for there the Court held the complaint to be unobjectionable for this reason, that it was a mere question of description and did not in any way affect the essence of the criminal charge. In short, the purchaser was not the accused.

I have, for my own part, found more difficulty in dealing with what have been called in the course of the discussion the public-house cases, of which Linton v. Stirling[1] is a typical example. These were all cases in which publicans were charged with breach of the conditions of their certificates in respect that they had sold liquor to persons who were already intoxicated, and the charge was expressed in the same way in which the complaint is set out in the present instance, without specifying the servant, and even without saying that the sale was made by a servant or agent. Now the answer to the argument which was founded on these cases seems to me to be threefold. First, it is noticeable that the question of insufficiency of specification was never raised; it was neither considered nor decided. In the second place, it would be very difficult to see that it was a matter material to the charge to specify the servant, because a salesman or shopkeeper at the back of a counter in a public-house who effected a sale could never be said to be an unauthorised person on the part of the publican, and it never could be said that the publican would be entitled to shelter himself behind a defence that it was his servant—a servant unauthorised to make the sale across the counter,—and not he, who had done the act. Such a case therefore is materially different in that respect from the present case, where the imperfection which was held to be fatal to the complaint in Lindsay v. Dempster[2] is present. But, third and most material of all, it appears to me that the public-house case is not analogous to the present case for this reason, that it was not, in the proper sense of the word, a criminal charge or even a statutory offence that was being tried but a breach of the conditions of the licence, and the distinction between a criminal or a quasi-criminal charge and a breach of the conditions of the licence was brought out with great clearness and distinctness in the opinion of Lord M'Laren in Linton v. Stirling,[1] where his Lordship says, "If legislation on this subject had taken the line of making it an offence to supply liquor to a person in a state of intoxication, on account, it might be, of danger to the public or to himself, then the argument stated to us would have been relevant. We should then have had to consider whether the person charged was guilty of supplying drink to an intoxicated person, that is to say, whether he was guilty of the intention to do so and did it knowingly. That, however, is not the principle of legislation on this subject. The licensee is put under the conditions of a certificate, and for a breach of such certificate he is made liable to a civil action for penalties." And his Lordship goes on to develop the same idea in subsequent paragraphs of his judgment.

---

[1] 20 R. (J.) 71, 1 Adam, 61. [2] 1912 S. C. (J.) 110, 6 Adam, 707.

Now I think it is incumbent on the prosecutor in a case such as the present to give the accused full and clear specification of the modus of the offence in order to enable him to protect himself by adequate evidence against the charge brought against him; and, as Lord Skerrington pointed out in the course of the discussion, that is not imposing an undue and excessive burden upon the prosecutor, because if he does not know the name of the servant he has only to set that forth, stating that it was a servant of the accused and not the accused himself.

I should not have so held had I thought that the effect of our judgment would be to defeat the objects of this useful Act of Parliament, or to cause any undue or unnecessary embarrassment to the inspectors in the performance of their often difficult and delicate duties. I cannot think that that is so, and I agree, therefore, with the Sheriff-substitute when he finds that the complainer was bound, as a matter of reasonable specification, to state in the complaint that the demand was made to a servant, and that the complaint as framed cannot be reasonably interpreted as covering such a case. I propose therefore to your Lordships that we should answer the question put to us in the negative.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have considered this case carefully since it was heard yesterday, and I am confirmed in the opinion which I then held and which, I regret to say, does not coincide with that which your Lordship has just delivered.

Section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act of 1875 enacts that "no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser," under a penalty. The respondent, William Fleming, a dairyman, was charged with so selling an article of food, namely, milk. There is no question raised in the case as to the statute having been infringed by someone, that someone being Robert Fleming, acting as his father's servant. I say that because of the positive statement in the case that on the date libelled the respondent's milk cart was in charge of his son Robert Fleming, of whom the milk was demanded and by whom it was sold, but also because there is no suggestion by the Sheriff-substitute, who stated the case, that any question was raised about the fact that Robert Fleming, who made the sale, was acting as his father's servant. The Sheriff-substitute asks: On the facts proved, ought I to have convicted the respondent? His statement of the case shows that he had no doubt that he ought to have convicted him. But he had taken up the idea in the end of the day, after the respondent had appeared, had defended himself, and had failed, that he ought never to have proceeded with the case, because the respondent was not told in the indictment that the sale libelled was made not by himself, but by his son.

From the complaint it is made perfectly clear that William Fleming is a farmer and dairyman, carrying on his trade at Auldton Farm, Dalserf, and that he is not the keeper of a dairy shop in town. It is also made perfectly clear that the sale alleged took place, on a date mentioned, in a street named Dunlop Place, Dalserf, and at a specific point—opposite No. 37 thereof. But the complaint does not say anything about the respondent's son or servant. It merely charges that William Fleming did, in response to a demand made for the complainer, who is the County Medical Officer of Health, by Charles MacAra, a county inspector, sell to the complainer the milk in question. The objection taken by the Sheriff-substitute, for it does not appear to have been suggested by the respondent, is that the complaint is wanting in specification, because it does not say that William Fleming, the respondent, "did by the hand of his servant, Robert Fleming, or of a servant whose name is unknown to the complainer," sell the milk in question. The Sheriff-substitute thinks that the complainer "was bound, as a matter of reasonable specification, to state in the complaint that the demand was made to a servant of the respondent, and that the complaint as framed could not be reasonably interpreted as covering such a case." It is a curious comment on this deliverance that the respondent did without any hesitation apparently so interpret it, appeared, and pled not guilty, and again appeared at an adjourned diet.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

Ld. Johnston.

In respect that the sale by a servant is, in the sense of the statute, a sale by the employer and entirely on his responsibility, I think that this is carrying the demand for specification beyond what is reasonable. I would even say that the course taken by the Sheriff is fantastic. The precise place at which the sale was made and the date are given, and I do not see how the respondent was prejudiced by not being told that the complainer did not mean to suggest that he made the sale personally, but that it was made by his servant, named or unnamed. I do not delay your Lordships by referring to the case of Parker,[1] in which Lord Russell of Killowen laid down the law of liability in cases under this Act to the effect that, quite independently of any personal act or any personal intention, the dairyman himself is the offender if an offence is committed. The really important question in such cases is the nature, substance, and quality, of the thing sold. Careful provision is made by section 14 for the partition of the article sold into three parts for the purposes of analysis, for notification "to the seller or his agent selling the article" of the purchaser's intention to have the same analysed, and for delivery of "one of the parts to the seller or his agent." That all this was done correctly, is shown by the fact that the Sheriff-substitute states that "The milk contained only 2·73 per cent of milk fat, and the evidence led for the respondent did not, in my opinion, prove that the milk was genuine." In these circumstances, to find the charge not proven because there was want of sufficient specification appears to be somewhat incongruous and absurd. It is certainly carrying formality beyond reason. I, therefore, think that the question submitted to the Court should be answered in the affirmative, and the case remitted to the Sheriff-substitute.

That is the opinion which I should have formed without any reference to authority, but I feel I am bound to consider the authorities which have been referred to, and I take on them, I am sorry to say, an opposite view to that which your Lordship has expressed.

I take, in the first place, the case of Gray.[2] The case of Gray [2] does not differ from the present in immaterial circumstances, but it differs toto coelo. It was not a case, as under the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, in which the personal intervention of the employer is immaterial. It was a case in which, on the statute under which the prosecution proceeded, a question might arise whether the principal employer or his agent was the person who would ultimately be found liable. I refer, as your Lordship does, to Lord Moncreiff's opinion, and I think that he will be found to show in great detail how emphatically that circumstance ruled the whole consideration of that case. If, then, Gray's case [1] is totally different in its circumstances from the present, and if its circumstances are such as to require that there must be tabled not merely an agent, but the actual agent—because it is only the actual agent who will ultimately be liable—it seems to me that that can be no authority for the judgment which your Lordship proposes to pronounce here.

[1] [1899] 1 Q. B. 20.

[2] 1 F. (J.) 65, 2 Adam, 691.

Passing to another point I would refer to the recent Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1908. The 19th section of that statute, which, I may remind your Lordships, was largely passed for the purpose of shortening forms and so shortening procedure, says this with reference to proceedings under the Act such as the present:—"The charge in such complaint shall be stated in accordance with the forms contained in Schedule C to this Act. No further specification shall be required than a specification similar to that given in said forms, and (1) The description of any offence in the words of the statute or order contravened, or in similar words, shall be sufficient." When I go to the schedule I do not find that the form for every case is included, but I find that a similar case to the present is that provided for sales of liquor. In these cases the principal in the business is also the person solely liable, though he may have had no personal concern. And not one of the forms given, which are to be held sufficient, indicates that anybody but the principal in the business is to be included in the complaint. I take one of them:—"A B, hotelkeeper at so-and-so, you are charged that on Sunday . . . you did sell a half-gill of whisky to C D," and so on. There is no suggestion that it is necessary to indicate "by your servant," named or unnamed. Now, it seems to me that in this connection the case of Macaulay [2] is important. If this offence of selling milk in contravention of one statute is necessarily to be charged with the specification of the person who actually sold the milk in question, it must be so charged not merely when the sale is made from a cart in the street as here, but when it is made in a shop. You must say, "by C D, the girl who serves the shop," or if you do not know the girl's name, you must say, by "some employee to the complainer unknown." Now, if this be necessary where the sale is of milk over the counter in a shop, I cannot see on what grounds of reason it should not be equally necessary if the sale is, not of milk, but of whisky across the bar in a public-house. I cannot make any distinction between them.

When, then, I come to the case of Macaulay,[2] I am sorry to say that I read it again differently from your Lordship. In that case, which was one under the same Food and Drugs Act, the objection was that the purchase,

[1] 1 F. (J.) 65, 2 Adam, 691.

[2] 20 R. (J.) 58, 3 White, 464.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

Ld. Johnston.

not the sale, was libelled as having been made by the complainer, who was the inspector of weights and measures. The proof showed that the purchase was not made by the complainer at all, but that it was made by a subordinate on his behalf. Now, I confess I cannot distinguish between sale and purchase, or between the seller and the purchaser, if it be a question of necessary specification, in order reasonably to give information to the accused. I should say that it is rather more necessary to specify the actual purchaser than the actual seller. Because if you say that the purchase is made by A B, and the man knows that A B was never near him or his shop, it does not follow that he knows that C D, who has been, is A B's agent. If he is a seller he knows perfectly well who his own agent is. And therefore I should say that specification was more necessary in the case of the purchaser than of the seller. The Sheriff convicted, as I consider he ought to have done here, and the conviction was sustained notwithstanding the objection to want of, or rather to erroneous, specification. The ground of judgment upon which the Court proceeded is made perfectly clear. The Lord Justice-Clerk says,—"I hold that a person who sends a messenger to buy the article of food for him is the purchaser within the meaning of the Act." If I read that as applicable to the present case, it seems to me mutatis mutandis exactly to fit it. But Lord M'Laren makes it still more clear. He says,—"The purchase was made for the inspector by his servant. The inspector was creditor for the delivery of the goods under the contract of sale, and was therefore rightly described as the purchaser." Why should I not be entitled to say: The sale was made for the accused by his servant; the accused was debtor for the delivery of the goods under the contract of sale, and was therefore rightly described as the seller? It seems to me that the judgment proposed cannot stand along with that in Macaulay's case.[1]

For these reasons I am confirmed in the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute has gone wrong.

Lord Mackenzie.—We are sitting here as a Court of review, and are asked to alter the judgment of a very experienced Sheriff-substitute upon the question whether, in the circumstances of the present case, the complainer has given reasonable specification or not. The Sheriff-substitute, after hearing the evidence in the case, came to the conclusion that there was not reasonable specification. I regard the finding of the Sheriff-substitute as meaning this, that he was proceeding upon no mere technicality, but was proceeding upon the view that substantial injustice might be done to a person charged under this section of the Act if he were not told, in the body of the complaint, that the sale for which he was sought to be made criminally responsible was not made by himself but was made by the hand of a servant. The Sheriff-substitute expressed his opinion in this form: "In my opinion proof of demand to and delivery by the respondent's servant in the respondent's absence was not sufficient to prove sale by the respondent in response to a demand by the inspector, as narrated in the complaint."

[1] 20 R. (J.) 58, 3 White, 464.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

Lord Mackenzie.

I may at once make this observation in regard to Macaulay's[1] case that it appears to me to have nothing to do with the present, for the simple reason that there the person who purchased through an agent was not the person accused. The whole point in this case is that a person who sells by the hand of a servant may defend himself by saying the servant was not acting within the scope of his employment. It is plain that this defence is open to him in Scotland, not only on the authority of Lindsay v. Dempster,[2] but on the authority of cases such as Linton v. Stirling[3] and of Patrick v. Kirkhope.[4] But unless the prosecutor specifies in the body of the complaint that the sale was by the hand of a servant the person charged has not the notice necessary to enable him to prepare his defence.

Offences under the Food and Drugs Acts seem to me of a different nature from breaches of certificate under the Licensing Acts. I may perhaps be permitted to draw attention to the preamble of the Act of 1875. These Acts were originally entituled Acts to Prevent the Adulteration of Food. That expression has been taken out of the Act of 1875. It is now entituled An Act to repeal the Adulteration of Food Acts and to make better Provision for the Sale of Food and Drugs in a pure State; and the preamble sets out thus: "Whereas it is desirable that the Acts now in force relating to the adulteration of food should be repealed, and that the law regarding the sale of food and drugs in a pure and genuine condition should be amended." When one goes on to see in what association section 6 occurs, we find that section 3 deals with the prohibition of mixing any injurious ingredients and of selling the same. Section 4 deals with the prohibition of mixing drugs with injurious ingredients; and then you come on to section 6, which provides that "No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser." Now, I cannot accept the argument which was ably stated by Mr Keith, that there is no suggestion of any moral stigma if a man contravenes the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act of 1875. I do not think that the offence is in the same category as that which is constituted by a breach of a public-house certificate. In confirmation of that I may point to the amending Act of 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 30), which applies to the case in hand, and to the second section. It truly is a complaint against this man of selling something which was adulterated.

It is in these circumstances that the Sheriff-substitute has arrived at the conclusion which he has reached. I cannot find anywhere stated in the case that the son of William Fleming (the man charged) had any authority to sell this milk at all. The Sheriff-substitute finds that on the date libelled the respondent's milk-cart was in charge of his son Robert Fleming as his servant, but whether he was an agent for sale or was merely the messenger sent for the purpose of delivering milk I do not know. I do not think that the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1908, or the form in the schedule thereto applicable to the Food and Drugs Acts, help the complainer. The form in the schedule would be applicable if William Fleming had himself sold the milk. But he did not.

In the public-house cases the point was not taken that there was no

---

[1] 20 R. (J.) 58, 3 White, 464.
[2] 1912 S. C. (J.) 110, 6 Adam, 707.
[3] 20 R. (J.) 71, 1 Adam, 61.
[4] 21 R. (J.) 27, 1 Adam, 360.

Nov. 8, 1913.

Wilson v. Fleming.

Lord Mackenzie.

notice, and one can see there is a difference where the sale is by a servant who is put behind a counter or at a bar and can be put there for no other purpose. Therefore I do not think that the fact that the form of the complaints in the three public-house cases to which we were referred does not bear that the offence was committed through the hand of a servant is a warrant for omitting the specification here. It is not necessary in the present case to say anything about the case of Parker.[1] It plainly appears that, in Scotland, if the facts were as brought out in Lindsay,[2] that would supply a good defence.

On these grounds I agree with the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with the opinions which have been delivered by your Lordship in the chair and by Lord Mackenzie. I desire to add that I am very much influenced by the nature of the charge which was made against the respondent, because I think that, as to the question whether a party has or has not received fair notice of a charge, it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the kind of offence with which he is charged. Counsel for the appellant laboured hard to establish that the only question before the Court was whether what he called a commercial sale had been effected by or on behalf of the respondent, and he further argued that a conviction under section 6 of the Act of 1875 involved no moral stigma against the respondent. I entirely disagree with that suggestion. The charge, as I read it, is a charge of fraud, viz., that the respondent in response to a demand for sweet milk supplied something which was not sweet milk. I assume, of course, that cases may occur under this statute where an employer may be made vicariously responsible for the fraudulent act of his servant acting within the scope of his authority, but these cases are exceptional; and if it is proposed to make a person vicariously liable it is only fair that he should be informed, on the face of the complaint, that such an exceptional case is to be made against him. It is a rule of pleading, both in civil and in criminal practice, that a charge of fraud must be made with full specification.

I have one other observation to make. Reference has been made to Schedule C appended to the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, and to the forms which are there given for complaints in regard to public-house offences. The schedule further contains a form applicable to the offence with which we are here concerned, namely, that the respondent did, "in response to a demand for twopence worth of sweet milk, sell,"—and so on. I refer to that in order that it may be seen that I have not overlooked it. But the circumstance that the person who framed this schedule did not, as I think, contemplate what was the proper form of charge in the case where the offence was committed by a servant, does not seem to me to throw any light one way or the other upon the question which has been argued to us.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, and dismissed the appeal.

ROSS SMITH & DYKES, S.S.C.—HUTTON & JACK, Solicitors—Agents.

[1] [1899] 1 Q. B. 20.

[2] 1912 S. C. (J.) 110, 6 Adam, 707.

No. 7.

Nov. 21, 1913.

ROBERT RHIND, Appellant.—Paton.
JOHN PAULEY WIMPRESS (Officer of Customs and Excise, Dundee), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—J. A. T. Robertson.

Rhind v. Wimpress.

Revenue—Excise—Passenger vessel liquor licence—Restrictive endorsement—Contravention—Penalty—Statutory Offences—Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 47), sec. 3—Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 66), secs. 1 and 2—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. cap. 8), secs. 49 (1), 50 (3), 52, 92, 96 (1) First Schedule, D.

Held (1) that the Commissioners of Customs and Excise in issuing a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors on a "passenger vessel" under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, sec. 49 (1), and First Schedule D, are entitled to endorse upon the licence the condition against the sale of liquor on Sunday authorised by the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 1, with regard to vessels plying in Scotland; (2) that the penalty for an infringement of such a condition is that enacted by sec. 50 (3) of the Finance Act, viz., £50, and not that incorporated into the Act of 1882 from sec. 3 of the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828, viz., £10.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General Lord Mackenzie. Lord Dewar.

ROBERT RHIND, steward of and residing on board the passenger vessel "Marchioness of Bute," sailing from Dundee, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Perth on a summary complaint at the instance of John Pauley Wimpress, officer of customs and excise at Dundee. The complaint was in these terms:—"You are charged at the instance of the complainer that you, being the holder of a passenger vessel licence authorising you to sell by retail while the said vessel is engaged in carrying passengers, any intoxicating liquor and tobacco on the vessel to passengers for consumption on the vessel, said licence having endorsed thereon the condition that no intoxicating liquor shall be sold, retailed, bartered, or supplied on board the said vessel during any voyage commenced and terminated on the same Sunday, from one part of Scotland to another, or from and to the same place in Scotland, did on Sunday, the fourth day of May Nineteen hundred and thirteen, on board the said 'Marchioness of Bute,' while the same was on a voyage between Dundee in Forfarshire and Newburgh in Fifeshire and Perth in Perthshire and back to Dundee, commenced and terminated on said fourth day of May, and was at the time in the estuary of the River Tay" sell certain intoxicating liquors to a person specified "in contravention of the said condition of the said licence, said contravention of said condition being deemed and taken to be, by virtue of section 2 of the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Victoria, chapter 66),* a retailing or selling

* The Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 66), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "It shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, or for any officer duly authorised by them to grant licences for the retail of intoxicating liquors on board packets, boats, and other vessels employed for the carriage of passengers from one part of Scotland to another, or going from and returning to the same place in Scotland on the same day, in terms of the recited Acts, to endorse on such licences a condition that no intoxicating liquor shall be sold, retailed, bartered, or supplied on board such vessels during any voyage commenced and terminated on the same Sunday."

Sec. 2. "If any person holding a licence having such a condition as afore-

Nov. 21, 1913.

Rhind v. Wimpress.

intoxicating liquors without having taken out a licence, contrary to section 50 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edward VII., chapter 8), whereby you are liable to a penalty of fifty pounds, which penalty the Commissioners of Customs and Excise have elected, and in default of payment to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, sections 47 and 48."

The accused, having been convicted after a trial by the Sheriff-substitute (Sym), appealed to the High Court of Justiciary on a stated case.

The case set forth:—

"The appellant is the holder of a licence. . . . It is headed 'Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. United Kingdom, Passenger Vessel Licence.' It is dated at Dundee, and bears to be granted by a Collector of Customs and Excise duly authorised. It bears to grant licence to the appellant, a person belonging to the 'Marchioness of Bute,' to sell by retail, while the vessel is engaged in carrying passengers, any intoxicating liquor and tobacco on the vessel to passengers for consumption on the vessel from its date 19th June 1912 until and including 28th May 1913, said endorsed thereon shall sell . . . or shall permit to be sold . . . any intoxicating liquor on a Sunday on board any such vessel, in contravention of the said condition, such contravention shall be deemed and taken to be a retailing or selling intoxicating liquors without having taken out a licence, and such person shall be guilty of an offence within the meaning of the third section of the first recited Act [the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 47)], and shall be liable to the penalties therein provided."

---

The Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 47), enacts:—

Sec. 3. "If any person shall retail or sell, on board any packet, boat, or other vessel employed for the carriage or conveyance of passengers from one part of the United Kingdom to another part thereof, any foreign wine, strong beer, cyder, perry, spirituous liquors, or tobacco, without having taken out such licence as is by this Act required, every such person shall for every such offence incur and be liable to a penalty of ten pounds."

The Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. cap. 8), enacts:—

Sec. 49 (1). "The licences specified in the First Schedule to this Act shall be in such form as the Commissioners direct. . . ." The First Schedule includes—"(D) Passenger vessel licences."

Sec. 50 (3). "If any person sells by retail any intoxicating liquor, for the retail sale of which he is required to take out a licence under this Act, without taking out such a licence, he shall be liable in respect of each offence, at the election of the Commissioners, either to an excise penalty of fifty pounds, or to an excise penalty equal to treble the amount of the full duty. (4) If any person holding any of the licences specified in the First Schedule to this Act contravenes the terms of the licence, or sells otherwise than as he is authorised by the licence, or contravenes any of the provisions applicable to the licence under that Schedule, he shall be liable in respect of each offence, if the offence is not an offence for which any specific penalty is imposed by any Act relating to excise duties or licences, to an excise penalty of fifty pounds."

Sec. 52. ". . . The expression 'passenger vessel' means a vessel of any description employed for the carriage and conveyance of passengers which goes from any place in the United Kingdom to any other place in the United Kingdom, or goes from and returns to the same place in the United Kingdom on the same day."

Sec. 92. "All the powers, provisions, regulations, and directions contained in any Act relating to excise duties or licences, or to penalties or forfeitures under Excise Acts, and now or hereafter in force, shall respectively be of full force and effect with respect to the excise duties charged by, and the excise he having paid for the licence the sum of £10. On the back, and dated 20th June 1912, are, inter alia, the words, 'This licence is granted on the condition that no intoxicating liquor shall be sold, retailed, bartered, or supplied on board the vessel named in this licence during any voyage commenced and terminated on the same Sunday from one part of Scotland to another or from and to the same place in Scotland.'" [The case then stated the terms of the complaint, and proceeded]—

"Counsel for the appellant stated objections to the competency and relevancy of the complaint. These objections were in substance as follows:—(1) The licence is headed as under the Finance Act, 1909-10, and does not bear whether it was granted under that Act or under the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment Act, 1882, and it is a licence applicable to the United Kingdom which it is not competent to endorse restrictively; such a restriction could only be endorsed on a licence bearing to be limited to Scotland. The said Act of 1882 does not apply to this licence. (2) The second objection was: If the Act of 1882 applies, then the Act which creates the offence provides the penalty, and the prosecutor must go to the provisions of 9 George IV., chap. 47, in order to find the penalty. The penalty there is £10. Though the last-named Act has been repealed it is still competent to refer to it to get the amount of penalty, and the appellant could only be liable in a penalty of £10 there stated. It is at all events incompetent to claim a £50 penalty." [Certain other objections were stated in the case which were not maintained on appeal.]

"I was of opinion that the licence was granted under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and that it was competent in a licence granted for a Dundee steamer going to and from places in Scotland on the same day to endorse it with the condition which it bore. My opinion was that the Passenger Vessels Act, 1882, is not an Act for granting licences, but an Act making it lawful to endorse such licences as the appellant's. I was also of opinion that the Commissioners of Excise were entitled to issue the licence which the appellant held, and to do so in the form in which it was expressed. [The Sheriff-substitute stated his decision upon the other objections.] I therefore repelled the objections.

"The case then went to proof. I found it proved on the evidence that while the vessel was on the voyage libelled on Sunday, 4th May, as libelled, the appellant sold to the passenger as libelled the various liquors which are specified in the complaint. The said passenger was accompanied by another passenger who was at the time in the employment of the Commissioners of Excise, and who was residing in Dundee. The voyage of the said steamer was from Dundee to Perth, calling at Newburgh, and returning to Dundee on the same Sunday, 4th May, as the voyage began.

"I found the whole material statements of the complaint proved. . . . I imposed a penalty of twenty pounds."

---

licences mentioned in this Act, so far as the same are applicable and are consistent with the provisions of this Act, as fully and effectually as if the same had been herein specially enacted with reference to the said duties and licences."

Sec. 96 (1). "The Acts specified in the Sixth Schedule to this Act are hereby repealed to the extent mentioned in the third column of that Schedule." The Sixth Schedule includes the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 47), as repealed to the extent of the whole Act.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Rhind v. Wimpress.

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was the complaint competent and relevant? (2) On the facts proved, was it competent for me to convict the accused?"

The appeal was heard on 10th November 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was incompetent (1) in respect that the Commissioners of Excise had no power to impose the condition contravention of which was charged. The Commissioners had power to issue two classes of passenger vessel licences, (a) licences applicable only to vessels carrying passengers from one part of Scotland to another, or going from and returning to the same place in Scotland on the same day, under the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882, section 1, and (b) licences applicable to vessels going between any parts of the United Kingdom, under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, section 49 (1), First Schedule, D. The Commissioners were empowered to endorse the Scottish licence by section 1 of the Act of 1882, but they had no warrant for endorsing the United Kingdom licence. The licence in question was a United Kingdom licence, and the endorsation was therefore ultra vires of the Commissioners. (2) In any event, it was incompetent to claim a penalty of £50 under section 50 (3) or (4) of the Finance Act, 1910. The offence charged was created by the Act of 1882, and that Act set up a specific penalty of £10 by reference to the Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828. Although the Act of 1828 was repealed, it was still competent to refer to it to ascertain the amount of the penalty.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The licence was validly endorsed. It was admittedly a United Kingdom licence, granted under the Finance Act, 1910, but that was the only statute in force authorising the Commissioners to issue passenger vessel licences. The Act of 1882 was not a licensing Act, it gave no power to grant a particular class of licence applicable only to Scotland, but merely gave power to endorse the licence held by a particular class of passenger vessel, viz., those not sailing to ports outside Scotland. That power was expressly continued by section 92 of the Act of 1910, and had been properly exercised in the present instance. (2) The penalty was that provided by the Act of 1910. The Passage Vessel Licences Act, 1828, to which the Act of 1882 referred for the penalty, was repealed by the 1910 Act, section 96 (1), Sixth Schedule. It was therefore necessary to look to the Act of 1910 for the penalty, and section 50 (3) of that Act applied in terms to the offence as defined by the Act of 1882, section 2.

At advising on 21st November 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The case for the Commissioners of Excise, so ably and clearly presented to us by Mr Robertson, appears to me to be water-tight in all its compartments.

The appellant is holder of a passenger vessel certificate empowering him to sell intoxicating liquors on board the steam vessel "Marchioness of Bute" to passengers for consumption on board. That licence was granted by the Commissioners, or by someone authorised by them, in virtue of the powers conferred by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, section 49, [1] Guthrie v. Wilson, (1910) 6 Adam 386, per Lord Ardwall, at p. 393.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Rhind v. Wimpress.

Lord Justice-General.

subsection 1, which at the date of this licence, 19th June 1912, was the only statutory enactment then in force empowering the Commissioners of Excise to grant such a licence; for by the 96th section, subsection 1, of the Act of 1910, and the Sixth Schedule, all other licensing Acts were repealed as from that date; and in the repealing clause was embraced the Passage Vessel Licences Act of 1828. When this is clearly apprehended the remainder of the case is plain sailing. The Commissioners of Excise, on the day following the date of the licence, endorsed upon it a condition in these terms:—"This licence is granted on the condition that no intoxicating liquor shall be sold, retailed, bartered, or supplied on board the vessel named in this licence during any voyage commenced and terminated on the same Sunday from one part of Scotland to another or from and to the same place in Scotland." It was contended to us that the Commissioners of Excise were acting ultra vires when they endorsed this condition on the licence. I cannot agree. They were expressly empowered to impose this condition by the terms of the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882, section 1, which was in full force at the date of the Finance Act, and was not embraced in the repeal clause of that Act. The Act of 1882 is not a licensing Act in the proper sense of the term. Its provisions only come into force after a licence has been granted; when a licence is issued, then the power to impose this condition emerges.

It has been found by the Sheriff in this case, as matter of fact, that the offence which is libelled in the complaint has been committed. He finds it proved on the evidence that while the vessel was on the voyage libelled on Sunday, 4th May, as libelled, the appellant sold to the passenger as libelled the various liquors which are specified in the complaint. He further says:—"I found the whole material statements of the complaint proved."

Well, then, if the condition has been lawfully imposed, and if it has been violated, what is the consequence? The consequence is very clearly set out in the second section of the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment (Scotland) Act of 1882, which provides that, if anybody holding a licence such as this shall sell or permit to be sold any intoxicating liquor on a Sunday on board any such vessel, in contravention of the condition which I have just read as endorsed upon the licence, then such contravention shall be deemed and taken to be a selling or retailing of intoxicating liquors without having taken out a licence, and such person shall be guilty of an offence and liable to the punishment prescribed by the 3rd section of 9 Geo. IV. cap. 47. But as I have said that Act was repealed by the 96th section and the Sixth Schedule of the Finance Act of 1910. To the Act of 1910 we are, therefore, thrown back when we come to search for the character of the offence and the nature of the penalty; and we there find them clearly set out in the 50th section, and 3rd subsection of the statute, which reads as follows:—"If any person sells by retail any intoxicating liquor, for the retail sale of which he is required to take out a licence under this Act, without taking out such licence, he shall be liable in respect of each offence, at the election of the Commissioners, either to an excise penalty of £50, or to an excise penalty equal to treble the amount of the full duty." He is here asked to pay, as I understand, an excise penalty of £50, and the Sheriff has imposed a penalty.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Rhind v. Wimpress.

Lord Justice-General.

Now that is the whole case,—clear and simple when once it is realised, first, that the statute of 1910 was at the time this licence was granted the only statutory authority for the issue of such licences, and second, that the statute of 1882 was not repealed by the repealing clause of the statute of 1910, but, on the contrary, that the powers conferred by the statute of 1882 were expressly carried on by the 92nd section of the Finance Act of 1910. But it was urged on the part of the appellant here that inasmuch as the licence was headed "Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. United Kingdom, Passenger Vessel Licence," it was incompetent to impose the condition, and that, therefore, the penalty could not have been incurred. I cannot see on what ground any such contention could legally arise, and we were referred to no clause of any Act of Parliament which so prescribed. I come, therefore, without any hesitation to the conclusion that the Sheriff was right in the finding at which he arrived, and that, accordingly, we should answer both questions put to us in the affirmative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In this case I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has come to a right conclusion. The argument for the appellant was based on the assumption that the Inland Revenue authorities had no authority under any of the statutes to endorse the licence held by him in the manner set out in the case. This endorsation bears—[His Lordship read the endorsation]. The foundation of this argument was that there are two classes of certificate—what the appellant's counsel termed United Kingdom licences, and limited certificates applicable to Scotland; that the latter might be endorsed under the Act of 1882; but that there was no warrant for putting the indorsation on the United Kingdom licence which he holds—a licence granted under the Finance Act of 1910.

An examination of the statutes shows that this argument is not well founded. The appellant holds a licence granted to him under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1910. The authority for granting this licence is section 49 (1) and the First Schedule. The First Schedule—D—deals with passenger vessel licences, and there is no room for making a distinction between one class of licence and another. The previous licensing statutes are repealed by the Finance Act of 1910, section 96 (1) (Sixth Schedule), and this repeals section 45 of the Inland Revenue Act of 1880—the previous licensing statute. The question whether the Inland Revenue authorities were entitled to endorse a licence granted under the Finance Act, 1910, depends upon section 92 of that Act. It provides—[His Lordship read the section]. It follows from this that the conditions contained in section 1 of the Passenger Vessels Licences Amendment Act, 1882, are carried forward and apply to licences granted under the 1910 Act. The fallacy underlying the argument for the appellant is to be found in the construction he puts upon section 1 of the 1882 Act. As I read it, it is a substantive provision dealing with one matter, and one matter only, viz., the endorsation of a particular condition upon licences issued for the retail of intoxicating liquors on board a certain class of vessels. These are "vessels employed for the carriage of passengers from one part of Scotland to another, or going from and returning to the same place on the same day," and the condition is, that no intoxicating liquor shall be sold, retailed, bartered, or supplied on board such vessels during any voyage commenced and terminated on the same Sunday." This section does not confer any power to grant licences nor does it deal with the form of the certificate. It confers power upon two classes of persons to endorse licences, viz.—(1) the Commissioners of Inland Revenue; and (2) any officer duly authorised by them to grant licences for the retail of intoxicating liquors on board vessels. The section cannot be read as the appellant wishes to read it—that it shall be lawful for (1) the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and (2) any officer duly authorised by them—to grant licences. That is not the purpose of the section at all. Nor would it be possible, putting this construction on the opening part of the section, to make grammar out of the remainder.

I therefore hold that the licence in question in this case was validly endorsed. What then was the offence of which the appellant here was guilty? Reference must be made to section 2 of the 1882 Act which, read short, provides that if any person holding a licence having such a condition endorsed thereon shall sell intoxicating liquor on a Sunday on board any such vessel, then the selling shall be deemed to have been without a licence. It is to be noted that this section does not create the offence but explains what the quality of such an act is. This provision again is carried forward into the Act of 1910 by the provisions of section 92. It is necessary, however, to return to section 2 of the Act of 1882, the concluding words of which are, "and such persons shall be guilty of an offence within the meaning of the third section of the first recited Act, and shall be liable to the penalties therein provided." The first recited Act is 9 Geo. IV. cap. 47, section 3 of which would have applied to the present case. The whole of the Act 9 Geo. IV. cap. 47 is, however, repealed by section 96 (1), and Sixth Schedule of the Finance Act of 1910.

The result of all this is to bring into play for the purposes of the present case the provisions of section 50 (3) of the 1910 Act, which provides—[His Lordship read the section]. As explained above the selling libelled in this complaint must "be deemed to have been without a licence." It follows he is guilty of a contravention of section 50 (3) of the 1910 Act. The decision in the case of Guthrie v. Wilson[1] is not inconsistent with the foregoing. There the person charged was not the holder of a licence under the Act of 1910.

In answer to the questions of law I am of opinion that the complaint was competent and relevant, and that, on the facts proved, it was competent for the Sheriff-substitute to convict the accused.

The Lord Justice-General intimated that LORD DEWAR, who was absent at advising, concurred.

THE COURT answered both questions of law in the affirmative.

MAXWELL, GILL, & PRINGLE, W.S.—ROBERT PRINGLE, W.S.—Agents.

[1] 6 Adam, 386.

No. 8.
Nov. 21, 1913.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—W. Mitchell, A.-D.
A B, Panel.—G. Watt, K.C.—Brand.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Crime—Incest—Intercourse with wife's sister while wife alive—Act 1567, 1 Jas. VI. cap. 14.

Held by a full bench (diss. Lord Johnston) that sexual intercourse between a man and his wife's sister during his wife's lifetime is not a crime by the law of Scotland.

HIGH COURT. (Full Bench.) Lord Justice-General. Lord Dundas. Ld. Johnston. Lord Salvesen. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Guthrie. Lord Skerrington.

A B was charged in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen on an indictment setting forth that "being the lawful husband of and residing with C you did, on several occasions, in November and December 1912 . . . have incestuous connection with D the lawful sister of the said C, your wife: contrary to the Act 1 James VI. cap. 14, and the 18th Chapter of Leviticus therein referred to." *

The panel pleaded guilty, and was remitted to the High Court for sentence.

The diet was called on 8th November 1913 before the Lord Justice-General, Lord Johnston, Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Skerrington, when, objections having been stated to the relevancy of the indictment, the Court ordered the case to be re-heard before a full bench. The case was re-heard before a full bench on 12th November 1913.

Argued for the panel;—No crime had been committed in the sense of the Act libelled.[1] Being a penal statute the Act had to be strictly interpreted,[2] especially when it was borne in mind that the subsequent Act 1649, cap. 16, designed to supplement its provisions, had been expressly repealed. Accordingly the crime of incest was limited to cases expressly dealt with in the 18th chapter of the Book of Leviticus.[3] Now the only portion of that chapter which dealt with incest were verses 6 to 17, and these verses made no reference to intercourse between a man and his wife's sister. The relations between such persons were dealt with in verse 18, and that verse merely contained a prohibition either against polygamy generally or against marriage with a wife's sister during the life of the wife, according as "sister" was interpreted in the broad sense of "sister woman" or in its narrower and more usual sense of daughter of the same parents.[4] It was significant that in each of the verses 6 to 17 the reason for the prohibition was stated to be nearness of kin, while in verse 18 that

* The Act of 1567, 1 Jas. VI. cap. 14:—"Statutes and Ordinaines, that quhatsumever person or persones, that committes the said abhominable cryme of incest—that is to say, quhatsumever person or persones they be, that abuses their bodie with sik persones in degrie as God in his Word hes expreslie forbidden, in ony tyme cumming, as is contained in the xviii. chapter of Leviticus, sall be punished to the death."

Verse 18 of the 18th chapter of Leviticus (according to the Authorised Version of the Scriptures) is as follows:—"Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her life time."

[1] Act 1567, 1 James VI. cap. 14.

[2] Fenton v. Livingstone, (1861) 23 D. 366, Lord Deas, at pp. 382; Hume, i. 446-7.

[3] Hume, i. 448.

[4] Fraser, Husband and Wife, i. 113-14, 122-24, ii. 1520. Reference was also made to the 5th verse of the 25th chapter of Deuteronomy.

reason was not given, but another, viz., the fear of "vexing" the first wife. It was to be noted that in England a sister-in-law was not one of the female persons enumerated in the Punishment of Incest Act, 1908,[1] carnal intercourse with whom was punishable.[2] The recorded convictions under the Act upon which the Crown founded were in no way binding upon the Court and should not be followed, as they proceeded upon a wrong interpretation of the Act and of the 18th chapter of Leviticus. Further the relevancy of the indictments in the earlier cases never seemed to have been challenged,[3] which was doubtless accounted for by the fact that the question of the relationship of the person with whom the adultery was committed was one in which the accused had no tangible interest, as adultery of any description was punishable with death. This omission also entirely destroyed the value of the later cases, which merely professed to follow the earlier ones on a question already settled by their authority; and it was worth noting that in the last case[4] the penalty imposed by the Court had been conditionally remitted by the Home Secretary. But even if the offence libelled in the present case was formerly criminal it could not be so regarded in the present state of the law. Since the passing of the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907,[5] the degree of affinity subsisting between a man and his wife's sister could not be regarded as a forbidden degree, and incest could be committed only by parties within the forbidden degrees.[6] Therefore connection between a married man and his wife's sister, however offensive, could not now be regarded as incestuous. There could be no incest between a man and one whom he might lawfully marry if he became a widower.

Argued for the Crown;—It was idle to suggest that the Scots Act of 1567 had been repealed, either expressly or by implication, by the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907, which was a British statute passed for no purpose connected with criminal law, but limited entirely to the sphere of civil contract, and containing in section 3 provisions which safeguarded existing enactments applicable to England on the subject of incestuous adultery.[7] The question accordingly depended entirely upon the Act 1567, cap. 14, and the 18th chapter of Leviticus. Under that Act and that chapter intercourse between a husband and the sister of his living wife was incest, and this view had been held and acted upon by the Court in Scotland consistently from early times,[8] and there was no reason for departing from previous decisions, especially in view of the fact that in the latest case, Oman,[9] the argument now submitted on behalf of the panel had virtually been before the Court. That the recorded cases had gone to a jury necessarily implied that the Court had held the indictments therein

[1] 8 Edw. VII. cap. 45.
[2] Russell on Crimes, i. 973.
[3] Hume, i. 449-50; Fraser, Husband and Wife, ii. 1522-3.
[4] H. M. Advocate v. Oman, (1855) 2 Irv. 146. See also H. M. Advocate v. Stewart and Wallace, (1845) 2 Broun, 544.
[5] 7 Edw. VII. cap. 47.
[6] Alison, i. 562.
[7] Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 85), sec. 27.
[8] Cases cited in Hume on Crimes, vol. i. 450; Margaret Scott, Jan. 15, 1580, 1 Pitcairn, Part ii. 84; Stewart, June 16, 1613, 3 Pitcairn, 248; Fenton v. Livingstone, 23 D. 366, Lord Deas, at p. 382; H. M. Advocate v. Oman, 2 Irv. 146.
[9] 2 Irv. 146.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

to be relevant. The interpretation of the 18th chapter of Leviticus which had been adopted in these decisions was the correct one. Verse 6 contained a general prohibition against connection between persons "near of kin," and verses 7 to 18 provided a list of examples which clearly established that under "near of kin" were included not only kin by blood but kin by marriage. Verse 19 clearly started upon a totally different topic, but there was no reason whatever for excluding verse 18 from the list of examples of prohibited intercourse between persons near of kin, the phraseology of the verse being in all important respects analogous to the phraseology of the preceding verses. Intercourse between a husband and his sister-in-law was already impliedly prohibited by verse 9, which prohibited intercourse between a man and his sister, and verse 18 expressly repeated the prohibition, but for obvious reasons limited it to the lifetime of the wife. Verse 18 therefore struck at two separate things, on the one hand taking a wife's sister to wife, and on the other hand having sexual intercourse with a wife's sister during the life of the wife. There was no warrant for reading the word "sister" in any sense except the ordinary one. At the date of the Act bigamy and incest were both criminal offences, and the Act was passed to increase the severity of the law. It was significant that in none of the cases and by none of the writers had any distinction been drawn between consanguinity and affinity.[1] If any relaxation of the law was required it could only be carried out by means of legislation.

At advising on 21st November 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—In my judgment this indictment discloses no crime according to the law of Scotland. The question whether it does so or not depends, I consider, exclusively upon the just construction of the old Scots Act of 1567, chap. 14. That Act is entitled "Anent them that committis incest," and the offence is limited to those "that abuses their bodie with sik persones in degrie, as God in his Word hes expreslie forbidden, in ony tyme cumming, as is contained in the xviii. chapter of Leviticus."

Now, that statute for the first time raised a certain act to the rank of a capital offence, and that being so, I unreservedly number myself amongst the many (of whom Hume speaks) who think "that the one consideration in the decision of those high interests of life and death shall be, What hath the statute said; and that neither custom, analogy, nor inference of the purpose of the Legislature, has here any just claim to be regarded. How rigorous soever the enactment, so far as it is clear and positive, it must be obeyed: But, in any point that is ambiguous or equivocal, a strict and literal construction to the side of mercy seems to be the only right one."[2]

I proceed at once to consider "What hath the statute said?" Now,

[1] H. M. Advocate v. Stewart and Wallace, (1845) 2 Broun, 544, Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, at pp. 546 and 547-8, Lord Justice-General Boyle, at p. 549; Fenton v. Livingstone, 23 D., 366, at pp. 370 and 371, Lord President M'Neill, at pp. 373 and 374, Lord Curriehill, at pp. 376-7, Lord Deas, at pp. 381-2; Purves' Trustees v. Purves, (1895) 22 R. 513, Lord Kincairney, at p. 516, Lord Low, at p. 537; Alison, i. 562-564; Hume, i. 449-50.

[2] Hume, i. 447.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Justice-General.

the answer to that question seems to me to be this, that the statute condemns to death any who commits the act which is expressly prohibited in the 18th chapter of Leviticus. And, in construing that chapter, I consider that we are not entitled to proceed by way of inference or analogy, or by piecing together separate and independent passages and considering the context. It appears to me that "all that the statute does is to enact the punishment of death for the offences which the chapter expressly forbids. To whatever the chapter does not expressly forbid,—whether in itself an offence or not,—the statute, in its terms, is inapplicable." These are the words of Lord Deas with regard to this very statute, used in the case of Fenton v. Livingstone.[1] For the purposes of my present judgment, I am ready to accept the view that the Scots statute of 1567 does not proceed upon the original Hebrew but upon the translation in use in Scotland, which is not said to have been rendered as was contended in the case of Fenton v. Livingstone.[1]

That translation, I am convinced, was what is commonly known as the Geneva Version of the Bible. It was first published in the year 1560, the year in which the first Protestant General Assembly met at Edinburgh. It passed into immediate, widespread, and lasting use. It was printed in Roman letters. It was divided into chapters and verses. It was in a handy quarto and not in an unmanageable folio. It was the favourite of authors and preachers. It outlasted the publication of the Authorised Version by a period of about 30 years. It was, we are told, the cherished volume in Puritan and Covenanting households. But, what is more to the purpose, it was the Geneva Version that was, for the first time, so far as we know, published in Scotland. The first licence to print the Bible was granted in the year following the statute of 1567. In 1568, Robert Lekprevick, the King's printer, received a licence to print the Bible. The licence is extant. For some reason or another it was not carried into effect, but I cannot doubt, if it had been, it would have been the Geneva Bible which would have been taken, because, six years later, in March 1574, when the historical situation remained entirely unchanged, and when Arbuthnot and Bassandyne applied to the General Assembly for a licence to print the Bible, we read that the Kirk granted "this godly proposition" and "promised to deliver the authentic copy which they shall follow, to them betwixt and the last day of Aprile." Now, the authentic copy handed to Arbuthnot and Bassandyne in 1574 was none other than the second or folio edition of the Geneva Bible published in the year 1562. And Bassandyne's Bible, as it was called, was not merely, as Woodrow says, an approximation to the Geneva Bible but was an exact reprint of the Geneva Bible. And it is not immaterial to observe that the calendar and chronological notes which accompany it were prepared and subscribed by Mr Robert Pollock, who was not only minister of the West Port, but one of the Lords of Council and Session.

I turn, therefore, without hesitation to the Geneva Bible as the authentic copy, and most probably the translation which was before the Scots

[1] 23 D., at p. 382.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Justice-General.

Legislature in 1567, to find there which were the offences which were expressly prohibited. I find the whole list in the 18th chapter of Leviticus, from the 6th verse to the 17th verse inclusive, and it is significant that the sixth verse opens with the words, "None shall come near to any of the kindred of his flesh." Then follow a succession of prohibitions, and a fresh subject is opened, as I read the chapter, at verse 18, which is in the following terms:—"Also thou shalt not take a wife with her sister, during her life, to vex her." That is the verse which is founded upon by the Crown in support of this indictment. It is the only verse in the 18th chapter of Leviticus which has any relation to the act which is charged here as the crime of incest. Now, reading that verse, it appears to me not to be open to construction. It is not ambiguous. It is clear, plain, and explicit in its terms; while recognising,—not encouraging, not permitting, but recognising—polygamy, it prohibits the polygamist from taking two sisters to wife at the same time, and the reason given is the creation of jealousy or envy in the household—"to vex her." And I observe that the marginal note in the Geneva Edition makes that very plain in the following language, "By seing thine affection more bent to her sister then to her." More significant still is the marginal note to be found in Cranmer's or the Great Bible of 1539, and in Matthew's Bible published in 1551. The marginal note, without comment, in both these versions is "Genesis 29"; and, when you turn to the 29th chapter of Genesis, you find there the account of the unhappy matrimonial relations of Jacob with his two wives, the two sisters Leah and Rachel.

That seems to me to solve any doubt, if doubt ever existed, with regard to the interpretation of the 18th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus. I come therefore very clearly to the opinion that the offence which is charged in this indictment as incest is not forbidden by any verse, line, or word in the 18th chapter of Leviticus, either expressly or by implication. I may add here, in parenthesis, that I have fully availed myself of the researches of my brother Lord Johnston into the various readings or translations of the verses which we have to construe in all the editions of the Bible published then and even later, and if I had to construe any one of them I should have come to exactly the same conclusion as I have reached in construing the 18th verse of this chapter as it is found in the Geneva Bible.

But then it was urged on behalf of the Crown and the Public Prosecutor here that this particular statute may "have been so construed, in practice, as to fix upon it a construction, in this respect, different from what we would otherwise have given it." I am now reading the words of Lord Deas in the case of Fenton v. Livingstone.[1] I cannot assent to that proposition as applied to a highly penal and criminal statute, and especially to a statute which, in my judgment, is free from all ambiguity. For I hold it to be well-settled law that as against a plain statutory law no usage can prevail. These are the words used in the latest House of Lords judgment in which this topic was considered—the case of The Walker Trustees v. Lord Advocate.[2] And the limits and scope of the application of the doctrine of contemporanea

[1] 23 D., at p. 382.

[2] 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 12.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Justice-General.

expositio in relation to these old Acts of Parliament has never been better or more clearly stated than by Lord Watson in the case of Clyde Navigation Trustees v. Laird & Sons,[1] where he says that "When there are ambiguous expressions in an Act passed one or two centuries ago, it may be legitimate to refer to the construction put upon these expressions throughout a long course of years, by the unanimous consent of all parties interested, as evidencing what must presumably have been the intention of the Legislature at that remote period." That I accept as strictly applicable only to the case of statutes regulating civil rights and statutes which contain ambiguous expressions. It is, in my judgment, wholly inapplicable to the case in hand, because, in the first place, we are dealing with a highly penal statute where no inference from usage or construction can, I think, be admitted, and, in the second place, with a statute which seems to me not to be open to or susceptible of bearing two meanings.

But it was further urged on the part of the Public Prosecutor that by a long series of decisions it has been settled that intercourse in a wife's lifetime with her sister infers a statutory penalty, and it is said that these judgments do not leave the question open. I am again reading from the opinion of Lord Deas in the case which I have mentioned. I have made diligent search, in common with the rest of your Lordships, for that long series of decisions and for these judgments which do not leave the question open, and my search has been fruitless. Over a period of three and a half centuries I find not a train of decisions, nor a judgment foreclosing this question, but four isolated instances—examples as Hume calls them—three in the seventeenth century and then, after the lapse of two centuries, one in the middle of the nineteenth century.

In the seventeenth century we have the cases mentioned by Hume.[2] The first of James Stewart, in July 1613, the second of Henry Dick, in August 1629, and the third of Donald Brymer, in July 1649. In not one of these cases or examples, so far as we have been able to ascertain, was the question which we are considering to-day raised and discussed, or considered and decided. In all these instances the case went to trial without discussion, and the prisoner was convicted and sentenced. But, even if the question had been then raised and then considered and then decided, I should have come to exactly the same conclusion as I come to to-day, for I should have considered that the judgment was probably to be accounted for, as Hume points out, by the manners and opinions of that time, and certainly not by the peculiar disposition of the Judges who then sat in this Court. But it is sufficient to observe that the question was never raised, probably because the prisoner had no interest to raise it in respect that adultery in cases such as this was, in these days, punishable by death. I say exactly the same thing of the case of Oman[3] in 1855. In that case Lords Ivory and Deas expressly declined to consider or to decide the question which was raised on the indictment. They regarded it as inexpedient to do so. They thought the door was closed. With great respect, I differ from these learned Judges. Sitting alone, I should have [1] (1883) 8 App. Cas. 658, at p. 673.

[2] Hume, i. 450.

[3] 2 Irv. 146.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Justice-General.

taken a different course, because the statute is in my opinion so clear, so absolutely free from all ambiguity, and because the question had never before been considered; it was open and not closed. But sitting along with your Lordships—a full bench of this High Court—I would have no hesitation whatever in brushing aside any decision or even any series of decisions upon a question such as this where I entertain so clear a view with regard to the meaning of the statute. I can never assent to the proposition that if we think, sitting full bench, a decision, or even a series of decisions, to be clearly wrong, it is outwith our powers to right that wrong.

I have made no reference and expressly refrained from making any reference whatever to the recent statute (Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907 [1]). I say nothing whatever as to the effect which the recent statute has and ought to have upon our judgment in relation to this indictment. I desire it to be made perfectly clear, so far as I am concerned, that the facts set forth in this indictment do not to-day constitute—and never did at any time constitute—a crime by the law of Scotland.

I therefore move your Lordships to hold this indictment irrelevant and, by necessary consequence, to release the prisoner.

Lord Dundas.—I agree in the conclusion at which your lordship in the chair has arrived; but, while I do not wish to indicate dissent from anything you have said, I prefer to reach my conclusion by a different path.

The accused admits having had carnal connection with his wife's sister, his wife being alive. We have to decide whether or not these facts are relevant to infer the crime of incest. The indictment libels, in common form, that what was done is "contrary to the Act 1 James VI. cap. 14, and the 18th chapter of Leviticus, therein referred to." It appears to me that the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907,[1] has a crucial bearing upon the question before us. Since the passing of that Act, it would undoubtedly be lawful for the accused to marry his wife's sister, after the death of his wife; and it is impossible to suppose that a marriage between them, under that condition, could be held by the Criminal Court to be an incestuous relation. One must consider, then, whether or not the accused and his sister-in-law now stand, while his wife is still alive, within such "degree" as God in His Word has expressly forbidden, as is contained in the 18th chapter of Leviticus. There is no degree of consanguinity between them; the degree is one of affinity. It seems to me that, once established, the degree of affinity must subsist whether the wife be alive or dead; in other words, that its subsistence does not depend upon the wife being alive. Thus, for example, in Purves' Trustees,[2] the wife was dead before the man went through a ceremony of marriage with her niece; yet the Court held that there was no marriage, owing to the subsistence of the affinity. Now, I do not, as already observed, suppose that, since the passing of the Act of 1907, an indictment for incest could possibly be held relevant on account of intercourse between the accused and his sister-in-law, if they should marry, the wife being dead, notwithstanding the degree of affinity subsisting between them. I do not, then, see how that degree of affinity can, since the passing of the recent Act, afford a relevant basis of indictment for incest on the ground of their intercourse, however wrong and censurable, during the lifetime of the wife. I may add that I do not think that section 3 of the Act of 1907, which reserves to an injured wife in England a special remedy, which she has by common law in this country, has any material bearing on this question as to the relevancy of a Scots indictment.

[1] 7 Edw. VII. cap. 47.

[2] 22 R. 513.

If these views are sound, I am not concerned to consider the difficult problems which might arise as to the exact scope and meaning of the 18th chapter of Leviticus; nor whether in prior cases—the ancient ones in 1613, 1629, and 1649, and the modern one in 1855—an indictment based on facts similar to those before us was, or was not, rightly held to be relevant.

I agree in thinking that this indictment is not relevant to infer the crime of incest.

Lord Johnston.—I understand that I am alone among your Lordships in holding that the intercourse of a husband with the sister of his wife, during the latter's life, is deemed incest and is punishable as a crime by the law of Scotland. With this knowledge, I need not assure your Lordships that I have anxiously reconsidered the question. But I feel myself unable to arrive at any other result.

Shortly after the Reformation incest was made a criminal offence by the Act 1567, c. 14. That Act stands unrepealed. The gist of that statute is to declare that whoever in time coming commits the crime of incest, that is to say, "abuses their bodie with sik persones in degrie" as God in the 18th chapter of Leviticus has expressly forbidden, shall be punished to the death. The penalty is restricted by the general provision of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, section 56.

The Act of 1567 thus incorporates by reference the 6th verse of Leviticus, chapter 18, and the catena of verses which follow. Verse 6 says, "None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness: I am the Lord." The verses which follow are, it is generally received, examples merely, and not exhaustive of the cases covered by verse 6. But they are examples of consanguinity and of affinity in almost equal numbers, thus showing that when verse 6 speaks of "near of kin to him" it includes kin by marriage as well as kin by blood. Moreover it is commonly understood that, when a relationship by consanguinity is expressly mentioned, the same relationship by affinity is impliedly included.

The question in the present case is primarily this—Does the catena of instances following verse 6 stop with verse 17, or include also verse 18? The latter verse says in the Authorised Version of 1611, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other, in her life time." The turn of phrase is similar, almost to identity, in each of verses 7 to 17 and in verse 18, with the exception that verse 18 gives the special reason, "to vex her." Verse 19 and those that follow enter on new subjects and are admittedly not dependent on verse 6. But it is maintained that verse 18 is not one of the instances of prohibited intercourse of near kindred, but is, like verse 19 and those which follow, an incursion into a totally new region, and is a prohibition standing by itself, viz., a prohibition against polygamy. This is supported by reference to a criticism of the Hebrew text, and comparison with other passages of the Scriptures by Mr (afterwards Lord) Fraser in a learned disquisition in his work upon Husband and Wife.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Ld. Johnston.

I think that we have to interpret a Scots statute of the sixteenth century, and not to busy ourselves with the Biblical criticism of the nineteenth or twentieth centuries. We have to read the statute of 1567 in the light of the circumstances in which the Legislature of that date passed it. They owed their knowledge of the Scriptures to Coverdale's English version of 1539, Matthew's (incorporating Tyndale's Pentateuch) of 1537, the Great Bible of 1539, and the Geneva Bible of 1560. But I do not think that there is any substantial doubt that the last mentioned was their common text. I have examined all these versions, and while there are verbal differences among them, and between them and the Authorised Version, no one can read them without being satisfied that every one of them makes clear that what is presented to the reader as prohibited is the commerce of a man with his wife's sister during his wife's lifetime. It is not improbable that that generation of Scotsmen was influenced also by the Septuagint, and still more by the Vulgate. If so, these are even more clearly to the same effect.

The suggestion that the verse is merely a prohibition against polygamy is differently put. Mr Fraser has the courage of his convictions, and, accepting the rendering, "Thou shalt not take one woman to another," maintains an out-and-out prohibition against polygamy. The suggestion finds little support from the rest of Scripture or from the history of the Hebrew race, as we find it in the Bible and otherwise. But the idea was certainly not before the Scottish mind, or the mind of the Scottish Legislature, in the sixteenth century. Others, however, content themselves with maintaining that the prohibition is only against the limited polygamy of taking two sisters as wives at the same time. It is impossible to accept this limited prohibition of polygamy. The whole chapter, from verse 6 onwards, is dealing with sexual intercourse merely, and not with marriage. There is no more reason for saying that verse 18 is a prohibition of polygamy and not of incest, than for saying that the immediately preceding verse 17, which prohibits intercourse with both a woman and her daughter, is merely a prohibition of polygamy and not of incest.

At the outset I said that the question arose mainly upon the interpretation of verse 18 of the 18th chapter of Leviticus. But it is not to be forgotten that there is another reason why such intercourse as we are concerned with here may be held to be prohibited as incestuous. We have in verse 9 the prohibition of such intercourse between a man and his sister, and, if the catena of verses following verse 6 are merely examples and intended to include cases of affinity, where the corresponding case of consanguinity is expressly mentioned, then there is in the sections unquestionably dependent on verse 6 an implied prohibition against such intercourse where the relation of brother and sister is by affinity.

If, then, it was prohibited either expressly or impliedly, how comes it, it may be asked, that it is expressly prohibited, but prohibited, not during the whole continuance of the relationship of affinity, but only during the lifetime of the wife. I think the answer is that the position of sister and of sister-in-law is different, and that while in the case of the sister the need of the prohibition continues for life, in the case of the sister-in-law it may be held to cease with the life of the wife. The Jewish law was based upon practical considerations, and these practical considerations appear to me to have been (first) the eugenic view of the situation; and (second) the social or family life view of the situation. The Jewish law had not developed the refinement of schoolmen or churchmen, which regards the marriage tie as making of the spouses one flesh, with the logical result that the relationship by affinity once constituted must, with all its consequences, continue until death. As I have said, the relation between a man and his sister-in-law differs from other relations by affinity, and I see no reason to doubt that verse 18 was specially inserted to meet the case; that is to say, while declaring carnal intercourse between a man and his sister-in-law to be incestuous, to relieve such intercourse from that stigma where, there being no blood relationship and therefore no eugenic cause, there has ceased also to be any social or family cause, that is on the wife's death. This cannot be said to be an impossible view, looking to any general conception of relationship by affinity and of its effect, for the law of England seems to be capable of taking it. I do not see it is any more difficult to assume that the Mosaic law, and the Scots statute which followed upon it, conceived that the intercourse of a man with his wife's sister during his wife's life might and ought to be deemed incestuous, but that it was not necessary that such intercourse should be deemed incest after the wife's death, when I find that the English Legislature, in the beginning of this century, was capable of taking the same view.

I ask leave to refer to two statutes. In the first place, there was passed the English Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857.[1] Prior to that Act—and even since that Act—the difficulties in the way of a wife in England obtaining divorce, as we regard it, that is dissolution of the marriage tie, were very great. By this statute some slight relief was given to the injured wife, but in this limited way. Section 27 of the statute says: "It shall be lawful for any wife to present a petition to the said Court, praying that her marriage may be dissolved, on the ground that since the celebration thereof her husband has been guilty of incestuous adultery." That leaves it to be ascertained what is meant by "incestuous adultery"? Incest was not at that date, and never had been, a crime by the law of England. It only inferred ecclesiastical censure. We know nothing judicially of the ecclesiastical law of England, or how far it affects the common law. But the same section of the Act of 1857 goes on to give a definition of "incestuous adultery." It provides "that for the purposes of this Act incestuous adultery shall be taken to mean adultery

[1] 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 85.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Ld. Johnston.

committed by a husband with a woman with whom if his wife were dead he could not lawfully contract marriage by reason of his being within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity." When we come to the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907, we find, first of all, that marriage with the sister of a deceased wife is recognised and permitted for the future, from which it is to be inferred, what really everybody knows, that prior to the Act marriage with a deceased wife's sister was prohibited. And then we find this provision, section 3 (1): "Nothing in this Act shall remove wives' sisters from the class of persons adultery with whom constitutes a right, on the part of wives, to sue for divorce under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857." Therefore, adultery of a man with his sister-in-law was, prior to 1907, incestuous by the law of England, and it is henceforth still to be deemed by the law of England incestuous during his wife's life, notwithstanding that he may marry his sister-in-law after his wife's death. I have only referred to the law of England as showing it is not impossible to conceive that that may be regarded by the law as incest during a certain period, and during the continuance of a certain relation, which may not be so regarded after that relation has ceased. But the reference appears to me to be very germane to the present question.

For these reasons, I have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for disturbing the judgment of our two learned predecessors in the considered case of Oman.[1]

Lord Salvesen.—The indictment in this case is laid entirely upon the Act of the old Scots Parliament 1 James VI. chapter 14; and it illustrates the conservatism of Scottish jurisprudence in matters of crime that this statute after an interval of nearly 350 years still regulates our law of incest. The forbidden degrees to which it applies are to be ascertained by reference to the 18th chapter of Leviticus; but as other offences against the moral law (as it was understood in Jewish times) are enumerated in the chapter the whole of it is not incorporated in the statute which is directed only against criminal intercourse between "sik persones in degrie as God in his word hes expreslie forbidden" in the chapter referred to. The penalty enacted in every case of transgression is the same, namely, the penalty of death. So far as our statute book is concerned this remained the penalty until, by the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, section 56, it was enacted that a capital sentence shall no longer be competent, except on conviction for murder or of offences against the Act 10 Geo. IV. chapter 38. Previous to that time it had been the practice of the public prosecutor to restrict the pains of law, in which case the penalty usually inflicted was penal servitude for life.

A penal statute according to our law must always be strictly construed; and in the general case cannot be extended by implication to offences of a similar nature, with which it does not in terms deal; but the rule of construction to be applied to the Act of 1567, chapter 14, is in gremio of the Act itself. It is only offences, of the kind described, which are expressly forbidden by the 18th chapter of Leviticus that fall under it. We are thus referred to that chapter, which so far as incorporated by the Act forms part of the law of Scotland and to which we must apply the ordinary rules of construction.

[1] 2 Irv. 146.

We are left in some doubt as to where we are to find the text of the chapter which the Legislature had in view in 1567. It is plain, however, to my mind, that it was not the Hebrew original which was thus incorporated in the Scots Act. Hebrew was no more understood by the mass of the population in 1567 than it is now, although there were no doubt in those times as at present a few Hebrew scholars. There did, however, exist various translations of the Bible, of which the Genevan was the most widely used in Scotland at the time of the Reformation. It was the first version to be printed in Roman type, and was also the first to be divided into verses. A few months after the passing of the Act a Scottish printer was licensed to print this Bible—no previous licence having been granted. If, therefore, the Scots Parliament had any particular translation in view —which cannot be positively affirmed, as they had probably not adverted to the fact that the existing translations differed both in language and in substance—it is reasonably certain that they would have tied themselves to the Geneva Bible. The point, however, is not of great practical importance, as the various versions of the Bible existing in 1567 are capable of being reconciled so far as the 18th chapter of Leviticus is concerned.

The 18th verse of that chapter, under which the present case is said to fall, is thus translated in the Geneva Bible: "Also thou shalt not take a wife with her sister during her life to vex her in uncovering her shame upon her." It is unnecessary to consider whether this is an accurate translation of the Hebrew text, for it is this one alone which has received statutory sanction, and which must therefore be interpreted according to the natural meaning of the words. It is probable that a better translation would have been the one inserted on the margin of the authorised version of the Bible, "one wife to another." In that case the prohibition would be clearly against polygamy only, without reference to the relationship between the wives. In order to harmonise these two translations the word "sister" in the Genevan version must be read as equivalent to "sister-woman." This is, however, not the natural meaning which laymen would take out of the word. On the other hand, it would be a complete inversion of the text to hold that it contained a prohibition against intercourse with a wife's sister. The true meaning, I think, is that the verse contains an express prohibition against marriage with two sisters, from which it may be implied, although this is not a necessary implication, that polygamy was permitted except in the one case expressly forbidden.

This construction is supported by a comparison between the offences enumerated in verses 7 to 17 inclusive. In none of these cases is any reason given for the prohibition except that of propinquity. In no case where the relationship is one of affinity is the prohibition limited to the lifetime of the person through whom the affinity is traced. The reason expressly assigned for the prohibition in verse 18 is that the earlier wife should not be vexed, or, as the revised version expresses it, should not have a rival in her sister. It is, further, not without significance that even in the 17th century the guardians of public morals were not satisfied that the provisions of the Act 1567, chapter 14, were sufficiently explicit. Accordingly in 1649 an Act was passed (chapter 16 of that year) enumerating in a schedule all the prohibited degrees. Amongst these occurs intercourse betwixt a man and his wife's sister, along with a number of others which are not expressly mentioned in the 18th chapter of Leviticus. This Act cannot be founded on as a contemporaneous exposition of the Act 1567, chapter 14, from which it is separated by a period of over eighty years, but it shows clearly enough that in a time when the same theological views prevailed, perhaps in an aggravated form, it was not thought safe to rest the penalty of what was then regarded as incestuous relationship on implication from a statute which dealt only with what was expressly forbidden. For the reasons above stated I have accordingly no difficulty in holding, if the question be still open, that verse 18 of the 18th chapter of Leviticus does not form part of the Act 1567, chapter 14.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Salvesen.

Since 1567 there appear to have been only five instances of the Act being applied to facts such as those libelled in the present indictment. One of these only is of comparatively recent date, the other four happened in 1613, 1629, 1649, and 1705. In all four sentence of death was pronounced. In the last of the four, the case of Barbara Tannahill,[1] the facts went beyond those in the present case, for the irregular intercourse alleged was with the sister of the accused's deceased wife. Apart from the recent statute, however, the authority is just as good as that of the earlier instances.

There is no record of any argument having been submitted on the question of relevancy in the three earliest cases. In the last of all, that of Oman,[2] a full argument was presented to a Circuit Court at Inverness, at which Lord Ivory and Lord Deas were the presiding Judges. Their decision proceeded entirely on the earlier cases to which I have referred. Lord Deas said: "We cannot take upon ourselves, sitting here, to depart from these precedents." Probably many single Judges would have followed the same course. Had this case come before a Circuit Court it may reasonably be inferred, especially as no plea to the relevancy was proponed on the part of the accused, that sentence would have been passed as matter of course, and in the absence of a Court of Criminal Appeal without the means of legal redress. A full bench, however, can review any decisions of the Court of Justiciary however ancient and however much they have been sanctioned by usage. There has, however, been no usage so far as can be gathered following upon the decisions in question. A diligent search by the Clerk of Justiciary has not disclosed any other similar cases in the records of the Justiciary Court. It is difficult to assume that cases of the same nature have not actually occurred from time to time; and the inference I draw is either that no complaint was made to the Public Prosecutor or that in his discretion he declined to take action. In either view, it may be inferred that public opinion has entirely changed with regard to the criminal character of the facts here libelled.

---

[1] Hume, i. 449-50.

[2] 2 Irv. 146.

It is open to grave doubt whether the decisions of single Judges in the Justiciary Court can be at any time regarded as authorities. I have known of cases where they have been deliberately disregarded by subsequent Judges at Circuit Courts; but, whatever importance may be attached to a recent judgment of a single Judge which will mainly depend on the reasons assigned, I attach none to the three instances in 1613, 1629, and 1649 which were so strongly founded on by the Crown. In the case of Stewart [1] Lord Justice-Clerk Hope said that in a question of constitutional government the Court of Justiciary in the seventeenth century "was no better than the Star Chamber or the Scotch Privy Council; and no one would ever think of quoting their decisions thereon, as binding precedents to guide us now." I differ from his view when he says that a similar condemnation does not apply to their decisions on the subject of incest. The penal statutes enacted with regard to irregular sexual relations of all kinds during these morose times (as Alison calls them) are just as alien to modern conceptions as their views on constitutional questions. They were tainted with false theological beliefs as to what the word of God enjoined, of which we can find no better example than the trials for witchcraft that form so foul a blot on the annals of the time. So far as the question before us is concerned no person accused of having had intercourse with a living wife's sister had any interest to plead that the 18th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus was not part of the law of Scotland. He had at all events been guilty of an aggravated form of adultery, and by the statute of 1563, chapter 74, the penalty of this crime as well for the woman as the man was death. The soundness of the later judgment of 1705 was doubted from the first and has never since been repeated, although it was the logical result of the earlier decisions. Incest according to the general views of Scotch lawyers consisted in carnal intercourse between persons within the forbidden degrees. The propinquity, once established, persisted, when the relationship was one of affinity, after the death of the person through whose marriage it arose, and I know of no case where it was held that a connection which was incestuous and criminal at one time could at a later date become permissible or at least not punishable. Since the Act of 1907 the relationship which was formerly considered incestuous may now merge in a legal marriage. I therefore concur with your Lordship in the chair in holding that the libel here is irrelevant as it discloses no crime known to the law of Scotland.

Lord Mackenzie.—The indictment here libels the Act 1 James VI. cap. 14 and the 18th chapter of Leviticus therein referred to. The crime charged is that the panel being the lawful husband of and residing with his wife did have incestuous connection with her lawful sister. The Act in question, 1567, c. 14, defines the crime of incest thus—"That is to say, quhatsumever person or persones they be, that abuses their bodie with sik persones in degrie, as God in his Word hes expreslie forbidden, in ony tyme cumming, as is contained in the xviii. chapter of Leviticus, sall be punished

[1] 2 Broun, 544, at p. 547.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Mackenzie.

to the death." Neither the statute nor the indictment specifies any particular verse of the 18th chapter. The chapter having been incorporated with the statute, must be construed in the same manner as any Act of Parliament. It is contended that the 18th verse applies to the case in hand. I am of opinion that it does not.

The Act deals with degrees which are forbidden. It is no longer contended that the old view of the statute was correct, which made such intercourse punishable with death, though the wife were dead. Yet if the 18th verse deals with forbidden degrees, it is difficult to see how, when once the marriage had established the degree and the wife's sister therefore became near of kin in the sense of verse 6, she ceased to be so owing to the wife's death. In my view verse 18 does not deal with incest. The verses which precede it are those which deal with this matter. Whether the illustrations they give are exhaustive or not does not affect the present point. The cases dealt with in these verses, viz.: 6 to 17, are cases both of consanguinity and of affinity. In the latter, as in the former case, the degree is forbidden, not for a time, but for all time. In the case dealt with by verse 18, whatever version of the Bible be taken, the prohibition is not for all time, but is, or may be, merely temporary. The reason for this prohibition is distinctly given. It is not necessary, for the purpose of the point I am at present dealing with, to consider what rendering of the 18th verse is the most correct. The reason is the same in each: and the duration of the prohibition the same in each; according to the Geneva Bible of 1560, the version which preceded the statute, the verse runs, "Also thou shalt not take a wife with her sister, during her life, to vexe (her) in uncovering her shame upon her." According to the Authorised Version of 1611, "Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her life time." The prohibition is of an act that will vex the wife, and there is therefore a limitation in point of time. What is forbidden by verse 18 is not an act which it is said will transgress the cardinal prohibition in verse 6, "None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him." On this ground alone the indictment is in my opinion irrelevant.

But further, the statute makes it necessary to show that the persons are within the degree that God's Word has "expressly" forbidden. Before the Crown could discharge this onus it would be necessary to establish what version it is of God's word that was meant by the Act 1567, cap. 14. If not the original Hebrew was it not the original according to the most accurate translation? If the earlier translations could be shown to be inaccurate, was the panel to suffer death in spite of the error? The Revised Version of 1885 makes it doubtful whether the earlier translations were correct, for in it verse 18 is thus rendered, "And thou shalt not take a woman to her sister, to be a rival to her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her life time." It is not necessary to decide what the purpose of verse 18 was, but the rendering in the Authorised Version is in favour of the view expressed by Lord Fraser—Husband and Wife, i. 114, that it contains God's law against polygamy. The mere fact that a lengthy argument was addressed to us on the subject, which is treated at length in Fraser on Husband and Wife, is to my mind enough to show that it cannot be successfully established that what is here charged was "expressly" forbidden by the Word of God. Nor do I regard this view as necessarily inconsistent with the decision in Stewart,[1] which was a case of blood relationship.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Mackenzie.

The statute is a highly penal one. The same rules do not apply in construing it as in interpreting the Act 1567, cap. 15, which regulates purely civil interests. The provisions of the latter, as is pointed out in Hume on Crimes, i. 447, admit of a broad and liberal construction; as regards the former, "in any point that is ambiguous or equivocal, a strict and literal construction to the side of mercy seems to be the only right one." Accordingly it is not surprising that when Baron Hume comes to deal with the cases which were tried under the penal statute he expresses doubts, shared in by Lord Royston, of the sentence in the case of James Drysdale and Barbara Tannahill[2] in 1705, where the intercourse was with the sister after the wife's death. The woman had sentence of death. Nor does he approve of the sentence of drowning passed in 1628 on George Sinclair, who gave the use of his body to "twa young damosells, baith being sisters."

I refer to these cases because in the present case a difficulty has been felt in regarding the question of the relevancy of the indictment as an open one. It is said to be concluded by authority. It was argued for the Crown that the point was settled by decision in the case of Oman.[3] When this case is looked at, however, it is seen that it was decided solely on the authority of the three instances recorded in Hume, i. 450. The dates of these cases were 1613, 1629, and 1649. The case in 1613 was that of James Stewart, also reported in a note to 2 Broun, p. 549. In each of these sentence of death was pronounced. So far as can be ascertained, there is no instance of such a prosecution during the two hundred years which intervened between the last of them and the case of Oman.[3] As regards the three cases upon which Oman[3] proceeded, there is no trace of objection having been taken to the relevancy, nor of the present point having been decided. Therefore, I do not consider these cases are binding on us. It must be borne in mind that, when these sentences were imposed, notour adultery was punishable with death. By the Act 1581, cap. 105, adultery was notour if attended with the procreation of a child. In each of the three cases mentioned by Hume he records that a child had been procreated. Therefore, if the panels had not been indicted for incest, they might have been indicted for notour adultery, in which case the sentence might have been the same.

The decision in Fenton v. Livingstone[4] was upon the civil statute of 1567, cap. 15, and the Court disclaimed any intention of deciding what was the correct construction of the criminal Act of 1567, cap. 14. It is discussed by Lord Deas, who had six years before been a party to the judgment in Oman.[3] Purves' Trustees[5] followed Fenton v. Livingstone.[4]

In construing this penal statute I think there are certain considera-

---

[1] 2 Broun, 544. [2] Hume, i. 449-50. [3] 2 Irv. 146.
[4] 23 D. 366. [5] 22 R. 513.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Mackenzie.

tions which cannot be left out of view. In his chapter upon Incest Baron Hume thus describes the crime: "A sort of intercourse, which has been forbidden, in a greater or less extent, by the general custom of all communities, and even in times very little advanced in civilisation. Thus the source of this law seems to lie in the native feelings of the human constitution, and not merely in those views of policy and discipline, though obvious and strong, which recommend the enforcing of such a restraint." That it is not the general custom of all communities to punish as a crime the offence here charged is well known. That the native feelings of the human constitution will be outraged if it is not dealt with as a crime seems to me impossible to hold in view of recent legislation of the British Parliament. As Baron Hume prefaces his chapter on Incest by a quotation from Blackstone in regard to offences which are against "the due regulation and domestic order of the kingdom," I may be permitted to call attention to the fact that in 1908 a statute was passed (8 Edw. VII. cap. 45) for England to provide for the punishment of incest. The offence here charged is not a crime in that country. Yet, if the source of the law be, as Hume says, "the native feelings of the human constitution," it is difficult to resist the conclusion that it would have been included in the Act. In 1907 an Act was passed for the United Kingdom (7 Edw. VII. cap. 47) which declares that marriage with a deceased wife's sister should not be deemed void as a civil contract except in certain cases. This does not appear to me directly to affect the present question, though it follows from it, if the view I take is not sound, that marriageable persons could be tried for incest.

I am of opinion that the objection to the relevancy should be sustained.

Lord Guthrie.—It is said by the prosecutor that the question of relevancy raised by the accused is closed by decisions which have been quoted by the recognised institutional writers on the criminal law of Scotland as closing the question. He also argued, although with less confidence, that these cases were rightly decided. The accused denies that the question is foreclosed; he disputes the soundness of the previous decisions; and he also maintains that, in any view, the charge is no longer relevant, owing to the operation of the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act of 1907.

It is true that connection between a husband and his living wife's sister has been held to be incest in four reported cases which went to judgment; and that these cases have been treated in Hume's Commentaries on the Law of Scotland respecting Crimes, published in 1819, and in Alison's Practice of the Criminal Law of Scotland, published in 1833, as well as in the current volume of practice (Macdonald's Criminal Law) as expressing the law of Scotland. In view of the expressions used in reference to the first three of the four reported cases by Hume (i. 450, "all of distant dates"), and by Lord Deas in the last of these cases (2 Irvine, at p. 150, "I know of no case precisely of the kind in modern times") we are entitled to take it that no other cases have occurred, during the period of 346 years, since the passing of the statute of 1567 in question in this case. These four cases were Stewart in 1613, Dick in 1629, Brymer in 1649,[1] and Oman in 1855.[2] Pitcairn in his Criminal Trials mentions, in addition, the case of Gilbert Young in 1573; but that case did not come to an issue, because Young fled and was outlawed. Reference was also made to the extraordinary case of Drysdale[3] in 1705, in which, although the jury had found nothing proved against Drysdale except what could not be evidence against him, namely, the woman's judicial confession, the Court of Justiciary yet adjudged him to be banished for life. That case is reported at p. 307 of Hugo Arnot's Collection and Abridgment of Celebrated Criminal Trials in Scotland from 1536 to 1784, published in 1785, which contains a vigorous argument by the editor against the relevancy of the indictment; and Lord Royston, commenting on that case in his Notes, says: "Sed dubito an jure, for, since King James's Act has an express reference to the Judaical law, Leviticus xviii., it ought not to be extended to other cases not there expressly mentioned." The case of Drysdale,[3] however, whether well or ill decided, dealt with connection between a man and his wife's sister after the death of the wife, which involves different considerations from those applicable during the wife's lifetime. Therefore, the cases directly in point, in the question of a well-settled and obligatory practice fixing the law of Scotland until altered by statute, are reduced to four, three of which occurred in the first half of the 17th century, and the fourth in 1855. Thus there was nothing in the shape of contemporaneous exposition of the statute, because the first case, the case of Stewart,[1] did not occur till forty-six years after the Act was passed; there was, further, an interval of 206 years between the last of the first three cases, decided in 1649, and the fourth case in 1855, and, until the present proceedings, there has been no case since Oman's,[2] fifty-eight years ago. In my opinion, this is too meagre and interrupted a course of practice to form any barrier to the question being reconsidered.

But suppose the practice to hold the offence here in question as incest had been fairly large and fairly continuous, in my opinion, this full bench would be entitled to disregard it; and that for two reasons, first, because the question has never been considered on its merits, and, second, because, even if it had been so considered, it has never been decided by a full bench. In the three cases in the 17th century it does not appear that the relevancy of the charge was disputed; and in the case of Oman[2] in 1855 Lord Ivory and Lord Deas refused to consider the relevancy, because they thought the 17th century cases binding on them. It is unnecessary to determine whether, looking to the terms of the statute of 1567 and the circumstances in which it was passed, the long period of more than 200 years during which no similar case had come before the Courts, and the changed conditions under which the question arose in 1855, these distinguished criminal Judges were right in the view they took. I respectfully think they might have followed the view indicated in Alison's Practice of the Criminal Law of Scotland, page 564, in which, referring among other cases to those of Stewart, Dick, Brymer, and Drysdale[1] above mentioned, he says: "These are precedents drawn from morose times,

[1] Hume, i. 449-50. [2] 2 Irv. 146. [3] Hume, i. 449.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Guthrie.

on which no reliance can be placed in modern practice. There are numerous instances [three] of a capital conviction in the case of connection with a sister by affinity, during the lifetime of the wife of the man, and that too on libels laid for incest only; but here again it is very doubtful whether such extreme severity would be followed, on a matter admitted by theologians to be involved in so much doubt." Lord Ivory and Lord Deas might have taken the view that the same regard to 17th century precedents as was shown by them would have involved the relevancy of charges of incest in cases which are thus referred to by Mr Alison at p. 564: "So strong did the current of the times run against these connexions, that the pains of incest were applied in a great variety of cases for which the text of Leviticus makes no sort of provision . . . It is difficult to see on what ground these judgments were founded, as they are neither supported by Leviticus nor by the statute."

On the other hand, these learned Judges may have rightly considered themselves bound to treat the cases of Stewart, Dick, and Brymer as precedents, which they, as contrasted with a full bench, were not entitled to reconsider, and, if so minded, to disregard. This view is suggested by Lord Deas's words in the case of Oman[1]:—"We cannot take upon ourselves sitting here to depart from these precedents." That case might be binding upon any similarly constituted tribunal; it cannot foreclose the question before a full bench of Judges, one of whose functions it is to reconsider alleged precedents, whether of practice or of construction of statutes, especially if, as here, these precedents are of old date, few in number, and decided on grounds which do not apply to modern conditions, knowledge, and opinion.

The powerful passage on page 447 of Hume's Commentaries seems to me to be applicable in terms to the present case:—"How rigorous soever the enactment, so far as it is clear and positive, it must be obeyed; but in any point that is ambiguous or equivocal, a strict and literal construction to the side of mercy seems to be the only right one. And as to any blunder or defect of the statute whereby the offender's life may be saved; this, as it may be esteemed, not unfortunate omission must not be corrected or supplied out of deference even to erroneous precedents, and far less to popular inclination or belief, or from any regard to the consistency or harmony of the law. At furthest, if any exception is to be admitted to this rule, it can only be of those cases in which the connection is forbidden by the law of nature and the universal custom of all nations."

I, therefore, think that the question can be reconsidered, first, because there is no sufficient practice to close it; second, because in none of the cases which have occurred in practice has the question now raised been considered and decided, and in only one of them, the last in 1855, was it even raised in argument; and third, because, in any event, the question is now raised for the first time before a full bench. I am not overlooking the fact that a full Justiciary bench has appeared to hold a question foreclosed, although it had never been previously raised before a full bench. That occurred in the case of Witherington in 1881, reported in 4 Couper,

[1] 2 Irv. 146, at p. 150.

475. But the precise question in that case had been deliberately raised and carefully considered in at least two previous cases, which, according to the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion, at p. 493, had been "followed in numberless cases since"; and it is to be observed that the Judges composing the full bench did, in point of fact, reconsider these previous cases, and they thought them rightly decided on the merits. Nor am I overlooking the dictum of Lord Deas in Fenton v. Livingstone,[1] where he says:—"By a long series of decisions, it has been settled that intercourse, in a wife's lifetime, with her sister, infers the statutory penalty. . . . These judgments do not leave the question open." This dictum was obiter, and if it means that the question was closed against reconsideration by a full bench I very respectfully think it unsound.

If then the question be open for reconsideration by this tribunal, I am clearly of opinion that the present charge, although involving adultery of a heinous kind, should be held irrelevant as a charge of incest. The question depends on the sound construction of 1 James VI., chapter 14, which incorporates an undefined portion of the 18th chapter of the Book of Leviticus.

A question was raised which it does not seem to me necessary to decide, even if we had, as we have not, the necessary materials for its decision. We have frequent occasion to criticise the draughtsmanship of modern statutes, but I do not think this ancient Scots Act can be considered as a model, or indeed as anything but a warning. The Act appears to incorporate the whole of a chapter in Leviticus, a considerable part of which is admittedly irrelevant. It does not state whether the words of the chapter to which it appeals are to be found, for the purposes of the Act, in the Hebrew version or in the Greek version (the Septuagint, the version used by Christ and the Apostles), and, if in either of these versions, which of the numerous and varying manuscripts and printed editions available to scholars in 1567 is to rule; nor, if an English translation is to prevail, does it say whether appeal is to be had to the translations of Tyndale, published in 1530, Miles Coverdale, published in 1535, Thomas Matthew, published in 1537, the version known as the Great Bible, published in 1539, or, as is most probable although by no means certain, to the Geneva Bible, popularly nicknamed the "Breeches Bible," published in 1560. The Crown and the accused both declined to state any view on this matter. But this question does not arise for decision, because, as I read the different English translations available in 1567, they are all substantially identical in expression and in meaning; and we have not been informed that, supposing either the original Hebrew or the Septuagint is to be looked at, any of the Hebrew or Greek MSS. or printed editions available in 1567, properly translated, convey any other meaning.

Two considerations were urged which seem to me irrelevant. It was said that we must assume from the well-known views of the Scots Parliament of 1567, as shown by their Acts 13, 14, and 15, that they must have intended to stamp the illicit connection at present in question as incest. I do not think this necessarily follows when it is remembered

[1] 23 D., at p. 382.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Guthrie.

that, even if this offence was not branded as incest, the offenders were liable to the penalties for adultery contained in the previous Acts of 1551 and 1563, and would probably have been held liable to the penalties contained in 1 James VI., chapter 13, of 1567, including, in an aggravated case, in addition to heavy penalties, thrice dowking in the "deepest and foulest pool or water of the town or parish" and banishment for ever from the said town or parish. But assume, what is perhaps probable, that they did intend to make connection between a husband and his living wife's sister incestuous, the question remains,—have they done so effectually? The Act of 1649, to which reference has been made, although it fell under the Rescissory Act of 1661, may be fairly referred to as showing how it was realised at that date, when the views of Parliament on questions of this kind were similar to those entertained in 1567, that the full intention of the Legislators in 1567 had not been given effect to by the statute of that year.

There is another consideration which I think equally irrelevant. It is said that, on a sound construction of the 18th chapter of Leviticus, verses 6 to 18 inclusive taking these verses as a whole, it is clear that the connection now in question must be deemed incestuous. That may or may not be. Such a result may perhaps be held reasonably to follow from the wide scope of the verses, or by analogy from the case of connection with a brother's wife dealt with in verse 16 (although that case presents the important difference of uncertainty as to the paternity of the issue), or by analogy from the case of qualified polygamy dealt with in the 18th verse, although, in the latter case, the precise reasons do not apply. But the statute, as I read it, excludes all such reasoning by analogy, or inference, or implication. The words are "Whatsomever person or persons that commits the said abominable crime of incest, that is to say whatsomever person or persons they be, that abuses their body with such persons in degree, as God in his Word has expressly forbidden, in any time coming, as is contained in the XVIII. chapter of Leviticus, shall be punished to the death."

Had the expression been "forbidden," or (on the analogy of the succeeding Act titled "Anent lawful marriage of the own blood in degrees not forbidden by God his Word") had the words been "not repugnant to the word of the Eternal God," the result might have been different. But I cannot refuse the ordinary effect to the unambiguous word "expressly." In the case of trusts, the distinction is familiar between express trusts on the one hand and implied trusts or constructive trusts on the other. In statutes and deeds the comprehensive expression "whether express or implied" is often employed. Reading the 18th chapter of Leviticus, and in particular the 18th verse, in any of the English versions available in 1567, I am unable to find that the connection in question is "expressly forbidden." I do not think that necessary or irresistible inference would satisfy the language of the statute. But, even if it did, I cannot derive any such inference from a verse in regard to which there are as many eminent lawyers and divines who think, as I do, that its only object was, for obviously good reasons, to prevent a certain form of polygamy, as there are who think that its primary, if not its only, object was to prevent a particular form of incest, or who think that, if it had in view the prevention of a certain form of polygamy, it was also intended to cover, and by necessary inference did cover, the case of incest, whether during the wife's life or after her death.

As to the Deceased Wife's Sister's Marriage Act, 1907, I am unable to give any effect to that statute in the present question, because the Act seems to me limited, in express terms, to the sphere of civil contract. I grant that, if I am wrong in thinking the present charge irrelevant, and if I am right in refusing effect to the 1907 Act, the result will be anomalous, if not absurd. In that case, it will be possible to commit incest with a person whom the offender may, in a certain event, marry, whereas the very essence of incest has always been that it consisted in connection between persons who could never marry. But such a result would not be more anomalous, if not absurd, than the present undoubted state of the law of this civilised country, that a man may marry his deceased wife's sister, but a woman may not marry her deceased husband's brother.

Lord Skerrington.—I concur in the result at which the majority of your Lordships have arrived.

There is authority for the opinion that both incest and the attempt to commit it are indictable offences according to the common law of Scotland, Lord Advocate v. M'Coll,[1] and it receives support from the form of indictment usual in such cases prior to 1887. I do not differ from this view as regards persons who are so closely akin by blood or affinity that connection between them is at the present day generally regarded as unnatural, or again where there has been a long-continued series of decisions recognising that connection between persons so related is an offence against God and against nature. At one period of our history I have no doubt that connection between a man and his wife's sister would have been regarded as falling within this category. Thus, in the case of Alison Beatson,[2] this Court decided that incest which was charged as having been committed between a man and the daughter of his wife's sister, was relevant to infer only an arbitrary punishment—in other words was a crime at common law but not a contravention of the Act 1567, cap. 14, and so punishable by death. But there has been no such course of decisions as entitles me to decide the present question upon authority merely and without regard to modern opinion as to the degree of propinquity in which a man stands in relation to the sister of his wife. These persons are no longer within the forbidden degrees, and they may now intermarry if they are otherwise free to do so. I cannot therefore hold that the act to which the prisoner has pleaded guilty was so different in character from an ordinary act of adultery that it ought to be punished as a crime at common law.

In construing the Act 1567, cap. 14, a difficulty is created by certain decisions of the Justiciary Court which do not in terms apply to the case upon which we have to adjudicate, but which sanction a wide extension

[1] (1874) 1 R. (J.) 22, 2 Coup. 538.
[2] (1692) Hume, vol. i., p. 450.

Nov. 21, 1913

Solicitor-General v. A B.

Lord Skerrington.

of the statute by departing from the sound rule to the effect that in construing a highly penal statute more regard should be had to its language than to considerations of supposed policy and analogy. As regards, however, the question whether the 18th chapter of Leviticus expressly forbids upon the ground of nearness of kin carnal connection between a man and his wife's sister, there is only one case in which a decision was pronounced after objection to the relevancy, viz., that of Oman.[1] The two Judges who pronounced that decision proceeded principally upon the authority of certain ancient convictions for incest, but it does not appear that in any of these cases the question was argued. It is therefore entirely open, especially to a full bench of this Court. In my opinion there is so much doubt as to the meaning of the 18th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus as to make it impossible to affirm that the immoral conduct to which the prisoner has confessed was until 1887 a capital offence according to the law of Scotland.

THE COURT discharged the panel.

SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 9.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

PIETRO DI CARLO, Appellant.—Cooper, K.C.—A. Crawford.
JOHN J. M'INTYRE (Procurator-Fiscal, Glasgow), Respondent.—Sandeman, K.C.—Duffes.

Statutory Offences—Gaming—Lottery—Implement for practising game of hazard—Element of skill in game—Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.) sec. 22.

In a prosecution under section 22 of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, for exposing in a shop "a lottery" consisting of a machine, it was proved that the machine was actuated by placing a penny in a slot, that this enabled a spring to be worked which projected a ball to the top of the machine, whence it descended through a number of irregularly placed pins, and emerged at any one of five openings, where it might be intercepted by a sliding cup operated by the manipulator, whose object was to catch the ball in the cup. There was no part of the machine where the ball could emerge that was not within reach of the sliding cup. The manipulator, if successful, received a metal disc entitling him to twopence worth of goods in the shop; if unsuccessful, he forfeited his penny.

Held by a full bench (diss. Lord Johnston) that although, in the hands of an ordinary member of the public, success depended largely on chance, yet, as the desired result might be attained on every occasion by the exercise of skill, the machine was not a "lottery."

Forte v. Dewar, (1905) 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575 overruled.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Dundas. Ld. Johnston. Lord Salvesen. Lord Mackenzie. Lord Guthrie. Lord Skerrington.

PIETRO DI CARLO, the keeper of an ice-cream shop in Glasgow, was prosecuted in the Police Court there at the instance of John James M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, upon a charge which set forth, "that you did on the 11th day of November 1912, in your shop at 115 Duke Street, Glasgow, keep, show and expose a lottery consisting of a box enclosing a mechanical contrivance put in action by the operator inserting a penny in the slot and then pulling a handle or spring whereby a ball is thrown upward by the person desiring to try for the prize offered in said lottery, namely, a check which entitles the winner to goods to the value of twopence, said prize being determined by lot or chance, and did, date above libelled, suffer James Lauder, 203 Hunter Street, Glasgow, to exercise said lottery twice by the insertion of one penny each time, and Aubrey Cordiner, 116 Duke Street, and Alexander Mack, 28 Scotland Street, both in Glasgow, to exercise said lottery once by the insertion of one penny each, in which lottery goods to the value as aforesaid were offered as prizes determinable by lot or chance as above libelled, contrary to the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 22." *

[1] 2 Irv. 146.

The accused pleaded not guilty.

On 8th February 1913 the magistrate found the accused guilty. The accused appealed upon a stated case, which set forth the following facts as proved:—

"The appellant is the keeper of an ice-cream shop at 115 Duke Street, Glasgow. On 11th November 1912 two police-officers called at appellant's shop, and in a room in said shop they found the three persons named in the charge, who are youths about sixteen or seventeen years of age and ordinary customers of the shop, manipulating the machine in question (No. 1 of the productions), which is available for the use of customers. The machine, which is known as the 'Pickwick,' is put into action by the insertion of a penny into a slot and the pressure of a lever which releases two balls. By pressing another lever one of the balls is made to roll down to the right-hand side of the machine under which there is a spring, which when drawn down and released throws the ball to the top of the machine whence it descends and passes through between a number of irregularly placed pins or studs emerging at one of five passages under which the manipulator attempts to catch it in a sliding cup near the bottom of the machine. If the ball is not caught in the cup it falls to the bottom of the machine where it is retained. Should the manipulator catch the ball, it then passes through a hole whereby a metal disc or check is ejected entitling the manipulator to goods to the value of twopence.

"The manipulator has two chances for his penny as it gives him two balls to throw. The penny is retained by the machine. The ball may descend through any one of five openings at the bottom of the pins, but the sliding cup which is under the control and direction of the manipulator can be moved so as to intercept the ball below any one of the five openings. There is no part of the machine at the level of the cup at which the manipulator cannot intercept the ball with the sliding cup. The machine tallies very closely with the

---

* The Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxv.) sec. 22, enacts:—"No person shall keep or be concerned in the keeping management or conduct of any place or exercise keep open show or expose to be played drawn or thrown at or in either by dice lots cards balls or by numbers or figures or by any other way contrivance or device whatsoever any lottery and no person shall suffer to be exercised kept open shown or exposed to be played drawn or thrown at or in either by dice lots cards balls or by numbers or figures or by any other way contrivance or device whatsoever any such lottery in any place and any person contravening the provisions of this section shall for every offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds."

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

description of the machine which formed the subject of the conviction in the case of Forte v. Dewar, 12th July 1905, 4 Adam, page 575.

"An English decision was put before me for the defence, that of Pessers, Moody, Wraith, & Curr, Limited, v. Catt, in the King's Bench Division. In that case a judgment was pronounced by Mr Justice Scrutton on 5th June 1912 regarding this actual 'Pickwick' machine, and finding that it was not a game of hazard but a game of skill. In the conflict of precedents thus raised between two judgments each closely in point, I had regard not only to the paramount direct authority of a Court of Justiciary decision for a Scottish case, but also to the fact that the High Court in the case of Forte appears to have allowed as an element in the determination of the question of hazard the consideration whether the game was for the purpose of play by experienced players or for ordinary members of the public. While I considered that the element of hazard in the game scarcely exceeded that of many games of skill, I considered myself bound to hold that, in view of the machine being set up for ordinary members of the public in absolutely analogous conditions to those existing in the case of Forte, it was my duty to find that the game was a game of hazard and a lottery. Accordingly, I convicted, but as the prosecution was represented to be a test case, I imposed a modified penalty of 5s. or one day."

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was—"Was the machine a lottery in the sense of the section founded upon."

The case was called on 31st May 1913, when the Court ordered it to be heard before a full bench.

The case was heard on 9th November 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The only thing prohibited by the Act was a machine for playing a game of chance, but the machine here in question was not of that description, and so did not fall under the prohibition. It was an implement for the exercise of skill in catching a ball in a cup, and a prize was offered for successful manipulation of the machine. The governing element in the game was skill, which increased with practice, and there was no occasion upon which the skilful player might not prove successful. The case of a machine which afforded a chance only of exercising skill [1] was distinguishable from the present, and ought to have been distinguished in the case of Forte v. Dewar,[2] the decision in which should be overruled. A game of skill did not become a game of chance merely because it was played by a beginner who could not play with any approach to certainty. A precisely similar machine had been held by the English Courts not to be a gambling machine but a game of skill, and that case should be followed.[3]

Argued for the respondent;—The machine in question was a "lottery" which had been well defined by Hawkins, J., as a "distribution of prizes by lot or chance."[4] In the case of the ordinary member of the public who used the machine success or the reverse

---

[1] Santongeli v. Neilson, (1900) 3 F. (J.) 10, 3 Adam, 234; Ogilvie v. Benigno, (1905) 7 F. (J.) 82, at p. 83, 4 Adam, 575, at p. 578; Feilding v. Turner, [1903] 1 K. B. 867.

[2] (1905) 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575.

[3] Pessers, Moody, Wraith, & Curr, Limited, v. Catt, (1913) 29 T. L. R. 381.

[4] Taylor v. Smetten, (1883) 11 Q. B. D. 207.

was a pure matter of chance, and the element of skill was to all intents and purposes absent. The machine was therefore a lottery in the sense of the statute. The fact that by practice a certain amount of skill might in some cases be attained was really immaterial, because the number of such cases was necessarily limited and even in such cases chance was still one of the main features in the game. The case was ruled by Forte v. Dewar,[1] which was a sound decision. Pessers, Moody, Wraith, & Curr, Limited, v. Catt[2] was an English decision, and was not binding on the Court, especially as the question there did not arise in criminal proceedings such as the present, but in a civil case where a defendant refused to pay the hire of the machine because it was a gambling machine, a defence which would not commend itself to the sympathy of any Court of law.

At advising on 21st November 1913,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—We are not here asked to construe the clause of the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act of 1892. If that had been our task we should never, I think, have reached the question upon which our judgment is sought by both parties to this case, namely, whether this machine is, in the sense of the statute founded on, a lottery, meaning thereby a game of chance. It is called "The Pickwick" machine. It is actuated thus: A spring, drawn down and released, projects a ball to the top of the machine whence, by the force of the impact aided by gravity, the ball commences to descend. In its descent it passes among a number of irregularly placed studs, ultimately emerging by any one of five different passages where there is a cup in the hands of the manipulator who endeavours in it to catch the ball.

It is quite obvious that an unskilful performer will usually miss. It is equally obvious that a person of deft hand, with adequate practice and a quick eye, will usually succeed. It is equally clear that a person of superlative skill, with prolonged practice, will almost invariably succeed. Is that a game of hazard or a game of skill? In my opinion, it is a game of skill with an element of hazard, varying in extent in inverse ratio to the skill of the performer. If an unskilled tyro operates the machine, it will be a game of hazard. If a highly skilled and practised operator uses the machine, it will be a game of skill; and between those two extremes there will be a mingling of skill and hazard in infinitely varying degrees. But the same thing, it seems to me, must be said of all games of skill, because in all games of skill the unskilled will only succeed by a fluke, and the highly practised player will only miss by a fluke. A game of hazard, on the other hand, is one in which the tyro and the expert meet on substantially even terms.

This machine seems to fall within the category of games of skill, for it is found in the stated case that "The ball may descend through any one of five openings at the bottom of the pins, but the sliding cup which is under the control and direction of the manipulator, can be moved so as to intercept the ball below any one of the five openings. There is no part of the machine at the level of the cup at which the manipulator

[1] 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575.

[2] 29 T. L. R. 381.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

Lord Justice-General.

cannot intercept the ball with the sliding cup." In other words, a skilled expert may conceivably succeed on every occasion although a clumsy performer will probably fail.

Now, it is very satisfactory to find that we come—for I understand the majority of your Lordships are of the same opinion as I am now expressing—to the same conclusion as the Court of King's Bench, and are about to pronounce the same judgment with regard to the character of this machine as was pronounced by Mr Justice Scrutton and was confirmed by the Court of Appeal.[1] There is only one expression of opinion in some of the learned Judges' opinions from which I respectfully dissent. They speak of "a scintilla of skill" being present in the use of the machine. I do not think that accurately describes this machine. "A scintilla of skill" and a large element of hazard there certainly are in the hands of the unskilful performer. Indeed the greater the proficiency the less the hazard, and the less the proficiency the greater the hazard. But it would never, it seems to me, be a satisfactory way to determine the nature and character of the machine according to the skill or lack of skill on the part of those who seek to manipulate it.

That appears to me to be the ground upon which the whole reasoning advanced by the respondent here was rested. That also appears to me, so far as I can judge from the opinions expressed, to have been the basis upon which the judgment of this Court proceeded in the case of Forte v. Dewar,[2] for I find Lord Stormonth-Darling in that case said: "The only question is whether the machines which were found on the premises of the accused were for the purpose of practising games of hazard in order to induce or entice any person to play at such a game. Now, the finding of the magistrate . . . is, that to an ordinary member of the public having no special opportunity of acquiring skill at it, its working depended on chance, and he held that the machine was for practising a game of hazard." That appears to me to be an unsound and an insufficient ground of judgment, because, I repeat, it would involve the determination of the character of the machine, whether of skill or hazard, by the efficiency or inefficiency of the player. I offer no opinion, for we heard no argument, upon the question whether the case would be different if one or two or three or four of the channels were closed. The case I am dealing with, and the case the High Court was dealing with in Forte v. Dewar,[2] were cases in which all the openings were open, and where the skilled manipulator might conceivably succeed on every occasion.

The judgment we are about to pronounce will undeniably overrule the judgment of this Court pronounced in the case of Forte v. Dewar.[2] I think that the decision in that case cannot be supported. I have, therefore, to move your Lordships to answer the question put to us—as indeed the experienced Magistrate who tried the case would probably have done, had he felt himself free—in the negative.

Lord Dundas.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant is charged

[1] Peeters, Moody, Wraith, & Curr, Limited, v. Catt, 29 T. L. R. 381.
[2] 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

Lord Dundas.

that he did, in his shop in Glasgow, keep, show, and expose a lottery, contrary to the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, section 22. That section is printed in the case. It is obscurely expressed; but I suppose its gist is to prohibit under penalty the keeping of a game of chance in a place to which the public are admitted. The alleged "lottery" is a machine, which is very well described in the case, and which we saw in Court. It is, I understand, the same machine (or practically the same) as was before this Court in Forte v. Dewar,[1] and before the English Court of Appeal in the recent case of Pessers, Moody, Wraith, & Curr v. Catt.[2] It is important to note that the case states that "there is no part of the machine at the level of the cup at which the manipulator cannot intercept the ball with the cup." The English Judges held that the game is not one of hazard but of skill. They distinguished the case before them from those of Fielding v. Turner[3] and Dyson v. Mason.[4] Kennedy, L.J., was of opinion that in the machine here in question "there is what I may call a governing element of skill in the use of the cup which can, wherever the ball falls, if skilfully used catch that ball." His lordship went on to say,—"the test as to success or failure seems to me in this case to be one of skill and not of chance. That is the dominant element." I agree with the learned Judge's observations, and with the decision of the Court of Appeal. I take it that this machine is a game of skill. The skill involved seems to me to be akin in kind, though probably not in degree, to that of an agile fieldsman in the slips at cricket. But then it is said that, to a beginner, it would really be a matter of pure chance whether or not the ball was intercepted by the cup. That may well be; but it would, I apprehend, arise from the beginner's lack of skill, and not from the nature of the game for which the machine is designed and adapted. I have difficulty in seeing how a game of skill should be reduced to the category of a game of chance because the player is inexperienced. On this argument, such games as golf, cricket, billiards, and the like, might be regarded as mere games of chance or hazard. In Forte's case,[1] this Court condemned the machine in question as being a game of hazard within the meaning of section 406 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. The Lord Justice-Clerk said,[5]—"The intention of the Legislature was to put down the use of such machines as are to be used for playing games of hazard. The amount of hazard may be modified; nevertheless the games here have been found to be games of hazard, which, the Act says, it shall be punishable to entice people to play at. I think the magistrates had materials on which they could so find." Lord Kyllachy, construing the statute, and having regard to the findings in fact by which the Court was bound, was unable to hold that the games in question were substantially games of skill, or were other than substantially games of chance. Lord Stormonth-Darling referred specially to a finding in fact by the magistrate that although a certain amount of success in working the machine could be acquired by practice, yet that "to an

---

[1] 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575.
[2] 29 T. L. R. 381.
[3] [1903] 1 K. B. 867.
[4] (1904) 20 T. L. R. 298.
[5] 7 F. (J.), at p. 85.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

Lord Dundas.

ordinary member of the public having no special opportunity of acquiring skill at it, its working depended on chance."[1] We are sitting here as a full bench. I am bound to say that I do not find the reasons assigned for the judgment in Forte's case[2] satisfactory or conclusive. As already stated, I do not see why a game of skill, such as I hold (agreeing with the English Judges) this particular game to be, should be condemned as being a game of chance or hazard, or a lottery, because its working, in the hands of an ordinary person having no experience or skill in the game, may be a matter more or less of mere chance. It appears that the magistrate would have declined to convict, but that he (quite rightly) considered himself bound by the case of Forte.[2] In my opinion, we ought to answer the question put to us in the negative.

LORD JOHNSTON.—The provision of section 22 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1892, is undoubtedly unskilfully worded, and is defective for want of any definition of the word "lottery." This word is not very clearly descriptive of the article in question, whether viewed objectively as a mechanical apparatus, or subjectively as the game or trial, whether of skill or of chance, for which it is intended to be used. But I think that it is our duty to look at the section reasonably and to make it effectual, provided the idea it conveys is sufficiently clearly set forth to leave no reasonable doubt as to its meaning. Whether your Lordships or I am right, I have no doubt that it ought, in the interest of the juvenile community, to be amended.

The section in question was intended, I think, to put a stop to a class of gambling carried on through the medium of something mechanical. The question to be determined is, I think, whether the use of this machine demands for success merely skill, or whether that success depends on chance wholly or in part. I think that the machine must be regarded not in the abstract, but in relation to the circumstances under which it is offered for use and is used. I am very far from saying that if in the quiet of an isolated room the machine were put experimentally into the hands even of men of the highest skill and training in the use of hand and eye, as, for instance, noted billiard players, they could make any certainty of continued success. But suppose that they could, that would not affect my view of the machine as intended to be used, and as used by the appellant. The object of the owner in exposing it for use in his saloon is gain. The object and result of what I may call his commercial use of it is I think a certainty of gain. The odds are in favour of the individual owner and his machine, else it would not be exposed for the use referred to. The odds must be against the average individual user, though each, believing his own deftness to be above the average, or sanguine of his luck, hopes to falsify the odds in his own particular case. His object is the chance of gain. Now, money is staked, and whether loss or gain results depends on a combination of skill and chance, both present in every case, though which predominates depends on the individual. I cannot hold that this machine is not a lottery when operated by an indi-

[1] 7 F. (J.), at p. 86. [2] 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

Ld. Johnston.

vidual in whose hands skill predominates, though chance is present, and a lottery when operated by another in whose hands chance predominates.

Therefore I think the result is that, when it is regarded not as a machine to be experimented on by experts in games of skill, but as in fact exposed for general use in the saloon of an ice-cream vendor or similar place to induce the hazard of money by all and sundry, skilled and unskilled, this article is a machine the use of which involves, and the result of the use of which depends and is intended to depend on, chance to such intent and effect that it must be reasonably regarded as a lottery in the sense of the statute. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the question put in this stated case should be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Salvesen.—The sole question argued in this case was whether the machine found on the accused's premises was a machine for the purpose of practising a game of hazard. The stipendiary magistrate was of opinion that the element of hazard in the game scarcely exceeded that in many games of skill; but he felt himself bound to convict because of the judgment of the Court of Justiciary in the case of Forte v. Dewar.[1] In that case he holds, and as I think rightly, that the Court allowed as an element in determining the question of hazard the consideration whether the game was for the purpose of play by experienced players or for ordinary members of the public. In my opinion that is not a legitimate element in considering whether a particular machine constitutes a lottery. It may be affirmed of all games of skill that a beginner will not practice the game successfully; and it does not appear to me to make the game any the less one of skill that there is in it a substantial element of chance. The game of golf is generally regarded as a typical game of skill; but no player has yet reached that degree of skill that he can calculate the exact spot at which the ball will lie after his stroke is played. Yet the difference of a few inches may make the next shot a relatively easy or a difficult one. The carry of the ball and its direction will also depend upon the strength of the wind while the ball is in the air, which in the case of a gusty day cannot even be approximately calculated. If this is true of the experienced player it is very much more true of the beginner; yet no one would describe the game of golf as a game of hazard, still less as a lottery coming under the penal statutes. In the present case we are not embarrassed by any adverse findings of fact such as seem to have affected the minds of the Judges who decided Forte's case.[1] Had the magistrate been left to reach a decision independently of authority it is obvious that he would not have convicted. We have had an opportunity of seeing the machine which is correctly described in the case before us; and I have no doubt that a qualified and practised player would be able to catch the falling ball in the cup with a reasonable degree of regularity. Indeed, I think that such proficiency might be acquired in this game (unlike many games of skill) as that the result aimed at might be achieved on every occasion. Such proficiency, however, can only be acquired as the result of natural qualities of quickness combined with a long course

[1] 7 F. (J.) 82, 4 Adam, 575.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Di Carlo v. M'Intyre.

Lord Salvesen.

of practice such as is not likely to be possessed by the ordinary members of the public who play it for their amusement. The legal distinction between a game of hazard and a game of skill seems to me to be this, that in the former the experienced player and the beginner are on a footing of equality, while in the latter they are not. There has been a tendency in previous cases to take a very rigid view with regard to machines of this kind; but I am prepared to hold that a game does not come within the scope of the statute when it involves a substantial degree of skill to play it successfully. I may add that I think the Glasgow Police might be better employed than in interfering with such harmless amusement as may be derived from the operation of a machine such as the present.

I should have reached the above conclusion independently of the decision in the English case to which we were referred, but it is satisfactory to know that the decision of the Court of Appeal in England is to the same effect as our own; and that the use of a machine which has been held lawful in that country should not be treated as a criminal offence in Scotland.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree that the question put should be answered in the negative, and the grounds of my opinion may be stated in two sentences. I think that where the player, as here, may attain the desired result on each occasion by the exercise of skill the game cannot be considered a lottery. The fact that a player is unskilled does not make a difference.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. It seems to me that, on the admitted facts of this case taken along with an examination of the machine itself, the game in question involves a substantial, although varying, amount of skill for all performers, whether beginners if possessed of reasonable quickness of eye and hand, or those with a moderate amount of practice, or experts. The first would catch the ball occasionally, the second often, and the latter with reasonable regularity.

LORD SKERRINGTON concurred with the majority.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

JAMES G. BRYSON, Solicitor—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 10.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

WILLIAM PAUL, Appellant.—Haldane.
ALEXANDER KNOX, Appellant.—Haldane.
HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Lord-Adv. Munro—Mitchell, A.-D.

Procedure—Withdrawal of plea of guilty—Crime—Habitual criminality—Withdrawal of plea on appeal after sentence—Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), secs. 31 and 41—Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 59), secs. 10, 17 (3) (5).

Two persons, who were charged with theft by housebreaking and with being habitual criminals within the meaning of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, sec. 10, having, under sec. 31 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, and sec. 17 (3) of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, pleaded guilty to the charge of theft and admitted that they were habitual criminals, were remitted by the Sheriff for sentence to the High Court of Justiciary. Both were sentenced by the presiding Judge to terms of penal servitude and preventive detention, one having asked, and been refused, leave to withdraw his admission that he was a habitual criminal.

The accused then appealed to the Court of Appeal and asked leave to withdraw their pleas to the charge of habitual criminality, alleging that in pleading guilty they believed that they were merely admitting that the list of previous convictions annexed to the indictment was correct, and did not understand the nature of the charge and the penal consequences that it involved.

The Court held that, as the procedure had been regular throughout and the accused had been advised by law-agents, their allegations as to their misunderstanding of the charge could not be accepted as grounds for allowing the plea to be withdrawn; and refused the appeals.

Observations as to the circumstances in which the Court of Appeal will allow such pleas to be withdrawn.

Observed that it was the duty of a Sheriff, before taking a plea to a charge of being a habitual criminal, to explain to the accused the nature of the charge and the consequences of an admission of guilt.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Johnston. Lord Skerrington.

WILLIAM PAUL and ALEXANDER KNOX were each charged on indictments in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen with theft by housebreaking aggravated by previous convictions, and with being habitual criminals within the meaning of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, section 10.

Under section 31 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,*

* The Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35), enacts:—

Sec. 31. "Where a person accused shall give written notice to the Crown Agent through his own procurator that he desires to have his case at once disposed of, and declares his intention to plead guilty, it shall be lawful to serve such person with an indictment and a notice . . . to appear at a diet not less than four clear days after such notice before the Sheriff before whom under this Act he would be cited to a first diet . . . and at such diet the Sheriff, if any plea of guilty is tendered which shall be accepted by the procurator-fiscal, shall deal with the case in like manner as cases are required to be dealt with under this Act where a person accused pleads guilty at a first diet. . . ."

Sec. 41. "Where a person accused is cited to the High Court of Justiciary for the second diet the said Court shall have power to review the proceedings at the first diet, and where the person accused has pleaded guilty to the whole

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

they gave notice that they desired to have their cases at once disposed of and declared their intention to plead guilty, and at diets held for Paul on 11th November 1913 and for Knox on 29th November 1913 they pleaded guilty to the charges of theft by housebreaking and to the previous convictions, and also, after special interrogation, admitted that they were habitual criminals, and were thereupon remitted by the Sheriff-substitute (Laing) to the High Court of Justiciary for sentence.

On 19th November 1913 Paul was sentenced by the Lord Justice-Clerk to periods of penal servitude and preventive detention. On 12th December 1913 Knox came up for sentence, when his counsel moved the Court to allow his plea to the charge of habitual criminality to be withdrawn. The Lord Justice-Clerk refused the motion, and sentenced him also to periods of penal servitude and preventive detention.

Both panels appealed to the Court of Appeal.

The following grounds of appeal were stated by Paul:—

"That neither at the pleading diet nor at any previous time was the appellant made acquainted of the sense in which the phrase 'habitual criminal' was used in the indictment, and accordingly did not understand that, in addition to a sentence for the crime he was charged with, he would be given a further sentence of preventive detention. At the pleading diet he was specially interrogated as to whether or not he was a 'habitual criminal,' but he understood when pleading guilty that he was merely admitting as correct the list of previous convictions annexed to the indictment. That had he been made aware of the consequences of a plea of guilty he would have pled 'not guilty' to the charge of being a 'habitual criminal.'

"That the appellant was liberated from Peterhead on or about 27th September 1912. That he worked steadily for more than a year with various employers, being seven months in the employment of one, and up to the time of committing the crime which caused his arrest he was leading an honest life. That the articles stolen were of small value, and the crime was committed on a sudden impulse when under the influence of drink. That had he been tried by a jury there was not sufficient evidence to convict him of being a habitual criminal.

"That in these circumstances a miscarriage of justice has taken place."

The following grounds of appeal were stated by Knox:—

"Because at the diet in the High Court the appellant asked leave or any part of the charge at the first diet, the Court at such second diet if it shall be shown that such plea was taken to an irrelevant or incompetent charge, or has been taken under substantial error or misconception, or under circumstances which tended to prejudice the person accused, may allow such plea to be withdrawn or modified. . . ."

---

The Prevention of Crime Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 59), enacts:—Sec. 17 (3). ". . . where a person is indicted [for a crime and with being a habitual criminal] the provisions of sec. 31 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, shall not apply unless the accused intimates his intention to plead guilty of the crime in terms of that section and to admit that he is a habitual criminal, and where the accused intimates his intention as aforesaid the Sheriff shall remit him to the High Court of Justiciary for sentence. (5) . . . A person sentenced in Scotland to preventive detention may appeal against the sentence to a Court of Appeal which shall consist of not less than three Judges of the High Court of Justiciary. . . ."

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

to withdraw his plea of guilty on the ground that, for the reasons after stated, it had been taken under substantial error or misconception, and under circumstances which tended to prejudice the appellant, and such leave was refused.

"The appellant respectfully submits that he should be allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty to the said charge of being a habitual criminal, for the following reasons which he stated at the said diet in the High Court:—(1) He offered to plead guilty, and subsequently did so, under the provisions of section 31 of the Criminal Procedure Act, under the misconception that in pleading guilty to being 'a habitual criminal' he was merely admitting the accuracy of the previous convictions founded upon in the charge against him, and he did not understand that, by section 10 (2) (a) of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, he was not 'a habitual criminal' within the meaning of that Act, unless he was also 'leading persistently a criminal or dishonest life.' He was advised by a law-agent to offer to plead guilty under section 31, before he did so, and said agent explained to him that the practical effect of that plea would be an addition to his sentence, but did not explain to him the technical meaning and statutory requisites of a charge of being 'a habitual criminal.' The appellant, prior to the acts of theft charged in said indictment, had been earning his livelihood by honest occupations, and was not persistently leading a criminal or dishonest life. (2) The appellant was apprehended at Aberdeen on 26th October 1913, and has been in prison since that date. Prior to a pleading diet on 30th October the appellant was advised by an agent in regard to said diet. The said indictment was served upon him on 24th November 1913. On 3rd November, while in the prison at Aberdeen, appellant requested the prison authorities to be allowed to consult a law-agent, but no law-agent was admitted to him until after he had again made the request on 17th November 1913.

"Under these circumstances the appellant was seriously prejudiced in tendering a plea of guilty under the provisions of section 31 of the Criminal Procedure Act."

The cases were heard together on 14th January 1914.

Argued for the appellants;—It was competent for the Court of Appeal to allow the panels to withdraw their admissions, if satisfied that they had been made under substantial error or misconception. The fact that the pleas had been tendered under section 31 of the Act of 1887 and not at a "first diet" under section 28 of that Act did not detract from the power of the Court,[1] the cases[2] which seemed to indicate that section 41 of the Act of 1887 only applied to pleas tendered under section 28 being wrongly decided and logically unjustifiable, and being in any event inapplicable to an application to the Court of Criminal Appeal under the Act of 1908. Here there had been substantial error and misconception, the charge being a highly technical one with regard to which mistake was easy, and neither panel having ever intended to plead guilty to the technical offence of being a habitual criminal. Accordingly the Lord Justice-Clerk should, under section 41 of the Act of 1887, have allowed the panel Knox to withdraw his admission when he came up for sentence,

[1] H. M. Advocate v. Robertson, (1899) 1 F. (J.) 74, 3 Adam, 1.

[2] H. M. Advocate v. Lyon, (1887) 15 R. (J.) 66, 1 White, 538; H. M. Advocate v. Black, (1894) 1 Adam, 312.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

and the Court of Appeal should now allow both panels to make their withdrawals, in order that an inquiry might be made into the facts on which the charge was based,[1] both panels having set forth in their appeals averments relevant to establish a prima facie defence to the charge. In the case of Knox the fact that he was denied the assistance of a law-agent between the 3rd and the 17th of November was an additional reason for reviewing his sentence. In the undernoted English cases[2] the Court had allowed a plea to be withdrawn in similar circumstances.

Argued for the Crown;—There was no ground in either case for allowing the panel to withdraw his plea. The procedure had throughout been regular, the panels had throughout had the advice of law-agents, and through their law-agents they had ex proprio motu signified their intention to plead guilty to both charges, and had initiated the procedure which followed under section 31 of the Act of 1887. Further, the minutes of procedure showed that the two separate charges were clearly discriminated by the Sheriff in taking the pleas. If the request of the panels were granted not only the sentences of preventive detention, but also those of penal servitude, would fall, seeing that the whole proceedings would be vitiated ab initio; and the Court of Criminal Appeal had no power to deal with the sentences of penal servitude. Further, leave to withdraw a plea tendered under section 31 of the Act of 1887 would be refused, except where the Crown gave its consent.[3] The English case of Collins,[4] in which leave had been refused, was closely analogous to the present cases.

At advising on 16th January 1914,—

Lord Justice-General.—In my opinion the appeal of William Paul must be refused.

The appellant, who admitted that he was a habitual criminal, was sentenced in the High Court on 19th November last to five years' preventive detention. He now brings this appeal under the 5th subsection of the 17th section of the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, the ground of his appeal being that he did not, when he gave the admission that he was a habitual criminal, understand that the consequence might be that he would receive a sentence of preventive detention in addition to the sentence pronounced for the crime of theft by housebreaking, aggravated by previous convictions, with which he had been charged. Taken by itself that is obviously an insufficient ground on which to give the prisoner any remedy. The procedure in this case was characterised by perfect regularity throughout. The prisoner intimated, through his own procurator, that he desired his case to be at once disposed of, and declared his intention not only to plead guilty to the crime with which he was charged, but to admit that he was a habitual criminal. I assume that, in so doing, he was advised by a competent legal adviser, the contrary not being stated

[1] H. M. Advocate v. Gillan, 1910 S. C. (J.) 84, 6 Adam, 256.

[2] Verney, (1909) 2 Crim. App. 107; Alexander, (1912) 7 Crim. App. 110.

[3] H. M. Advocate v. Lyon, 15 R. (J.) 66, 1 White, 538; H. M. Advocate v. Black, 1 Adam, 312; H. M. Advocate v. Robertson, 1 F. (J.) 74, 3 Adam, 1.

[4] (1910) 4 Crim. App. 81.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

Lord Justice-General.

in the note of appeal or stated to us at the bar. And we have the assurance of the Lord Advocate, on his responsibility as public prosecutor, that this assumption is correct. Thereafter the prisoner appeared before the Sheriff at Aberdeen, and after having been repeatedly interrogated, as the record bears, he pleaded guilty to the crime charged, and admitted that he was a habitual criminal. I assume that the Sheriff, before taking his plea, carefully and fully explained to him the nature of the charge preferred against him and the consequences of the admission. In my opinion it was the duty of the Sheriff so to do. I assume, the contrary not being stated, that the Sheriff discharged his duty, and again we have the assurance of the Lord Advocate that he did. Finally, the prisoner appeared in the High Court on 19th November and adhered to his plea of guilty and to his admission that he was a habitual criminal.

In these circumstances, the procedure being perfectly regular, it appears to me that it would require very strong and very special grounds for us to interfere with this sentence. No such grounds are stated here. The only ground on which we are asked to give redress is that the prisoner says that he did not understand that he might receive a sentence of preventive detention in addition to the sentence for the crime with which he was charged.

Now that appears to me to be a ground of challenge of the sentence which could not be established except by the prisoner's own assertion on oath—the examination of the prisoner himself—the procedure, I repeat, having been perfectly regular. I am very far from saying that we have not the power under the statute of 1908 to give a remedy if we should be convinced that any miscarriage of justice had taken place; for example, if it should be shown to us that a prisoner had given an admission while labouring under some substantial error or misconception or in circumstances which tended to prejudice his case. I entertain no doubt that this Court has the power and, in the cases which I have indicated, would exercise it to give a prisoner redress. But where it is admitted that the procedure was perfectly regular and that the prisoner was not denied the assistance, to which every accused person in Scotland is entitled, of a competent law-agent, then it appears to me that having admitted that he was a habitual criminal and having been sentenced, it is impossible for the prisoner to impugn the sentence or for the Court to permit the admission to be withdrawn on the bare allegation that he laboured under any misconception with regard either to the nature of the offence with which he was charged or the consequence which would follow from his admission of the offence. In these circumstances I move your Lordships to refuse this appeal.

In the case of Alexander Knox the facts are substantially the same as in the case of William Paul. The procedure there was perfectly regular. The only difference is that when the prisoner was brought before the High Court he moved, by his counsel, that his admission that he was a habitual criminal should be permitted to be withdrawn on the ground, not that he did not understand the consequence which would follow from his admission, but that he did not understand the nature of the offence with which he was charged. The Lord Justice-Clerk, who presided in the High Court at the time, refused that motion, and, for the reasons which I

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

Lord Justice-General.

have already given, I think his Lordship did right, and that accordingly the appeal here also must be refused.

I should mention—merely to show that we have not overlooked the fact—that the prisoner here alleges in addition that he was denied the assistance of a law-agent from the 3rd to the 17th of November, in other words, that he only had the assistance of a competent legal adviser, and availed himself, as I understand, of his assistance, for one week instead of three weeks before the indictment was served on him. That seems to me to be nothing short of a ridiculous ground upon which to ask that the sentence should be reviewed. I am of opinion, and move your Lordships, that the appeal should be refused.

LORD JOHNSTON.—Under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, two innovations were introduced. First, it was provided by section 25 that an accused person should be cited on indictment to two diets, one a diet at which he should be called on to plead to the indictment before a Sheriff, and the other a diet at which, if his plea was "not guilty," he should be tried either before a Sheriff, or before the High Court of Justiciary, as the case might be. Second, it was provided by section 31 that, if the accused person intended to plead guilty, he should be enabled to expedite matters and have his case disposed of summarily without awaiting the second diet.

I shall for shortness confine attention to High Court cases.

In the normal case, at the first or pleading diet the Sheriff (section 29) is to dispose of any formal objections, and if he thinks that these are frivolous or touch matters where the panel is not truly prejudiced, he shall then take his plea. But if otherwise, or if any other preliminary objection is taken, he shall minute the objection, and leave it to be disposed of by the High Court. In such cases it is necessarily to be inferred that the panel would not be called on to plead at the first diet, and that at the second diet before the High Court his objections would be disposed of and the case would proceed in all respects as under the old procedure. But there is a provision of great importance in section 41. Power is given to the High Court at the second diet to review the proceedings before the Sheriff at the first or pleading diet, and, inter alia, if it shall be shown that a plea of guilty "has been taken under substantial error or misconception, or under circumstances which tended to prejudice the person accused" the Court may allow the plea to be withdrawn or modified, and in such cases provision is made for postponing the trial if necessary.

I turn now to the second innovation. By section 31 "where a person accused shall give written notice to the Crown Agent through his own procurator that he desires to have his case at once disposed of, and declares his intention to plead guilty," he shall be entitled to have his case disposed of at a special early sitting, and if at such diet "any plea of guilty is tendered which shall be accepted by the Procurator-fiscal" the Sheriff "shall deal with the case in like manner as cases are required to be dealt with under this Act where a person accused pleads guilty at a first diet." In a High Court case or one of an aggravated nature he remits it to the

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

Ld. Johnston.

High Court for sentence. I think that, when a panel has pleaded under section 31, the High Court, when he comes up for sentence, has, if not inherently at least by implication, the power of review conferred by section 41 and already referred to, and may under the provisions of that section allow the plea to be withdrawn or modified.

The Prevention of Crime Act, 1908, introduced, in Part II., a new mode of dealing with habitual criminals. I do not need to refer to the definition of habitual criminal. I need only say that, where the panel is charged with being a habitual criminal, (1) the indictment must contain two separate charges, one of a specific crime, the other of being a habitual criminal; (2) the panel has not the right of resorting to the 31st section of the 1887 Act unless he "intimates his intention to plead guilty of the crime in terms of that section and to admit that he is a habitual criminal," and where he does plead under the 31st section, he is to be remitted to the High Court for sentence; and (3) where the panel pleads not guilty he is tried first for the crime and, if found guilty, the jury are re-sworn and inquire separately into the charge of habitual criminality. If what I have said above, as regards section 41 of the Act of 1887, is sound, it is open to the panel when brought up for sentence to show that he has pleaded to the double charge under substantial error or misconception, &c., as to either branch of it, and it is within the power of the Court to allow the plea to be withdrawn.

In the first case before us, that of Paul, the panel was indicted for housebreaking, and was charged as a habitual criminal. He took advantage of the 31st section of the Act of 1887 and pleaded guilty to the offence and, as the record of his plea bears, "being specially interrogated whether he admits that he is a habitual criminal, he answers that he is a habitual criminal." On coming up for sentence in the High Court, he asked no review and raised no objection, and was sentenced accordingly to undergo three years' penal servitude and five years' preventive detention. But he now appeals under section 17 (5) of the Act of 1908 against this sentence of preventive detention on the ground as stated in his note of appeal, "that neither at the pleading diet nor at any previous time was the appellant made acquainted of the sense in which the phrase 'habitual criminal' was used in the indictment and accordingly did not understand that, in addition to a sentence for the crime he was charged with, he would be given a further sentence of preventive detention. At the pleading diet he was specially interrogated as to whether or not he was a 'habitual criminal,' but he understood when pleading guilty that he was merely admitting as correct the list of previous convictions annexed to the indictment. That had he been made aware of the consequences of a plea of guilty he would have pled 'not guilty' to the charge of being a 'habitual criminal.'"

I am of opinion that we cannot entertain his appeal, and I have come to this conclusion for these reasons.

In the first place, the panel has been protected from the outset by advice. He could not move a step under the Act of 1887, section 31, without an agent, for his preliminary notice that he desired to have his case at once disposed of, and declared his intention to plead guilty, had

Jan. 16, 1914.

Paul v. H. M. Advocate.

Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

Ld. Johnston.

to be given to the Crown Agent "through his own procurator." Again when brought up to plead under the 31st section, while there is no suggestion that he was not accompanied by his agent in accordance with invariable practice, the Sheriff pointedly discriminated between the two parts of the charge—the crime and the habitual criminality. And finally, when brought up for sentence before the High Court, he must again, according to practice, have been represented, and it is not suggested that he was not.

In the second place, his case has been disposed of by the Lord Justice-Clerk, sitting in the High Court, as that of a prisoner who had not only pleaded guilty of a crime but admitted that he was a habitual criminal, and accordingly with an appropriate sentence, viz., a short sentence of penal servitude and a corresponding, but longer period of five years' preventive detention. Now we cannot touch this sentence as a whole, we can only entertain an appeal against the sentence of preventive detention. It must be apparent that, if we were to go back upon that part of the sentence, we would leave a sentence for the crime which may, in all probability would, be inadequate for the crime, and not what the presiding Judge would have given had he been dealing with the case apart from any question of habitual criminality.

In the third place, while I do not say that, where the 31st section of the Act of 1887 has been appealed to, a case may never occur of substantial error, or misconception, or of circumstances tending to prejudice the person accused, which would require the Court to intervene under their limited appellate jurisdiction, even at the cost of dislocating a sentence already pronounced, yet for any such intervention there must be much more relevant and specific grounds averred than is the case here. The gravamen of the appellant's averment is that he had no explanation of the technical meaning and statutory requisites of a charge of being "a habitual criminal," and that, in admitting habitual criminality, he thought that he was merely admitting the long series of previous convictions libelled against him, and did not know that the practical result of his admission would be an addition to his sentence. That is merely to say "I admitted that I was a habitual criminal because I thought that that was the conclusion which the career of crime evidenced by my list of twenty-three previous convictions justified, but I did not understand the statutory technicalities or the effect of the admission on my sentence." But that is tantamount to admitting the central and essential fact required by the statute to be admitted or proved, and that on considerations which, I think, would commend themselves to most persons, as apparently they did to the panel as excellent reasons for the admission which he made. I cannot hold in these circumstances that the alleged ignorance of the results of the admission affects, in any way, the admission itself.

The second case before us is that of Alexander Knox. But it is, I think, a fortiori of the present, because Knox did state his desire to have the proceedings in the Court below reviewed by the presiding Judge, who held that he had presented no grounds for this being done, and sentenced him accordingly.

In conclusion I should add that I think it well the Court should warn Sheriffs and Sheriff Court procurators that where there is an ancillary charge of habitual criminality, it is their duty to make it clear to the accused person, as I am satisfied was done here, that he is charged with two different things under the same indictment, that he can only plead guilty to both and not to one only if he desires to take advantage of the 31st section of the Act of 1887, and that the two separate charges involve different and separate sentences.

Jan. 16, 1914.
Paul v. H. M. Advocate.
Knox v. H. M. Advocate.

LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

THE COURT dismissed the appeals.

W. LESLIE CHRISTIE, W.S.—ALFRED J. F. MITCHELL, S.S.C.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

No. 11.

JOHN LENG & COMPANY, LIMITED, Appellants.—Clyde, K.C.—Sandeman, K.C.—Boase.

WILLIAM FYFE MACKINTOSH (Procurator-Fiscal, Dundee), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Wark.

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Betting-house—Newspaper office—Newspaper offering prizes for forecasts of football matches—Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 119), sec. 1.

The Betting Act, 1853, by sec. 1, prohibits the keeping of any office for the receipt of money as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the contingency of any game or sport.

The proprietors of a weekly newspaper inserted in certain issues of their paper a notice offering a money prize to the person who, on a coupon cut from the paper and sent to their office, should give a correct forecast of the result of certain football matches. The papers were sold by the proprietors at 9d. a dozen to newsagents, who retailed them to members of the public at 1d. each. No papers were sold directly to the public by the proprietors, and no coupons were sold apart from the papers. A certain number of papers were bought by members of the public from the newsagents solely for the sake of the coupons.

Held that the proprietors of the paper used their premises solely for the selling of newspapers and not for the receipt of money on a promise to pay on a contingency, and, accordingly, that they had not contravened section 1 of the Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Dewar. Lord Hunter.

JOHN LENG & COMPANY, printers and publishers, Bank Street, Dundee, were charged in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Dundee on a complaint at the instance of William Fyfe Mackintosh, Procurator-Fiscal, which set forth "that you being the occupiers of or persons using offices or rooms at numbers 7 to 25 (both inclusive), and at number 8 Bank Street, Dundee, did on and between 13th September 1913 and 6th November 1913, open, keep, or use said offices or rooms for the purpose of money or other valuable thing being received by you or on your behalf as the consideration for an undertaking, promise, or agreement to pay money thereafter on events or contingencies of or relating to games of football; contrary to the Betting Act, 1853, secs. 1 and 3, as extended to Scotland by the Betting Act, 1874." *

* The Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 119), enacts:—Sec. 1. "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

The accused were found guilty as libelled by the Sheriff (Ferguson) and were fined £10, and thereafter obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court.

The case set forth, inter alia:—"The following facts were admitted by joint minute:—'(1) That the respondents are the occupiers of the offices at Numbers 7 to 25 and Number 8 Bank Street, Dundee, libelled in the complaint, and that they occupied and used the said offices during the period from 13th September 1913 to 6th November 1913, both dates inclusive. (2) That the respondents are the proprietors of the People's Journal newspaper, and that the said newspaper is published by them at the said offices Nos. 7 to 25 and No. 8 Bank Street, Dundee. (3) That the said newspaper was published weekly by the respondents on Saturdays from 13th September 1913 to 1st November 1913, both dates inclusive. (4) That in the issue of said newspaper published on 13th September 1913 the respondents published a notice in the following terms:—"£100 offered weekly for football skill. £100. Are you an expert in football form? If so, is your skill sufficient to win £100? Try it. On the entry form below we give a list of 15 matches to be played on Saturday, September 20th. Cross out in ink the teams you think will be defeated. If you think there will be a 'draw,' do not cross out either name. Fill up the entry form and post it addressed to 'Football, No. 1, People's Journal Office, 8 Bank Street, Dundee,' in time to reach us not later than midnight of Thursday, September 18th. No entry fee is required. £100 will be paid to the competitor who sends in the form, cut from this page, giving a correct forecast of all the matches. Should no competitor correctly forecast all the matches, a consolation prize of £10 will be awarded to the competitor whose forecast shows the greatest number of correct results. . . ."

"'And also a coupon in the following terms:—

"'"P. J. FORECAST No. 1.

"'" Cross out the name of the team you think will lose.

"'" In the case of a draw do not cross out either name.

"'" Matches to be played on September 20.

[Here followed a list of matches.]

"'" Name.....

"'" Address .....

"'"....."

"'(5) That a similar notice and a similar coupon were published by the respondents in each weekly issue of the said newspaper down to and including the issue of 1st November 1913. (6) That the circulation of the said newspaper has appreciably increased between the dates libelled in the complaint.'

---

the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse-race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise. . . ."

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

"Evidence was led, and the following further facts were proved:— (1) That the appellants sold copies of their paper, the People's Journal, each containing the information above set forth in regard to the football competition, with appropriate coupons, to newsagents, who paid them at the price of ninepence per dozen copies, and sold said newspapers to the public at the price of one penny per copy. (2) That so far as regards the papers purchased by newsagents in Dundee, these papers were purchased at the appellants' office in Bank Street, Dundee, at the said price of 9d. per dozen copies, the order with the money being handed across the counter on Fridays, and the papers delivered by van or messenger next day; that copies of papers so supplied and paid for were bought from the said newsagents by certain members of the public for the purpose merely of extracting the 'coupon' and taking part in the competition. (3) That the appellants have a warehouse, or newsagents' supply depot, in Stirling Street, Aberdeen, which is used as a means of distributing the People's Journal, that the papers are sent out from there to local newsagents by George Webster, a warehouseman in their employment, who each week collects payment from the newsagents for the papers supplied to them by him in the previous week, and pays the amounts received into the appellants' bank account with the Commercial Bank, Aberdeen. (4) That John Reed, fireman, 50 Skene Street, Aberdeen, frequently bought from said newsagents additional copies of the issues of the paper between the dates 13th September and 6th November, 'for no other purpose' than competition, filled up the coupons, in each case differently, posted them as directed in the the notice to the appellants' office in Dundee, and was successful on one occasion in securing a prize, which was paid to him by the appellants. (5) That there was no evidence of any member of the public (i.e. anyone not a newsagent) having bought papers directly from the appellants or from the said George Webster. (6) That in two instances, witnesses who had not previously to 13th September 1913 been purchasers of the paper, having seen their fathers' copies of the People's Journal, and used the coupons in them, purchased from said newsagents additional copies of each issue of the paper between the dates libelled at 1d. each, solely in order to secure additional chances of winning. One of these witnesses (Henry Donachie, Dundee) sent in at various times a considerable number of coupons all filled up differently and all signed in his own name, the number on one occasion being 27. In a third instance, a witness resident in Glasgow, who had not taken the paper before 13th September 1913, bought from newsagents there a number of copies of each issue of said paper during the period libelled at 1d. each, for the purpose of competing, did compete, and was paid the amount of £2 on the event of the matches referred to in the coupon of one of said issues. (7) That when 'prizes' were won, the amounts were paid by the appellants by cheques signed 'John Leng & Co.' or by postal order, forwarded to the successful competitors with a communication from 'The Proprietors of the People's Journal,' dated from People's Journal Office, Dundee. . . . (9) That after the first notice of these competitions appeared there was a large increase in the correspondence delivered at the appellants' offices in Bank Street, Dundee, mainly, if not wholly, consisting of letters addressed 'Football No. 1,' 'Football No. 2,' &c., that the postmen on duty after a time found that the letter-box belonging to the appellants at the premises would not contain the number of letters they had to deliver, that they subsequently delivered these letters to the appellants across the counter at No. 7 Bank Street, tied up in bundles of 100 or thereby, and that latterly the increase was such, that these letters were put up in sacks containing about 2000 each, and additional men sent down with them to the appellants' premises in Bank Street, where they were delivered to them."

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

The Sheriff stated the grounds of his decision as follows:—"The grounds of the decision were that, in my opinion, on the facts above admitted and held proved, the appellants had used their office for the receipt of money, being the sums paid by the witnesses to newsagents for copies of the paper bought for competitive purposes solely, and in effect transmitted to the appellants in advance less the commission of ¼th allowed to newsagents, which money was obtained as the consideration for their public undertaking to pay money prizes on the events or contingencies of the football matches detailed. I was of opinion that if the newspaper proprietor offered a public inducement, and issued a general invitation to purchase his paper and compete for a money reward, it was not necessary that the direct receipt of money by him from the individual competitor should be established or that there should be a separate payment for the 'coupon' apart from the price of the paper, if the Court was satisfied that the paper was really bought for the sake of the coupon. This appeared to me to be the literal and natural construction of the words of the statute, and to be the proper result of the application to the facts proved of the authority of Hart v. Hay Nisbet & Company, (1900) 2 F. (J.) 39, 3 Adam, 144; Reg. v. Stoddart, [1901] 1 K. B. 177; Hawke v. Hulton, (1905) 22 T. L. R. 169."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were, inter alia:—"(2) By selling to newsagents at their said offices newspapers containing the advertisements and coupons set forth, and receiving there coupons from persons who had purchased said newspapers from the said newsagents, for the purpose solely of obtaining said coupons and competing in said football competitions, were the appellants using said offices for the purpose of receiving money, contrary to section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853? (3) Was the money which was paid by members of the public to newsagents for newspapers containing the inducements and invitations set forth, received 'by or on behalf of' the appellants, within the meaning of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853? (4) Was the money so paid received by or on behalf of the appellants 'as the consideration' within the meaning of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, for an undertaking or promise to pay money on an event or contingency of the game of football? (5) On the facts above set forth, were the appellants rightly convicted of the contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, sections 1 and 3, charged in the complaint?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 2nd February 1914.

Argued for the appellants;—Betting per se was not an offence,[1] and the only question in the case was whether the appellants had contravened section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853. On the facts admitted and proved they had not. The offence constituted by that section was using premises for the receipt of money as the consideration for a promise to pay money on contingencies relating to games. The appellants had not used their premises for that purpose, but solely for the purpose of selling newspapers and receiving the price of newspapers.

[1] Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co., [1899] A. C. 143.

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Long & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

The only money which came into the appellants' hands was the money paid to them by the newsagents for the newspapers before the papers were sold by the newsagents to the public. No money was paid by the public to the appellants, who had no connection with the public whatsoever, and no direct concern with the motives which prompted the public to buy from the newsagents. It was quite clear that the appellants received no consideration for the coupons from the newsagents, seeing that the price of the papers as sold to the newsagents was always the same, whether they contained coupons or whether they did not. The decision in Caminada v. Hulton[1] was exactly in point and should be followed. None of the cases were really adverse to the appellants' contention. Hart v. Hay Nisbet & Company[2] was quite a different case, in that the money was paid to the proprietors of the newspaper at their office, and that extra coupons could be purchased by the public apart from the newspaper. In Stoddart v. Sagar[3] and in Regina v. Stoddart[4] the same elements were present as in Hart,[2] and Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Regina v. Stoddart[5] distinguished that case from that of Caminada,[1] in respect that in Caminada[1] "prima facie the consideration for which the purchaser of the newspaper paid his money was the newspaper itself, and there was no finding that it was in fact paid for the purpose of getting the benefit of the coupon." In Hawke v. Hulton & Company[6] it was held that, although no money was received by the proprietor beyond the price of the newspaper, an offence might yet be committed if the money was in reality paid for the coupon and not for the paper; but Lord Alverstone, C.J., indicated that there must be a clear finding in fact to that effect, which obviously could not be made in the present case, where the purchasers were the newsagents. Hodgson v. Macpherson[7] did not really affect the question, it merely decided that it did not matter whether the owner of the premises received payment actually in his premises or elsewhere, provided that the prohibited payment was in fact made, whereas the appellants' contention here was that they had received no such payment.

Argued for the respondent;—The appellants had been rightly convicted, in respect that they had used their offices for the receipt of money as the consideration for a promise to pay money on contingencies relating to games of football. It was settled by Hawke v. Hulton & Company[6] that, if the proprietors of a newspaper sold and received payment for papers containing coupons, even though no extra price was paid for the coupons beyond the price of the newspapers, they had committed an offence against section 1 of the Act of 1853, provided it was established that the papers, or some of them, were bought by the buyers solely for the sake of the coupons. The Sheriff had found that this had occurred here, so that the appellants would undoubtedly have been guilty had they sold their papers directly to the public and received payment directly from the public. The only question, therefore, which remained in the case was whether the appellants were to escape because of the fact that the newsagents were interposed between them and the public. That fact was immaterial and did not affect the true nature of the transactions, as the newsagents were to all intents and purposes the agents

[1] (1891) 60 L. J., M. C. 116. [2] (1900) 2 F. (J.) 39, 3 Adam, 144.
[3] [1895] 2 Q. B. 474. [4] [1901] 1 K. B. 177. [5] Ibid, at p. 184.
[6] (1905) 22 T. L. R. 169. [7] 1913 S. C. (J.) 68, 7 Adam, 118.

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

and representatives of the appellants. The money paid by the public was paid in part for the coupons, and the money paid by the newsagents to the appellants was the money received from the public, it being a merely technical objection to argue that the newsagents paid in advance for the papers. The appellants were the persons who promised to pay the prizes, and their papers would not have been bought in such numbers by the newsagents if they had contained no coupons, so that a certain proportion of the money received by the appellants was directly paid for the coupons. The fact that the money was not in the first instance actually received at the place libelled was immaterial so long as it was in the end received by the persons charged with committing the offence.[1] The case of Caminada[2] founded upon by the appellants was an unsatisfactory decision and did not help the appellants. In it only one sale was libelled, and there was nothing to show that the purchaser would not have purchased the paper even if it had contained no coupon; but in the present case the Sheriff had found that some papers were purchased solely for the sake of the coupons. The prosecutor had clearly established against the appellants the three factors necessary for a conviction under the section, viz., the use of the offices, the receipt of the money, and the promise to pay money on a sporting contingency.[3]

At advising on 6th February 1914,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—In my judgment this prosecution fails, and the conviction cannot stand. The appellants are proprietors of a weekly newspaper called the People's Journal, and in the issue for the 13th September last there appeared what is called an "entry form" in one of the pages. In it was printed a list of fifteen football matches to be played on the following Saturday, and purchasers of the newspaper were invited to cross out in ink the names of the teams which they thought would be defeated, or in the case of a draw not to cross out either name, and having so filled up the entry form, to transmit it to the offices of the newspaper proprietors in Dundee. A reward of £100 was offered by the proprietors to the purchaser of the newspaper who made an accurate forecast of all the matches.

This, it is alleged, was in contravention of the first section of the Betting Act of 1853. That section strikes at those who open, occupy, or use offices for the purpose of money being received by them or on their behalf as the consideration for an undertaking to pay money thereafter on events or contingencies of or relating to any sport; and the question which we have to decide is whether or no the appellants kept open their offices in Dundee for the purpose of receiving money as a consideration for their undertaking to pay money on the contingency of football matches.

The appellants contend that they kept open their office in Dundee for the purpose of selling newspapers and receiving the price of the newspapers, and for no other purpose. I am of opinion that their contention is well founded. It is no doubt true as found in the case that the appellants sold copies of their newspaper the People's Journal, each containing the information above set forth—the information regarding the competition in regard to the football competition—with appropriate coupons, to newsagents, who bought them at the price of 9d. per dozen copies, and sold the newspapers to the public at the price of one penny per copy. In other words, the appellants sold their newspapers at wholesale prices to newsvendors, who in turn sold them to the public at retail prices; but the appellants did not sell entry forms or coupons, and it is not alleged that they sold a single copy of a newspaper to any newsvendor who bought it for the purpose of engaging in the competition, in other words, for the mere sake of the coupon. It is therefore nothing to the purpose to say that John Reed, a fireman in Aberdeen, frequently bought from the newsagents additional copies of the issues of the paper between the dates 13th September and 6th November for no other purpose than the competition, so long as it is admitted that there was no evidence of any member of the public having bought papers direct from the appellants in Dundee or from George Webster, the warehouseman in the employment of the appellants at Aberdeen, who sends out the newspapers to the local agents there.

[1] Stoddart v. Hawke, [1902] 1 K. B. 353; Hodgson v. Macpherson, 1913 S. C. (J.) 68.

[2] 60 L. J., M. C. 116.

[3] Reference was also made to Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Co., [1893] 1 Q. B. 256.

The Sheriff has found that the appellants had used their offices for the receipt of money, being the sums paid by the witnesses to newsagents for copies of the paper bought for competitive purposes solely, but the complete answer which the appellants make is this, that not one penny of that money was received by them from anybody who purchased the newspaper for competitive purposes solely. And in order to constitute an offence against the statute, I am very clearly of opinion that the person accused must have sold to somebody for the purpose of engaging in the competition, or, in other words, for the sake of the coupon merely.

It may be true, and probably is, on the authorities, that it is unnecessary that there should be a separate payment for the coupon apart from the price of the paper if the Court is satisfied that the paper was really bought for the sake of the coupon, but I forbear to speculate on what would be the fate of a prosecution brought against a newsagent who sold and received money not for the newspaper, but for the coupon, from somebody who bought for the purpose of engaging in the competition. The keynote of the Sheriff's judgment is to be found in the following sentence:—"I was of opinion that if the newspaper proprietor offered a public inducement and issued a general invitation to purchase his paper and compete for a money reward, it was not necessary that the direct receipt of money by him from the individual competitor should be established." I am of exactly the contrary opinion. It appears to me that the words of the statute are clear and free from all ambiguity, and that, unless the office is open for the purpose of receiving money from someone who in order to engage in the competition buys the paper solely for the sake of the coupon, no prosecution lies.

[His Lordship here referred to a separate ground of appeal with which this report is not concerned.]

Holding these views, I propose that we should answer all the questions put to us in the negative.

Feb. 6, 1914.

John Leng & Co., Limited, v. Mackintosh.

LORD DEWAR.—I concur.

LORD HUNTER.—In this case the appellants, who are printers and publishers in Dundee, were charged with and convicted of keeping open or using their offices for the receipt of money by them as the consideration for an undertaking to pay money thereafter on events or contingencies relating to games of football contrary to section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853.

It appears that the appellants are proprietors of a newspaper called the People's Journal, and that in certain issues of that paper they inserted a notice offering a prize to the person who on a coupon attached to the paper should give a correct forecast of a certain number of football matches. In the event of no correct forecast being given a prize of smaller amount was to be given to the competitor whose forecast showed the greatest number of correct results. According to the findings of fact of the Sheriff, the appellants sold copies of their newspapers with the above notice and appropriate coupons to newsagents at the price of 9d. per dozen. The newsagents in turn sold the papers to the public at the price of 1d. per copy. Certain members of the public appear to have bought several copies of the newspaper for the purpose merely of extracting the coupon and taking part in the competition, and to have been successful in receiving prizes from the appellants. It is not found by the Sheriff that the sales by the appellants were other than bona fide sales of copies of their newspapers; that they sold or received money for coupons independent of copies of the newspapers; or that the newsagents in selling to the public and receiving the price of the newspapers were acting as agents for the appellants.

It has been held both in England and Scotland that publishers of newspapers by selling and receiving at their offices money for coupons in connection with coupon competitions relating to racing or games commit an offence against the Act. Further, it has been decided that in order to constitute the offence it is not necessary that the money should be received at the publisher's office, if that office is used for the purpose of money being received as the consideration for an undertaking to pay money thereafter on a contingency connected with racing or games. No case, however, was cited to us of the conviction of the publisher of a newspaper for the bona fide sale by him of newspapers to the public with competition coupons attached. I do not consider it necessary in this case to consider whether in such circumstances an offence would or might be committed. It appears to me sufficient for the decision in this case that upon the findings of fact of the Sheriff it would be an undue straining of the language of section 1 of the Betting Act of 1853 to hold that in any reasonable sense the appellants used their premises for the receipt of money as the consideration for an undertaking to pay money thereafter on events or contingencies relating to games of football. I accordingly agree that the questions in the case should be answered in the way which your Lordship proposes.

THE COURT answered the questions of law in the negative and sustained the appeal.

ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN TOWNSEND, Complainer.—Garson.
HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—W. Mitchell, A.-D.

No. 12.
Mar. 2, 1914.

Statutory Offences—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 69), secs. 5 and 9—Charge of attempted rape—Conviction of a statutory offence—Competency—Statute not libelled—Original charge abandoned—Original charge only for attempt.

Townsend v. H. M. Advocate.

Conviction—General conviction—Alternative offences—General conviction of contravention of section creating more than one offence—Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 69), sec. 5.

The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, enacts, sec. 9:—"If upon the trial of any indictment for rape, or any offence made felony by section four of this Act, the jury shall be satisfied that the defendant is guilty of an offence under section three, four, or five of this Act, or of an indecent assault, but are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in such indictment, or of an attempt to commit the same, then and in every such case the jury may acquit the defendant of such felony, and find him guilty of such offence as aforesaid, or of an indecent assault."

In the course of the trial of an accused on a complaint which only libelled a common law charge of attempt to ravish, the prosecutor withdrew the charge, and asked for, and obtained from the jury, a verdict of guilty "of a contravention of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, section 5."

In a suspension the Court quashed the conviction, holding that, while the power created by section 9 of the Act was available to a prosecutor although the Act had not been libelled in the complaint or indictment, it was not so available (1) where the accused was not charged with committing one of the specified crimes, but only with attempting to do so; (2) where the original charge had been withdrawn from the jury with the result that they could not, as required by section 9, acquit the accused of that charge before finding him guilty of the minor offence.

Held further that, in any event, the verdict could not stand, in respect that section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, created more than one offence, and that it was impossible to tell from the verdict of the jury of which of these offences the accused had been found guilty.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Ormidale. Ld. Anderson.

JOHN TOWNSEND, Glasgow, was served with an indictment which set forth that he "did, on 30th November 1913, enter the house of James Gibson, then at 6 Union Street, Calton, Glasgow, and in a bed there did attempt to ravish Sarah Jane M'Cowan Gibson, aged 15 years, daughter of and residing with the said James Gibson, now at 48 Green Street, Calton aforesaid, she being then asleep in said bed: And you have been previously convicted of assault."

On 20th January 1914 the accused was tried before the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire (Boyd) and a jury. At the close of his evidence the prosecutor, without amending his complaint and without having given any prior notice to the accused, withdrew the charge of attempt to ravish, and asked for a verdict of a contravention of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, section 5.*

* The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 and 49 Vict. cap. 69), enacts:—Sec. 5. "Any person who—(1) Unlawfully and carnally knows or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any girl being of or

Mar. 2, 1914.

Townsend v. H. M. Advocate.

The accused's agent objected to the prosecutor's motion on similar grounds to those set forth in the argument infra, but the Sheriff-substitute repelled the objection, and the jury unanimously found the panel "guilty of a contravention of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, section 5," and the Sheriff-substitute sentenced the accused to two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

The accused brought a bill of suspension and liberation in which he stated the following pleas:—(1) The complaint was not sufficiently specific to be relevant at common law or under statute. (2) The prosecutor having withdrawn the charge against the accused could not thereafter proceed with the prosecution against the accused. (3) The complainer having been indicted for an attempted crime at common law, the prosecutor was restricted to proving that charge, and conviction under said indictment for an offence under said statute was incompetent. (4) The conviction being in general terms, whilst the offence under said statute as submitted to the jury was alternatively charged, the conviction does not duly distinguish and determine what offence, if any, was found to be proved.

The case was heard before the High Court on 2nd March 1914.

Argued for the complainer;—(1) The introduction of the words "she being then asleep in said bed" into the complaint rendered it irrelevant,[1] in respect that, as it was not rape to obtain possession of a female's person while she was asleep,[2] to attempt so to obtain it could not be an attempt to commit rape. The complaint, accordingly, being irrelevant, it followed that the whole subsequent proceedings were null and void, it being impossible to obtain the statutory conviction introduced by section 9 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, where the original common law charge was fundamentally bad. (2) The complaint was further irrelevant in respect that it did not libel section 5 of the Act of 1885, with the result that the accused had no notice whatever, until the prosecutor withdrew the common law charge, that a statutory charge was to be made against him.[3] [The LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL referred to H. M. Advocate v. M'Laren[4] as an authority directly negativing the complainer's contention.] (3) Further, the power conferred by section 9 to convict of certain minor offences was only conferred where the charge was one of rape; it was not conferred where the charge was one of a mere attempt to commit rape, and the section, being an innovation upon the common law, and one telling against an accused, fell above the age of thirteen years and under the age of sixteen years; or (2) unlawfully and carnally knows, or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any female idiot or imbecile woman or girl, under circumstances which do not amount to rape, but which prove that the offender knew at the time of the commission of the offence that the woman or girl was an idiot or imbecile, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. . . ."

---

Sec. 9 is quoted in the rubric.

[1] Cf. Smith v. Sempill, 1911 S. C. (J.) 30, 6 Adam, 348.

[2] Macdonald's Criminal Law, (3rd ed.), p. 166; Anderson's Criminal Law, p. 161; H. M. Advocate v. Sweenie, (1858) 3 Irv. 109; H. M. Advocate v. M'Ewan or Palmer, (1862) 4 Irv. 227; H. M. Advocate v. Thomson, (1872) 2 Coup. 346.

[3] H. M. Advocate v. Henderson, (1888) 2 White, 157; Hastie v. Macdonald, (1894) 22 R. (J.) 18, 1 Adam, 505.

[4] (1897) 25 R. (J.) 25, 2 Adam, 395.

to be construed strictly and literally. (4) Moreover, the prosecutor by withdrawing the charge of attempt to ravish had by that step rendered it impossible for the jury to return a verdict of guilty of the statutory offence. In the first place, the charge of attempt to ravish being the only subsisting charge against the accused, and the only charge before the jury, its withdrawal automatically involved the abandonment of the whole proceedings, in respect that there was nothing left upon which any subsequent procedure could hang. In the second place, the words of section 9 contained a clear proviso that it was only after the jury had acquitted the accused upon the original charge that they could proceed to find him guilty of the statutory charge. Section 9 imposed upon the jury a clear duty of pronouncing a verdict upon the original charge, and the prosecutor, by withdrawing that charge, had rendered the performance of that duty impossible. Where a person desired to take advantage of statutory procedure he must do so exactly in the method prescribed by the statute.[1] (5) In any event, the conviction could not stand in respect that it found that the accused had contravened section 5 of the Act, but did not specify which of the offences constituted by that section the accused had committed.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The complaint was relevant at common law. The cases cited by the complainer undoubtedly established the proposition that the crime of rape could not be perpetrated upon a woman while asleep, and if this had been a charge of rape, the complaint would have been irrelevant. But the charge was one of attempt only, and although the crime could not be completed unless the woman was awake, the attempt might be initiated while she was asleep. (2) The words "or of an attempt to commit the same" occurring in section 9 were equivalent to a provision that an indictment for rape included and covered an indictment for attempted rape, and a similar provision with regard to all indictable crimes was subsequently introduced by section 61 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.[3] That being so, it followed that the power to convict of minor offences on an indictment for rape was also available on an indictment for attempted rape. (3) The complainer had given too strict an interpretation to the statement that the prosecutor "withdrew" the charge. A charge could only be formally withdrawn by a signed minute, and there was nothing of that nature in the present proceedings. All that the prosecutor meant by the expression was that he did not propose to ask for a verdict upon the original charge. (4) The conviction was undoubtedly open to the objection as to its form stated by the complainer, and could not be defended.

Lord Justice-General.—I am of opinion that this conviction cannot stand. I shall state shortly the grounds on which I reach this conclusion. The complainer was charged with the crime of attempting to ravish a girl of fifteen years of age. I proceed no further with the complaint because I propose to offer no opinion whatever upon the relevancy of the indictment here. I assume for the purposes of this present judgment that the [1] Johnston v. Pettigrew, (1865) 3 Macph. 954.

[2] De Banzie v. Peebles, (1875) 2 R. (J.) 22, 3 Coup. 89.
[3] 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35.

Mar. 2, 1914.

Townsend v. H. M. Advocate.

Lord Justice-General.

complainer was relevantly indicted on a charge of an attempt to commit rape. The course the case took was as follows: At the conclusion of the evidence for the prosecution, the prosecutor, we are told, intimated to the Court that he withdrew the common law charge of attempt to ravish, and he thereupon proceeded to take advantage of the procedure prescribed and powers conferred by the 9th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885.

Three objections have been urged against the course which the public prosecutor thought fit to take. In the first place, it is said that in this complaint there is nothing but the common law charge of attempt to ravish, and no reference whatever is made to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, and no suggestion that any charge is to be preferred against the prisoner under that Act. I am of opinion that this objection is not well founded, and that the procedure,—novel and in some respects very foreign to the views of a Scottish criminal lawyer,—laid down under the section, is available where in the charge there is no reference whatever to the statute. If authority is needed for the proposition it is to be found in the judgment of Lord M'Laren in H. M. Advocate v. M'Laren,[1] in which I observe his Lordship says:—"Now, as a lawyer, I should have thought that where it was intended to charge an accused with this offence created by the statute, it would be a right thing to libel it expressly in the indictment, so as to give due notice to the accused that this statutory charge also was to be preferred against him. I say I should, as a lawyer, have expected this. But the question with which we have to deal is not what might have been or should have been, but what the Legislature has expressly enacted." And he then goes on to construe the terms of section 9, and comes to the conclusion—with which I entirely agree—that no construction of that section is possible other than the one his Lordship there put upon it, namely, that no reference to the section need be made in the libel. I am of opinion, therefore, that the first objection is not well founded.

The second objection is grave. It is that this is not an indictment charging the prisoner with the crime of rape, but with the crime of attempt to ravish, and, accordingly, that the procedure prescribed in the 9th section cannot be made available. I am of opinion that that objection is well founded for the reasons which Lord M'Laren has given in the opinion to which I have just referred. I think we must construe this clause strictly. I think we must follow closely the very words of the statute, and hold that the procedure therein prescribed is only available in the case where the prisoner is charged on an indictment for rape and not for some other offence, such as an attempt to ravish. It has been pointed out to us that, in 1885, it may have been, and probably was, possible to secure a conviction of an attempt to commit a crime where the crime alone was charged; but that could only be competent where the panel was charged on an indictment with the crime itself, e.g., rape. It seems to me that, although you have in section 9 the words "or of an attempt to commit the same," it is not permissible—where you are constru-

[1] 25 R. (J.) 25.

ing a section like this which, in effect, involves a departure from the rule of our criminal Court, that a prisoner must be given due and ample notice of what he is charged with,—to do anything more than give a literal construction to the section. On an indictment charging the prisoner not with rape, but only with an attempt to ravish, we cannot allow to be introduced a charge of a misdemeanour or of committing an offence against section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act.

But a third objection was urged against the procedure followed. It was this—that at the close of the evidence the prosecutor withdrew the charge, and that, having withdrawn the charge, it was impossible for him then to invoke the procedure under the clause to which I have referred. I am of opinion that that objection is well founded, for it appears to me that, under the plain terms of section 9, it is for the jury alone to decide whether the prisoner is guilty of the crime charged in the complaint or is only guilty of an offence under sections 3, 4, or 5 of the statute of 1885; and if the jury come to the conclusion, in considering the whole evidence in the case,—the charge being still before them,—that the prisoner is not guilty of the crime charged, but is guilty of an offence under other sections of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, they are entitled so to find. But in so finding the statute expressly provides that they are to acquit the prisoner of the charge against him and find him guilty of the offence of which they think him guilty under the statute of 1885. Now, that is the province of the jury and the jury only, and in this case they seem to have had no opportunity afforded them of acquitting the prisoner of the charge preferred against him, but were simply told that they could, if they wished, find that he had committed an offence against one or other of these sections, although the charge against him was withdrawn. In this respect I think the prosecutor erred, and that the procedure under the clause in question could not, after the charge was withdrawn, be made available.

On these two grounds, separate and distinct, I come to the conclusion that this conviction cannot stand. But there is a further ground on which, I think, it cannot be disputed that the conviction is bad. It bears to be a conviction of the offence of having contravened the provisions of section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. Now, when we turn to that section, we find, as was very clearly pointed out by Mr Garson, that there are several offences described in the section of which he might have been guilty, and we are left entirely in the dark as to which of them the jury thought he had been guilty of. That, it seems to me, is a fatal defect and sufficient in itself to warrant us in suspending the conviction.

Lord Ormidale.—I entirely concur in the opinion which your Lordship has delivered.

With regard to the objection which your Lordship dealt with in the second place, I agree with all that your Lordship has said. The power conferred by section 9 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, to convict of an offence under sections 3, 4, or 5 of that Act, or of an indecent assault, is conferred only where the panel is charged on an indictment for rape or any offences made felony by section 4. An attempt to ravish is not made felony by section 4. Now, it is true that the section contains the words "or of an attempt to commit the same," which indicate that the accused may be found guilty of an attempt to commit a rape under an indictment which charges him with the completed crime. But the presence of these words where they occur in the section does not in my opinion justify us in reading the section as though it had commenced,—"If upon the trial of any indictment for rape or attempted rape or any offence or attempted offence," and unless the section is so read it appears to me that the contention of the Crown must fail. The section, it must be remembered, has a novel and far-reaching effect, and involves a departure, a grave departure, from a salutary rule of our criminal law that a prisoner must have the amplest notice of the particular offence and of all the offences with which he is charged. That being so, the section must be construed strictly, and so construed it seems to me that, where an indictment charges the prisoner not with rape, but only with an attempt to ravish, it is not permissible to substitute a charge or a right to convict of an offence under section 5 of the Act, or of an indecent assault.

Mar. 2, 1914.

Townsend v. H. M. Advocate.

Ld. Ormidale.

On the last point dealt with by your Lordship I also agree. According to the record of the proceedings the prosecutor asked for a verdict of a contravention of section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, and the jury found "the panel guilty of a contravention of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, section 5." But section 5 deals with two separate crimes, one by subsection 1, and the other by subsection 2, and we accordingly are left in complete ignorance of what was the crime of which the prosecutor asked a conviction, and what was the crime of which the jury found the prisoner guilty.

Lord Anderson.—I agree. It is regrettable that the result of our judgment will be that the complainer will be liberated, because, undoubtedly, he has committed a serious offence; but it seems to me that, in view of the argument that has been submitted to us on his behalf, we have no option save to grant the prayer of the bill.

The first point the complainer took had reference to the form of the charge as it is laid at common law. I agree with your Lordship that it is not necessary for us to determine whether or not that is a relevant charge at common law. But, when we come to the points which were made on the 9th section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, it seems to me that the complainer presented a formidable case, and raised an important question for our decision under that section.

It must be kept in mind that it is a fundamental and salutary rule of our criminal procedure that fair notice should be given by the prosecutor to the accused of the offence or offences which are to be proved against him. The 9th section of the Act of 1885 sanctions a deviation from or exception to that general and fundamental rule, and when we are dealing with a deviation from well-established practice it is our duty to construe strictly the statutory provision which authorises that deviation. When I look at section 9, I find that the only condition under which the Crown is authorised to crave a verdict under the provisions of the section is where the Crown is conducting a prosecution under an indictment for rape, or for any offences made felonies by section 4 of the Act, among which attempt to ravish does not appear.

The two points which the complainer took under this section were these: he said, first of all, this is not an indictment for rape but an indictment for an attempt to ravish, and, therefore, it cannot form the foundation for a conviction of an offence under sections 3, 4, or 5 of the Act of 1885, in respect that, firstly, no notice was given in the indictment that such an offence was charged, and secondly, the statutory provision in section 9 which allows a conviction of a minor offence is only applicable on an indictment for rape or an offence made felony by section 4 and not on an indictment libelling merely an attempt to ravish. I am of opinion that the latter proposition is well founded. If the section is looked at, it will be seen that the jury may take the alternative course if they "are not satisfied that the defendant is guilty of the felony charged in such indictment." Accordingly, the exception is allowed where an indictment has been presented charging a felony. Now, undoubtedly, rape is a felony at common law, although we do not use that term in Scotland. In the first part of section 4 of the 1885 Act it is declared to be a felony. An attempt is made in the application clause to reduce the expressions "felony" and "misdemeanour" to terms of Scots law because, when that application clause is looked at, I find that in Scotland "The expression misdemeanour shall mean a crime and offence," and "The expression felony shall mean a high crime and offence." Well, there is no warrant under the common law of Scotland for such a division of crimes as is suggested in that interpretation clause. But I find in section 9 that indecent assault is described as a misdemeanour, and my view is that attempt to ravish is just a species of crime which may be brought under that heading of indecent assault. Accordingly, if I am right in that view, this is not an indictment for a felony but for a misdemeanour; and that seems to confirm the view I expressed that section 9 meant to limit this power of deviating from the general rule, viz., that a prisoner must obtain full notice of the crimes with which he is charged, to cases where the prosecution is one for rape or for one of the felonies referred to in section 4 of the Act.

The second point upon this section which the complainer took was that the prosecutor had not followed the procedure figured by the section. What the section contemplates is that the accused is to be acquitted of the common law charge, and that thereafter the jury may convict of an offence under one of the sections. But, according to the record which is before us, there was no charge before the jury upon which they could convict, because, before they were asked by the prosecutor to return a verdict under the Act of 1885, he had withdrawn from them altogether the charge as laid at common law. Accordingly, it seems to me that, on the second point also, the complainer's argument is well founded.

The other matter to which we were referred—and on which I agree with your Lordship that the complainer should also succeed—is on the verdict the jury were asked to return under the statute of 1885. One finds from the record of the proceedings that the prosecutor asked them to return a verdict of a contravention of section 5 of the Act of 1885, and it is recorded that they unanimously did so, and, accordingly, the accused was found by the jury to have contravened section 5 of the Act of 1885. Now, as has been pointed out, that section consists of two subsections, and each subsection deals with a different offence. It is a fundamental rule that a man whose liberty is at stake should know both what he is being tried for and of what he is being convicted, and it seems to me that, as the accused was given no definite information on either of these points, he is entitled to succeed on this ground also.

Mar. 2, 1914.

Townsend v. H. M. Advocate.

Ld. Anderson.

Therefore, on the whole matter, I agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

W. A. FARQUHARSON, S.S.C.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

No. 13.

Mar. 2, 1914.

Earl of Galloway v. Birrell.

THE RIGHT HON. RANDOLPH HENRY STEWART, EARL OF GALLOWAY, Appellant.—Constable, K.C.—Burns.
ADAM BIRRELL, Respondent.—J. G. Jameson.

Statutory Offences—Salmon-fishing—Weekly close time—Failure to open stake-nets—Net out of water at ebb tide—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), secs. 6 and 7—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), sec. 24, and Schedule D, Bye-law 1.

Held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the bye-law of the Commissioners under the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Acts, 1862 and 1868, made "with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time," and enacting that a clear opening shall be made "and kept free from obstruction" in the pouches of every stake-net, had not been contravened by the owner of a stake-net placed in situ for fishing in a tidal river, who had closed the pouches of his net during the last 3½ hours of the weekly close time, in respect that during the whole of these 3½ hours the net had been on dry land owing to the ebb of the tide.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Ormidale. Ld. Anderson.

ADAM BIRRELL, salmon fisher, Carsluith, Kirkmabreck, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Dumfries and Galloway at Kirkcudbright on a complaint at the instance of the Right Honourable Randolph Henry Stewart, Earl of Galloway and Baron Stewart of Garlies, which set forth "that you did during the time from 6 P.M. of Saturday 12th July 1913, to 6 A.M. of Monday 14th July 1913, or during a part of the said time, being, during, or within the weekly close time for the district of the River Cree, at the stake-net fishings in the River Cree near to where the Money Pool Burn enters the said river opposite the lands of Cassencary, in the parish of Kirkmabreck, and stewartry of Kirkcudbright, the property of James Alexander Henryson Caird, and within the said district of the River Cree, of which fishings you are occupier, omit to have a clear opening of at least 4 feet in width from top to bottom, made and kept free from obstruction in each and every pouch, trap, or chamber of the stake-net placed at the locus before libelled, contrary to the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 7; the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, section 24; and Bye-law, Schedule D, section 1, annexed to the said last-mentioned Act,* whereby you

* The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 97), enacts:—

Sec. 6. "The Commissioners shall have the powers and perform the are liable to the forfeiture and penalties set forth in said section 24 of said Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, to pay the expenses of prosecution, and failing payment of said penalty and expenses to imprisonment in terms of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, section 48."

The Sheriff-substitute (Napier) having found the accused not guilty, the complainer obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth, inter alia:—

"I found the following facts proved:—

"The appellant is the proprietor of certain fishing rights in the upper part of the River Cree. The respondent is tacksman and occupier of certain fishings, including the one referred to in the complaint, in the lower reaches of the Cree.

"Early on the morning of Monday 14th July, at least several hours before 6 o'clock A.M., but after the visit of Alexander Heron hereinafter referred to, certain persons in the employment of the appellant visited the stake-net in question. It has three pouches, and the doors or traps of these pouches were all found to be closed. The pouches of the net had thus not a clear opening of at least four feet in width from top to bottom made and kept free from obstruction as prescribed by Bye-law, Schedule D, of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868. The Cree for several miles above where the Money Pool Burn enters it is tidal. When the visit just mentioned was made it was low tide and the foreshore on which the net rested was in consequence not covered by water. On the evening of Sunday, 13th July, it was high tide at Newton-Stewart about 8.31 P.M. The net in question at Money Pool Burn is on dry ground duties hereinafter specified, that is to say . . . (6) to make general regulations with respect to the following matters, viz., The due observance of the weekly close time."

---

Sec. 7. ". . . the weekly close time, except for rod and line, shall continue from the hour of six of the clock on Saturday night to the hour of six of the clock on Monday morning."

The Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 123), enacts:—

Sec. 24. "The proprietor, or when let, the occupier, of every fishery at which . . . stake-nets . . . are used, shall in regard to such nets do all acts required by any bye-law in force within the district in which such fishery is situated for the due observance of the weekly close time," and if he omits to do any such act "(1) He shall forfeit the net. . . . (2) He shall for each weekly close time during any part of which such omission has occurred," pay a fine for each offending net, and a further sum for each salmon taken.

The bye-law relating to the weekly close time in Schedule D to the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, which bye-law is made applicable to the River Cree, enacts:—

"We, the Commissioners appointed under the said Acts and empowered thereby 'to make general regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time,' do hereby make the following regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time in the said district, namely:—

1. That in each and every stake weir or stake net a clear opening of at least 4 feet in width from top to bottom shall be made and kept free from obstruction in each and every pouch, trap, or chamber of same."

Mar. 2, 1914.

Earl of Galloway v. Birrell.

after 6 hours ebb. It was thus on dry ground about 2.30 A.M. on Monday, 14th July. The ebb continues for about three hours more, and when the flow tide begins it takes about 1½ hours before it reaches Money Pool Burn. That is the locus in question would be covered with water about 4½ hours after the net became dry, namely, about 7 A.M. on the Monday morning. The locus was thus dry at 6 A.M. on that morning.

"The respondent, who has been a salmon fisherman in the Cree for fully twenty years, acts on the view that the bye-law only applies to nets which are in water and can catch fish. Accordingly what he did was this—his servant, Alexander Heron, on Saturday, 12th July, opened the doors or traps of the pouches for the statutory four feet in width from top to bottom for his own convenience, several hours before 6 P.M. on that day. They remained open until about 2.30 A.M. on Monday the 14th, when Heron shut them. He did this also for his own convenience in order that he might attend to other nets lower down the river. At this time, as just mentioned, they were lying on the foreshore uncovered with water. . . .

"I held that the weekly close time applies to water only and not to land. And as the pouches of the net were open during the whole of the weekly close time during which the ground on which it rested was covered with water, I found the respondent not guilty."

The questions submitted for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Is it an offence against the Salmon Fisheries Acts to close the traps or doors of pouches in stake-nets in a tidal river during that part of the weekly close time when, owing to the tide being out, the nets are resting on dry ground which will not be covered with water until after the close time has ceased? (2) Ought the respondent to have been convicted?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 12th February 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute ought to have convicted. The decisions relating to the weekly close time under the Salmon Fisheries Acts showed that the Acts were to be strictly construed, and that nothing short of damnum fatale or vis major would excuse a failure to comply literally with their provisions where these were unambiguous, even although in individual instances such compliance might be productive of hardship.[1] The view of the Court had always been that anything short of a rigid compliance with the statutes and bye-laws would lead to an endless series of difficulties in the enforcement of the Acts. In the present case the language of the sections and of the bye-law libelled in the complaint were unambiguous, and prescribed that nets should be open during the whole close time. It was not to be forgotten that the bye-law was made by experts who knew the local conditions, and who could easily have introduced an exception in the case of nets which could not catch fish because they were on dry land. The Sheriff-substitute's decision, if sustained, would open the door to endless litigation, because the question would constantly arise

[1] Osborne v. Anderson, (1887) 15 R. (J.) 12, 1 White, 497; Irving v. Phyn, (1891) 19 R. (J.) 7, 3 White, 46; MacRorie v. Forman, (1905) 8 F. (J.) 23, 4 Adam, 682; Middleton v. Tough, 1908 S. C. (J.) 32, 5 Adam, 485, overruling Middleton v. Paterson, (1904) 6 F. (J.) 27, 4 Adam, 321.

whether the particular net under consideration was or was not capable of catching salmon owing to depth and condition of the water. For the simple question "Was the net open?" there would be substituted the difficult question, "Was the net, although shut, incapable of catching fish?" Had the case fallen to be dealt with under the earlier Acts there would certainly have been a contravention, the prohibition of fixed machinery having been held to extend to land uncovered at ebb tide.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff-substitute was right. The object of the statutes and bye-law was to secure for the fish a free run from 6 P.M. on Saturday until 6 A.M. on Monday, and the respondent had in no way interfered with that object. Mr Bell in his Principles[2] defined the close time as the time "fixed by statute within which no person shall take any salmon . . . from any river," and the statutory close time, as thus defined, could not be interfered with by shutting the pouches at a time when no fish could by any possibility be taken. The appellant read the bye-law as though it were an express and explicit enactment that the net was to be kept open during the whole thirty-six hours of close time. But in fact the bye-law made no reference to duration of time, and it was more natural and more reasonable to supply, instead of the words which were necessary for the appellant's reading, the words "during the time that the net is in the water." That interpretation was all that was required to secure the object of the Commissioners, as set forth in the preamble to the bye-laws, viz., "the due observance of the weekly close time." Moreover, the words in the bye-law "free from obstruction" were only appropriate to a net situated in the water. It was out of the question to find a person guilty of an offence of a criminal nature when he had done nothing which could injure anyone or could in any way be described as a wrong. The appellant's reading of the law led to the absurd result that a fisherman who set up his stake-nets on the beach to dry would have to go round and open the pouches if the nets happened to be drying during the hours of the weekly close time.

At advising on 2nd March 1914,—

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—The respondent is the occupier of certain fishings on the lower reaches of the Cree, and he was charged before the Sheriff-substitute at Kirkcudbright with a contravention of section 7 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 24 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, and the bye-law enacted in section 1 of Schedule D to the last-mentioned Act. The offence charged against him was that, during the weekly close time in the district, he failed to keep an opening four feet wide from top to bottom in every pouch of the stake-net placed at the locus libelled.

Now, the weekly close time during which it is alleged the offence was committed extended from Saturday evening at 6 P.M. of 12th July to Monday morning, 14th July, at 6 A.M., and it is proved and found in the special case that, from half-past two on Monday morning, 14th July, until six the same morning, the pouches of the respondent's net were kept [1] Bell's Prin., secs. 1113-1118. [2] Sec. 1114.

Mar. 2, 1914.

Earl of Galloway v. Birrell.

Lord Justice-General.

closed; but that, during that time, the net was on dry land—the foreshore was uncovered by water.

Under those circumstances, the Sheriff-substitute found that the contravention charged had not been committed, and that the respondent was not guilty. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was right in so holding. The object of the weekly close time is to secure a free run for the fish during thirty-six continuous hours in each week; not during the thirty-six hours which may prove most convenient for the fisherman, but during the thirty-six hours prescribed by the statute. It is now well-settled law that literal and exact compliance with the statutory enactment is required, and that nothing save vis major will excuse the fisherman from strict compliance with the provisions of the statutes. But I cannot see—the object of the bye-law being to secure due observance of the weekly close time—that this object is secured by keeping the pouches open during the period when the net is lying on dry land, or that this object is defeated by keeping the pouches closed while the net is on dry land. It appears to me that, if the net is incapable of catching fish at the time, you do not secure the observance or make likely the defeat of the statutory provision by having the pouches either open or closed.

When I turn to the bye-law which is said to have been infringed, I find that it is silent with regard to the period during which the pouches are to be kept open and free from obstruction. The appellant in this case contends that the ellipsis should be supplied by adding the words "during the whole thirty-six hours." The respondent, on the other hand, maintains that the appropriate way to read the bye-law is to say that the pouches are to be kept open and free from obstruction during the time when the net is in water. I prefer, on the whole, the latter construction, because it is not necessary, to secure the observance of the bye-law, that the pouches should be kept open when the net is on dry land, and it will not defeat the purpose of the bye-law if the pouches of the net are kept closed while the net is upon the dry land.

I observe that Mr Bell[1] describes—I will not say defines—the close time as the time "fixed by statute within which no person shall take any salmon or fish of the salmon kind from any river, stream, estuary, or sea-coast in Scotland," and if that be, as I think it is, a correct description of the statutory close time, then it appears to me it cannot be defeated by closing the pouches of the net at a time when by no possibility could fish be taken. I am fortified in that construction of the bye-law by the words which I find therein to the effect that the net must be kept free from obstruction, and it appears to me that it would be very hard and unreasonable to say that a violation of the statute was committed by having the pouches of the net closed at a time when there could, by no possibility, be anything to obstruct.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute reached a sound conclusion, and that we ought to answer the two questions put to us in the negative.

---

[1] Prin., sec. 1114.

LORD ORMIDALE.—[After quoting the sections of the statutes and the bye-law printed in the footnote, supra, pp. 92-3]—The respondent in the present appeal was charged on a complaint with having contravened the bye-law which I have recited by having omitted to have the required opening in one of the stake nets used by him at a fishing of which he was the occupier during the weekly close time between 6 P.M. on Saturday, 12th July, and 6 A.M. on Monday, 14th July, 1913. It appears from the facts stated in the case that the respondent is the occupier of certain stake-net fishings within the district of the River Cree; that about 2.30 A.M. on the morning of Monday, 14th July, he shut the doors or traps of a stake-net which he had opened several hours before 6 P.M. on the preceding Saturday; that the Cree is for several miles above the net in question tidal; that the water having ebbed, the net was at 2.30 A.M. on dry ground; that the ground did not become covered by the flowing tide until 7 A.M., and was therefore dry between 2.30 A.M. and 6 A.M.

The Sheriff-substitute found the accused not guilty, and the questions submitted for the opinion of this Court are—[His Lordship read the questions]. In my opinion both these questions should be answered in the affirmative.

It seems to me that it cannot be disputed that the letter of the bye-law was contravened. But it is said that, looking to the object which the weekly close time is intended to effect, viz., a free run for salmon, that object was to no possible extent defeated or interfered with by the traps of the net in question being closed at 2.30 A.M., for between that hour and 6 A.M. the net was on dry ground. It was immaterial therefore whether the traps were open or shut.

I admit that there is great force in that contention, and I make the admission all the more readily because your Lordship and Lord Anderson are prepared to give effect to it. But after all what we have to do is to construe the bye-law. It is expressed in perfectly clear and explicit language—and, in precise and definite terms as I read it, imposes upon the user of a stake-net the positive duty of making in such stake-net and keeping free from obstruction an opening of certain dimensions during a certain period of time ascertained by statute, viz., thirty-six hours. In the opinion of the Commissioners that was a regulation calculated and fitted to promote the due observance of the close time in the district of the River Cree, which of course they knew to be a tidal water. The propriety of introducing an exemption from the performance of the duty imposed by the bye-law in respect of the special circumstances affecting a stake-net in tidal waters was a perfectly relevant topic for the consideration of the Commissioners, and it is not to be assumed that they did not consider it. If they had been of the opinion that to do so would not be likely to interfere with the due observance of the close time, they might quite well have added to the bye-law some such words as these—"Excepting only when the ground on which the stake-net is situated is uncovered by water." But they have not done so. It is not said the bye-law is ultra vires. Accordingly, there being nothing in the language of the bye-law itself to suggest any limitation of time, it appears to me to follow that the period of its application or operation was intended to be concurrent and coincident with the duration of the statutory weekly close time, viz., from 6 P.M. on Saturday to 6 A.M. on Monday. The respondent therefore having closed the opening in his net at 2.30 A.M. on the Monday in question omitted to do an act required by the bye-law, viz., to make an opening and keep it free from obstruction until 6 A.M. If for a perfectly clear, albeit a hard and fast regulation that for thirty-six hours a stake-net was to be open, was substituted a rule whose application was to depend upon and to be tested only by the physical possibility of a fish running through the net—and that is in effect the construction which the respondent asks us to put upon the bye law—it appears to me that it would be practically unworkable.

Mar. 2, 1914.

Earl of Galloway v. Birrell.

Ld. Ormidale.

I may add that in my judgment there is little force in the argument that it would be a hardship on fishermen to give literal effect to the bye-law. So far as is disclosed by the facts stated in the present case there would have been no difficulty at all in complying with its express terms.

On the whole matter, as I have already stated, the questions submitted to the Court should, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative.

LORD ANDERSON.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. It is to be noted that this is a private prosecution, the appellant having a statutory title to prosecute in virtue of section 28 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1862, and section 30 of the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868. Apart from this statutory title, it seems to me that, in the circumstances stated by the Sheriff-substitute, the appellant could not have instructed an interest to institute a private prosecution against the respondent, inasmuch as he could not have averred or proved that the respondent had done anything whereby the appellant had been damnified. The bearing of this observation on the questions we have to answer is this: that there is no substance in the charge made against the respondent. He has done nothing which, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, may be said to be a wrong. He has been guilty of no act involving the essential criminal element of dole, and the necessary basis of a prosecution seems therefore to be lacking.

It is maintained that the respondent has been guilty of a technical infraction of the bye-law—literally construed. But if the consequence of a literal interpretation of the bye-law is to subject the respondent to prosecution for an act in which there is, in effect, no wrongdoing, I think the duty of the Court is to interpret the bye-law in such a way as to obviate this result. The bye-law ought to receive such a rational and reasonable construction as will avoid what appears to me to be the absurd consequence of making it applicable to the circumstances set forth in the Sheriff-substitute's findings. In order to arrive at this rational interpretation, it seems to me that the purpose for which the bye-law was passed must be kept in view. That purpose is distinctly set forth both in the statutes and in the bye-law. In the Act of 1862, section 6, the Commissioners are empowered (subsection 6) to make general regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time. Reference was made by the appellant's counsel to section 24 of the Act of 1868, but it is to be noted that that section enjoins obedience to bye-laws which are in force within the district "for the due observance of the weekly close time." The bye-law with which this case is concerned was passed by the Commissioners in 1868, and is to be found, with two other bye-laws relating to the weekly close time, in Schedule D to the Act of 1868. The preamble to these bye-laws bears that the Commissioners "make the following regulations with respect to the due observance of the weekly close time." The object of providing a weekly close time was to give fish a free run of thirty-six hours every week, and the purpose of the bye-laws was to ensure that no obstructions should be present to prevent the fish having this free run. On the facts found by the Sheriff-substitute it is obvious that nets on dry land could not affect the fish one way or the other, or have any influence on the due observance of the weekly close time. It is clear, therefore, that the bye-law in question, rationally read, applies to nets in water, and that this qualification of the exact terms of the bye-law must be read into it. This construction seems to obtain justification from a consideration of the terms of the two other bye-laws contained in Schedule D to the 1868 Act, which deal with other kinds of nets than stake-nets.

It was suggested that the present case was of the nature of a test case, but I think it should be clearly understood that we are deciding the present question on the special facts set forth in the stated case, and are determining nothing more than that the bye-law does not apply to nets on dry land.

I therefore agree that the questions should be answered in the manner suggested by your Lordship.

THE COURT answered the questions in the negative and dismissed the appeal.

COWAN & STEWART, W.S.—SCOTT & GLOVER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 14.

Mar. 9, 1914.

Hilson v. Easson.

SYDNEY HILSON (Procurator-Fiscal of Roxburghshire), Appellant. —Gillon, A.-D.

WILLIAM J. W. EASSON, Respondent.—A. M. Mackay.

Procedure—Pleas in bar of trial—Tholed assize—English sentence on plea of guilty to Scottish offence not yet the subject of complaint or indictment.

A person, charged in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh with obtaining goods on false pretences from a merchant in Jedburgh by means of postal communications from Newcastle-on-Tyne, objected that he had already tholed an assize with respect to the charge. It was proved that he had been convicted of a similar offence by the Court of Quarter Sessions at Wakefield in Yorkshire, and had then pleaded guilty to the Jedburgh offence, in connection with which there was a warrant out for his apprehension but no formal charge had been made against him; and that the Court in passing sentence took the Jedburgh offence into consideration, in accordance, as alleged, with an English practice by which the Court, in sentencing a prisoner, can take into account all outstanding offences of a similar nature to which the prisoner pleads guilty.

Held that the objection fell to be repelled, in respect that the proceedings at Wakefield were lacking in all the essentials of a trial of the accused for the Jedburgh offence, there being neither formal charge nor prosecutor, and the Court having no jurisdiction to try the offence.

Mar. 9, 1914.

Hilson v. Easson.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Ld. Ormidale. Ld. Anderson.

WILLIAM J. W. EASSON was charged in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh on a complaint at the instance of Sydney Hilson, Procurator-fiscal of Roxburghshire, which set forth "that, on 2nd July 1913, you did send by post from Newcastle-on-Tyne to Andrew Yellowlees, wood merchant, Jedburgh, a post-card, dated 30th June 1913, addressed to Andrew Yellowlees & Sons, wood merchants, Jedburgh, pretending that you were a firm of wood and general merchants carrying on business at 42a Clayton Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, under the firm name of 'Mooney & Connick,' requesting them to quote you as Mooney & Connick a price for 2000 hard-wood chocks, 22″ × 5″ × 5″, which quotation when received was accepted by you, and you did thus induce said firm of Andrew Yellowlees to send you chocks value £31, 6s. 3d., which you received through the Ashington Coal Company, Limited, Ashington, and appropriated without paying or intending to pay therefor."

On the complaint being called in Court, on 5th January 1914, the accused's agent objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground that the accused had already tholed an assize, and the case was adjourned that evidence might be produced on this point.

On 8th January 1914 the Sheriff-substitute (Baillie), after a proof on this point, sustained the objection, and dismissed the complaint.

The Procurator-fiscal obtained a stated case for appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth, inter alia:—

"At the adjourned diet on that date [8th January 1914] the following witnesses were examined in support of said objection:—Edward Fletcher Maude, solicitor, Leeds, and Christina S. Graham Easson, 4 Bilton Grove, Harrogate, a sister of the accused. Edward Fletcher Maude acted as solicitor for the accused at his trial before the Quarter Sessions held at Wakefield for the West Riding of the county of York on 13th October 1913, with reference to a charge against him of having obtained 'by means of false pretences from one William Henry Featherstone, 2000 stakes and 1125 bundles of pea-sticks of the goods and chattels of Ralph Creyke with intent thereby to defraud,' and as such had instructed counsel to appear on his behalf and defend him in respect of said charge. He also gave evidence before me as to procedure in which by the law of England, after conviction, other crimes or offences of a like nature are dealt with, along with the principal charge then before the Court, where the accused signifies his intention to plead guilty to such further crimes or offences; also as to what actually occurred in the said Court at Wakefield, and the manner in which the offence charged in the complaint now under review was brought under the cognizance of that Court. He also gave evidence that according to the law of England the magistrates had jurisdiction to take cognizance of the said charge, in connection with which a warrant for the arrest of the respondent emanating from the Sheriff Court of Roxburghshire was produced. In support of both the above propositions he cited the authorities mentioned below. Further, he produced and spoke to an extract conviction against the respondent from said Court of Quarter Sessions at Wakefield, with note * annexed thereto, and a certified copy of part of the steno-

* The note was in the following terms:—"NOTE.—Before sentence prisoner admitted committing an offence at Jedburgh for which a war-graphic report in said trial at Wakefield which narrates the circumstances under which, after the verdict had been pronounced, the Jedburgh warrant of apprehension was produced to the said Court, and read over to the accused, and the accused had pled guilty to it.* The said Christina S. Graham Easson gave evidence as to being present in said Court at Wakefield, and as to the production of and the manner in which the Jedburgh offence was brought under the cognizance of the Court.

"The evidence of these witnesses was objected to by the appellant on the ground that they were biased parties. This objection I rant had been issued, and the Court took this further offence into consideration in fixing his punishment."

---

* The following is an excerpt from the report:—

"Mr Mellor (counsel for defence).—I understand there are two charges or warrants for transactions arising out of this same matter that has now been before the jury—this offence of not carrying on a legitimate business. The jury, after listening patiently to the case, have found that in their opinion he did not carry on a legitimate business. I have advised him with reference to these matters outstanding to plead guilty in this sense; that he bows to the decision of the jury. The jury have found that he represented he carried on a legitimate business, when he did not. There is a beneficent rule that every matter should be taken into consideration. I believe there are two other matters, one amounting to £10 and another amounting to something of the same sort. Is there one warrant or two?

"A Police Superintendent.—One.

"Mr Mellor.—I have no doubt it is a similar transaction. He pleads guilty to that, and whatever punishment you inflict he will come out clear. (Mr Mellor then pleaded for leniency on account of prisoner's ill-health.)

"Mr Hallett (counsel for prosecution).—I have no instructions to oppose that, but I must point out that in order that any charge should be taken into account in the way my friend has referred to, it is necessary that both the parties to that charge should consent to its being so dealt with.

"The Clerk.—No. If the prisoner elects to plead guilty to this, we can deal with it.

"Mr Hallett.—I was merely saying we had no request. The warrant is from Scotland and not from England. I do not know whether it makes any difference.

"The Clerk (addressing prisoner).—It is charged against you or rather there is a warrant against you for an offence at Jedburgh for obtaining goods. Do you wish to plead guilty to that, and have it taken into account in this trial?

"The Prisoner.—Yes.

"The Clerk.—You plead guilty to it?

"The Prisoner.—Yes.

"Mr Yarborough (who had returned from first Court and taken charge of his brief).—I understand the charge comes from Scotland.

"Mr Mellor.—How much more do you want? We have had it twice. If the Scotch Courts do not follow, it is a matter for them.

"THE SENTENCE.

"The Chairman.—We have carefully considered all that has been placed before us, and considered the excuses you have made for one thing and another. We have taken into consideration—we shall deal with these other two cases in passing sentence upon you. The sentence of the Court is that you be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for three calendar months."

Mar. 9, 1914.

Hilson v. Easson.

repelled. I held, on the evidence of these witnesses, and the extract conviction, that after conviction for the offence at Wakefield, which may be called the Wakefield offence, and before sentence, it was brought to the notice of the magistrates that there was a warrant for the arrest of the accused emanating from the Roxburghshire Sheriff Court with reference to the offence for which the accused was brought before me for trial, and which may be called the Jedburgh offence; that accused pled guilty to this offence, and that there was no formal objection to this course on the part of the prosecuting counsel; that the magistrates thereupon took into consideration the Jedburgh offence in fixing his punishment, and passed sentence of three months' imprisonment.

"I held it proved that this Jedburgh offence was one which could have been tried on a formal complaint either by the Newcastle-on-Tyne magistrates or in the Sheriff Court of Roxburghshire—(Ellis, [1889] 1 Q. B. 230); and I held it further proved that in England it is the duty, if called upon, of the Judge when passing sentence to take into consideration all other offences of a similar nature for which warrants from other English Courts are in existence and to which the accused pleads guilty; and further, that after such sentence has been passed, such other offences having been duly taken into consideration, it is incompetent to bring the accused for trial on these other offences—(Greig, (1910) 4 Cr. App. R. 151; Higson, (1910) 5 Cr. App. R. 167; Maclean, (1910) 6 Cr. App. R. 26).

"I was of opinion that it would have been incompetent to have tried the accused in the Roxburghshire Court for the Jedburgh offence if he had been previously brought up on a formal complaint and tried in the Newcastle-on-Tyne Court for this offence, as the offence was one equally within the jurisdiction of the English Courts.

"I was further of opinion that in accordance with English procedure the course taken was equivalent to a formal trial for the Jedburgh offence, and that it must consequently be held that the accused had been duly tried for the offence, even though the warrant proceeded from a Court in Scotland instead of from an English Court. I therefore sustained the objection for the accused and dismissed the complaint."

The question of law was:—"Whether on the facts stated I was right in sustaining the objection and dismissing the complaint?"

The case was heard on 2nd March 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The accused had not tholed an assize on the charge in respect of which he was brought before the Sheriff-substitute at Jedburgh. Tholing an assize only occurred when the accused had stood his trial, and where the case had been brought to proof,[1] or where he had pleaded guilty in Court to a formal charge. Here the accused had been served with neither indictment nor complaint, and, even if he had been formally charged with the Jedburgh offence, there was no one present at Wakefield to prosecute; and, further, the Court at Wakefield would have had no jurisdiction to entertain the case. The practice in England of taking into consideration all other offences when passing sentence was not compulsory in cases in which the offences had been committed in different counties, but was a matter for arrangement between the parties, and required the consent of the prosecutor, which obviously could not have been given in the present case.[1]

[1] Hume on Crimes, vol. ii. 470; Macdonald's Criminal Law, 432.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff-substitute was right. The respondent had already been sentenced for this offence, and it was not consistent with either the principles or the practice of the law that he should be again put upon his trial. The definitions of tholing an assize in Macdonald's Criminal Law and in Hume on Crimes cited by the appellant were obviously not exhaustive, e.g., no mention was made of the case where the accused pleaded guilty. The true meaning of the doctrine was given in another passage by Hume,[2] where he said that a man was not to be twice put in jeopardy of his person on the same conclusion; and in England the doctrine had been described by a writer of authority as the general rule of the common law which forbids a man to be punished twice for the same offence.[3] There was no reason why the "tholing" should be confined to a "tholing" in Scotland; such an idea had been definitely negatived in Macgregor and Inglis.[4] The question, accordingly, came to be whether what had occurred at Wakefield would have rendered it impossible for the respondent to have been tried again in England for the same offence. The cases cited by the Sheriff clearly shewed that it would have been impossible; the theory of the English practice being that the prisoner was sentenced there and then for all the offences to which he pleaded guilty, and that when he came out of prison he started with a clean slate. The objection that the respondent had not been formally charged with the Jedburgh offence was merely technical, seeing that there was a formal warrant out against him for his apprehension. It was also to be noted that the accused might have been competently tried for this offence not only at Jedburgh, but also at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

At advising on 9th March 1914,—

Lord Justice-General.—The procedure in this case appears to me to be hopelessly deranged, and can only be put in gear again by a commencement being made de novo.

The accused was charged in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh, at the instance of the procurator-fiscal of Roxburghshire, with the crime of obtaining goods of the value of some £31 by false pretences from a certain firm of wood merchants in Jedburgh. It is not disputed that the complaint is relevant and that the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh was a Court of competent jurisdiction; but, when the complaint was called in Court on 5th January 1914, as the minutes of procedure bear, the accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint in respect that he had already tholed an assize, and the Sheriff-substitute adjourned the case to the 8th of January for the production of evidence thereupon. That plea was palpable nonsense; but, nevertheless, the Sheriff-substitute heard evidence in support of it on 8th January. The sister of the accused and his solicitor from England were examined, and certain productions were given in. The [1] Syres, (1908) 1 Cr. App. R. 172; M'Lean, (1910) 6 Cr. App. R. 26.

[2] Hume on Crimes, vol. ii. 465.
[3] Russell on Crimes and Misdemeanours, (7th ed.) vol. ii. 1981.
[4] (1848) Arkley, 49, at p. 60.

Mar. 9, 1914.

Hilson v. Esson.

Lord Justice-General.

evidence discloses that, on 13th October 1913, the accused had been charged before a Court of Quarter Sessions at Wakefield with the crime of obtaining goods under false pretences from English people on 5th April 1913. After trial he was found guilty by the jury, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour by the Court of Quarter Sessions. But a note appended to the extract conviction bears that, before sentence, the prisoner admitted committing an offence at Jedburgh for which a warrant had been issued, and the Court took this further offence into consideration in fixing his punishment. How all that came about is very clearly disclosed in a conversation which is set out in the appendix to the case, and of which I will read a portion :—[His Lordship read the extract from the shorthand-writer's report, printed in footnote, supra, p. 101].

It is difficult to take this procedure seriously. A more complete travesty of justice and orderly procedure I have never seen. But upon the evidence of what transpired at Wakefield the learned Sheriff-substitute expresses the opinion that the course taken was equivalent to a formal trial for the Jedburgh offence, and that it must consequently be held that the accused had been duly tried for the offence, even though the warrant proceeded from a Court in Scotland instead of from an English Court. I am exactly of the contrary opinion. How it could be said that what took place before the Court of Quarter Sessions at Wakefield is equivalent to a formal trial at Jedburgh for the offence charged in the complaint in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh at the instance of the procurator-fiscal it is very difficult to see. There was no trial at Wakefield, and there could be no trial at Wakefield; for there was no prosecutor at Wakefield, there was no accused at Wakefield, there was no complaint at Wakefield, and there was no Court of competent jurisdiction at Wakefield. There could, therefore, be no plea either of guilty or of not guilty. The procedure might just as well have taken place before the Town-council or the Chamber of Commerce for that matter. And, therefore, to speak of this man having "tholed an assize" was nothing more nor less, in my opinion, than downright nonsense.

Accordingly, I am very clearly of opinion that all the interlocutors which have been pronounced in the Sheriff Court must be recalled, for it is nothing to the purpose to say that no objections could have been taken if this man had been properly charged with this offence, as he might have been, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and if the complaint preferred against him at Newcastle-on-Tyne had been before the Court at Wakefield, and if the prosecutor at Newcastle-on-Tyne had given his consent to the prisoner's offence at Newcastle-on-Tyne being considered at Wakefield in pronouncing sentence there; for none of these things happened. Therefore, this case must go back to the Sheriff Court and be commenced anew. When the prisoner is brought before the Sheriff Court and, for the first time, pleads guilty to the complaint preferred against him, it will be for the Sheriff-substitute to hear both the accused and the procurator-fiscal upon the question of the appropriate punishment to be pronounced, and the Sheriff-substitute will then give such weight as he thinks proper to what happened before the Court of Quarter Sessions at Wakefield, and modify the punishment, or, possibly, inflict no punishment at all, according as he in his discretion thinks proper, for he is master, and he alone, of all procedure in his own Court.

I am of opinion, therefore, that we ought to answer the question put to us in the negative, and remit the case to the Sheriff Court.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The objection stated in the Sheriff Court, viz., that the accused had already tholed an assize is referred to in the proceedings as an objection to the relevancy of the complaint. That is an erroneous and misleading description of it. It is really a plea in bar of trial, and the question, and the only question, which we are asked to determine is whether the Sheriff-substitute was right in sustaining this objection of "tholed assize" and dismissing the complaint. In my opinion he was not.

One of the facts ascertained by the Sheriff is that according to the law and practice of England it is the duty, or at any rate it is within the competency, of a Judge, when passing sentence upon a prisoner who has been found guilty of a particular offence, to take into consideration all other offences of a similar nature for which warrants from other English Courts are in existence, and to which the prisoner pleads guilty. He has also found that, after such sentence has been pronounced, it is incompetent in England to bring the accused to trial for those other offences.

In the present case it appears that the accused was tried before the Quarter Sessions at Wakefield on 13th October 1913 for, and found guilty of, a particular offence, viz., obtaining goods under false pretences; that it was brought to the notice of the magistrates, before they passed sentence, that there was a warrant emanating from Jedburgh for the arrest of the accused in respect of an offence of a similar nature to that of which he had been found guilty; that the accused pleaded guilty of that offence; that the Magistrates thereupon took into consideration that offence in fixing his punishment, and passed sentence of three months' imprisoment.

I entirely differ from the learned Sheriff-substitute when he says "that the course so taken was equivalent to a formal trial for the offence to which the accused thus pleaded guilty." In my opinion, by pleading guilty of an offence merely referred to in a warrant to arrest, the accused did not thereby "thole an assize" in respect of that offence. He could not thole an assize in respect of an offence with the committal of which he had not yet been formally charged, for the essence of the plea is that the person tendering it has already been brought to trial by the prosecutor, and has then stood his trial for, or pleaded guilty of, a specific offence duly set out in an indictment or other competent form of complaint. In the present case the respondent could not possibly have been tried on the warrant to arrest, and certainly not by the magistrates at Wakefield. He chose to anticipate the probable course of justice, and to plead guilty of an offence indicated in the warrant of a Scots Court. But he could not have been found not guilty of it, and I cannot conceive an assize or trial in which the two alternatives of acquittal or conviction are not open. It is not indeed necessary that an accused person should have been actually sentenced in order to found the plea of tholed assize; it is enough that he has been found guilty, though owing to an error in subsequent procedure no sentence may have been passed upon him—Fraser.[1] But the accused must have been brought to trial. He must be able to show that he has been put by the prosecutor in jeopardy or peril of his life, liberty, or estate. Here, however, we are asked to sustain the plea of "tholed assize" when as a matter of fact it is tendered in the first and only trial to which the prisoner has been subjected.

Mar. 9, 1914.

Hilson v. Easson.

Ld. Ormidale.

No doubt a situation of some delicacy and perplexity has arisen because of a rule of procedure which is said to pertain in England but which is entirely foreign to the criminal practice in Scotland. We have not sufficient information before us to form a mature opinion as to its merits, but so far as its operation is disclosed in the present proceedings it appears to me to involve the risk, at least, of a miscarriage of justice. The rule was applied in the absence of the prosecutor, and without the magistrates being made fully aware of the nature of the offence as ultimately formulated in the complaint at Jedburgh. That clearly appears from the shorthand notes of what passed at Wakefield. At the same time it is certain that the admission of the prisoner that he had committed the offence for which a warrant for his arrest had been issued from Jedburgh was in fact taken into consideration by the magistrates in fixing the punishment, and I should not, for my part, consent to the case going back for trial in the Sheriff Court, if I thought that there was any risk of the respondent being truly twice punished for the same offence; but I am satisfied that there is no such risk. If and when it is ascertained by his own confession or after trial that the respondent is guilty of the offence set out in the complaint, the circumstances attending the prisoner's trial at Wakefield will fall to be considered by the Sheriff-substitute and he will in respect of them be quite entitled to find it unnecessary to pass any further sentence.

LORD ANDERSON.—I have had some difficulty in connection with this case. I have never had any real doubt that the Sheriff was wrong in sustaining the particular objection proponed, but at one stage of the discussion I was inclined to the view that the dismissal of the complaint might be justified on another ground. On consideration, however, I have reached the conclusion that the Sheriff was wrong in dismissing the complaint, and, accordingly, I agree with your Lordships that the question in its entirety should be answered in the negative.

The objection which the Sheriff sustained was that the complaint was irrelevant in respect that the accused had already tholed an assize, and the opinion formed by the Sheriff as to this point is expressed by him thus:—"I was further of opinion that in accordance with English procedure the course taken was equivalent to a formal trial for the Jedburgh offence, and that it must consequently be held that the accused had been duly tried for the offence, even though the warrant proceeded from a Court in Scotland instead of from an English Court." I am unable to agree with the views there stated.

In order that the plea of "tholed an assize" may be successfully maintained, there must have been a former trial, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, for the same offence. This obviously includes the case where the accused, in the former proceedings, has pleaded guilty and been sentenced. It is essential that, in the earlier proceedings, the accused has been charged with an offence, and that the charge has been formulated in a complaint or an indictment. It is not in accordance with our procedure to take a plea on a warrant to arrest, although that warrant may set forth all the particulars of the offence which are ordinarily set forth in a complaint or indictment. In the present case there was neither complaint nor indictment, and the primary essential to a successful plea of "tholed assize" was therefore lacking. Further, there was neither prosecutor nor accused in connection with the English proceedings relating to the Jedburgh offence. No one appeared at Wakefield with a mandate to proceed against the respondent for that offence, and he was not charged with having committed that crime. Nor was he, at Wakefield, before a Court competent to try him for that offence. He could have been tried at Newcastle, but the Wakefield bench of Quarter Sessions had no jurisdiction to conduct a trial of the accused on that charge. Every essential requisite for a proper and competent trial of the respondent seems therefore to have been absent from the proceedings at Wakefield, and accordingly there was no previous trial on which he could found. The objection that he had "tholed an assize" was therefore bad, and ought to have been repelled.

[1] (1852) 1 Irv. 66.

There is, however, another principle of jurisprudence which seems to apply—a principle which is recognised by our law and probably by the law of every other civilised community—to wit, that an accused person ought not to be punished twice for the same offence. The Sheriff was obviously anxious to give effect to this principle, but, in my judgment, he went the wrong way about ensuring its observance. What he should have done was to try the accused on the Scotch complaint, and, if conviction followed, to have dismissed him from the bar without penalty, in respect that he had already been adequately punished by the English Court for the offence charged.

The appellant is entitled to have the respondent tried for the Jedburgh offence in order that a proper conviction may be obtained for purposes of record. The respondent appears to be a dangerous criminal of the swindler type, and it is proper that his criminal record should be correctly kept for possible future use. I doubt if there is any record in England of the Jedburgh offence, and I am more than doubtful if what occurred there, assuming it has been recorded, could be used as evidence of an aggravation of a crime inferring dishonesty. The 63rd section of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887,[1] provides that what may be lawfully put in evidence as an aggravation of a crime inferring dishonesty is an extract of a previous conviction obtained in any part of the United Kingdom of such a crime. For the reasons I have mentioned I am of opinion that there has been no "conviction" of the Jedburgh offence, and the appellant is, in my judgment, entitled to obtain this conviction, if he can do so, for the purpose to which I have referred.

The result of our judgment will probably be this: the appellant, if he

[1] 50 and 51 Vict. cap. 35.

Mar. 9, 1914.

Hilson v. Easson.

Ld. Anderson.

thinks it necessary, having saved the point of procedure, to do anything further, will proceed against the respondent with a view to having him convicted of the Jedburgh offence. If a conviction is obtained, the Sheriff, after hearing the Procurator-fiscal on the point, will, if he remains of opinion that the respondent has already been adequately punished in England, in all likelihood dismiss him from the bar without further penalty. This is, of course, a matter entirely for the Sheriff, and I merely set forth what I surmise will be the sequel of these proceedings, in order to show the unlikelihood of any injustice being sustained by the respondent by reason of a double punishment being inflicted upon him for the same offence.

THE COURT answered the question in the negative and sustained the appeal.

SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—WINCHESTER & NICOLSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 15.

Mar. 17, 1914.

H. M. Advocate v. Ryan.

HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Morton, A.-D.
MARTIN RYAN, Panel.—I. Forsyth Grant.

Crime—Incest—Intercourse with brother's wife while brother alive—Act 1567, 1 Jas. VI. cap. 14.

Held, by a full bench, that sexual intercourse between a man and his brother's wife during his brother's lifetime is a crime by the law of Scotland.

HIGH COURT. (Full Bench.) Lord Justice-General. Lord Salvesen. Lord Skerrington. Lord Hunter. Ld. Anderson.

MARTIN RYAN was charged in the High Court at Glasgow on an indictment at the instance of the Lord Advocate, which set forth that on various dates in a house occupied by his brother, the accused had incestuous intercourse with his brother's wife, "contrary to the Act 1 James VI. cap. 14 and the 18th chapter of Leviticus therein referred to."*

The panel pleaded not guilty, and also objected to the relevancy of the indictment. At the second diet, at a Circuit Court at Glasgow held on 26th February 1914, Lord Skerrington, in respect of the importance and difficulty of the objections stated to the relevancy of the indictment, certified the case to the High Court of Justiciary at Edinburgh.

The case was heard in the High Court at Edinburgh, before a full bench, on 9th March 1914.

Argued for the panel;—The indictment was irrelevant, as it was not a crime by the law of Scotland for a man to have sexual intercourse with his brother's wife during his brother's lifetime. The question depended upon the 18th chapter of Leviticus, verse 16. That verse was merely a prohibition against polyandry,[1] just as

* The Act 1567, 1 Jas. VI. cap. 14, is quoted, supra (J.), p. 38.

Verse 16 of the 18th chapter of Leviticus (according to the authorised version of the Scriptures) is as follows:—"Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife; it is thy brother's nakedness."

[1] Reference was made to Westermarck's History of Human Marriage and to Robertson Smith's Kinship and Marriage, with the object of illustrating the prevalence of polyandry among the tribes surrounding the people of Israel.

verse 18, as had been recognised in the recent case of Solicitor-General v. A B,[1] was merely a prohibition against polygamy. Incest was impossible where the parties might at some future period be in a position to marry, and by the Jewish law a man was enjoined to marry his brother's widow,[2] so that it was clear that verse 16 could not refer to incest. Incest depended entirely upon propinquity, and the degree of propinquity in the present case was the same as that in Solicitor-General v. A B,[1] where it had been held that the parties had not committed incest. That case accordingly was an authority directly in favour of the panel, and he could not, consistently with that decision, be sent to trial. The old cases referred to in Hume[3] had been decided upon an erroneous view of the law.[4]

Argued for the Crown;—There was no ambiguity whatever about the 16th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus. It clearly prohibited sexual intercourse between persons in the relationship of those in the present case, and was obviously one of the series of verses referred to in the Act 1567, cap. 14. There was no room, with regard to verse 16, for the objections which had been successfully urged in the case of Solicitor-General v. A B[1] against the inclusion of verse 18 among the verses relating to incest. That case, therefore, did not in any way affect the present one. Hume, in dealing with the crime of incest, clearly included the relationship here in question.[5]

At advising, on 17th March 1914,—

Lord Justice-General.—In this case we are invited, not for the first time this session, to determine the true scope and meaning of the old Scots Act of Parliament of 1567, cap. 14. It is a highly penal statute and ought, we are all agreed, to receive the strictest interpretation. But, applying to it the most rigid canons of constructions, I am constrained to hold that this indictment is relevant, for the statute expressly provides that "Quhatsumeuer person or personis thay be that abusis thair body with sic personis in degre as Goddis Word hes expresslie forbiddin in ony tyme cuming, as is contenit in the xviij. cheptour of Leuiticus, salbe puneist to the death." To quote the words of Lord Deas, in the case of Fenton v. Livingstone[6]:—"All that the statute does is to enact the punishment of death for offences which the chapter expressly forbids. To whatever the chapter does not expressly forbid—whether it is an offence or not—the statute, in its terms, is inapplicable." I turn, therefore, to the 18th chapter of Leviticus to find what is therein expressly forbidden and I read, in the 16th verse—I am now reading from the Geneva version, not because it differs in any material respect from the authorised version, but for the reasons which I gave in the case of The Solicitor-General v. A B[1]—"Thou shalt not discover the shame of thy brother's wife [for] it is thy brother's

[1] Supra (J.), p. 38.
[2] Deut. xxv. 5.
[3] The cases of Nairne and Irvine, in Hume on Crimes, vol. i. 449.
[4] Reference was also made to Ersk. Inst., iv. 4, 56; Fraser on Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. i. pp. 104 et seq.; The Punishment of Incest Act, 1908 (8 Ed. VII. cap. 45).
[5] Hume on Crimes, vol. i. 449.
[6] (1861) 23 D. 366, at p. 382.

Mar. 17, 1914.

H. M. Advocate v. Ryan.

Lord Justice-General.

shame." It will be observed that the reason assigned for the prohibition is the propinquity of the parties. It seems unnecessary to proceed any further, for these words which I have just read are not open to two meanings, they are free from all ambiguity and, applying to them the most rigid canons of construction, I, for my part, am constrained to hold that this indictment is quite clearly relevant.

It was argued to us by the prisoner's counsel that the effect of our decision in the case of The Solicitor-General v. A B [1] was to exclude from the category of crime expressed in the present indictment all acts between a man and his sister-in-law. I cannot think so, for verses 6 to 17 contain a list or series of examples or illustrations of what is meant by the expression near of kin; and, from an examination of these verses, it will appear that the general prohibition expressed in the sixth verse applies both to degrees of affinity and consanguinity. Eleven examples or illustrations in all are given, six of these applying to consanguinity and five to affinity. There is, therefore, no shadow of doubt that the expression "degree" in the ancient statute embraces both affinity and consanguinity.

Mr Forsyth Grant, however, submitted to us an ingenious argument, buttressed by much research and learning, to the effect that the verse in question (verse 16) has no relation to the crime charged in this indictment, and that it is exclusively confined to the custom of polyandry and forbids expressly any woman to have two brothers as husbands at the same time. I cannot think so, and my answer is this—that the words of this verse plainly will not bear that construction. To give effect to this argument would mean that we should trespass beyond our own proper functions into the domain of the legislative authority. We may all entertain our own views regarding the propriety and wisdom of retaining this ancient statute in the criminal code of Scotland. I am well aware that your Lordships do entertain strong views on that subject, views which I fully share; but, in the meantime, we can only give effective expression to them in the sentences which we think it our duty to pronounce, if we are to confine ourselves to our proper functions as interpreters and not makers of the law.

Lord Salvesen.—I am unable to resist the conclusion at which your Lordship in the chair has arrived; but I cannot refrain from pointing out the anomalous position in which our law of incest at present stands. It is entirely statutory in origin, and the anomalies are the result of the imperfection of the statute, which was passed so long ago as the year 1567, and which has been allowed to remain ever since without alteration. Even after all these years in which judicial construction has been brought to bear from time to time to elucidate the statute, it is still uncertain whether some forms of irregular connection are punishable as crimes. No better illustration of this is to be found than in the recent case of A B,[1] where a majority of this Court held that intercourse between a man and his wife's sister was not incest, although there were ancient decisions to the contrary. The relationship between the accused here and the woman with whom he had connection is precisely the same in degree; and yet, on the language of the statute, we are forced to hold that intercourse between a man and his living brother's wife is a crime, although morally no more reprehensible than intercourse between a man and his living wife's sister.

[1] Supra (J.), p. 38.

The Act 1567, cap. 14, enacts that any person that abuses his body "with sic personis in degre as Goddis Word hes expresslie forbiddin in ony tyme cuming, as is contenit in the xviij. chaptour of Leuiticus," shall be guilty of the crime of incest and punishable with death. A penal statute of this kind ought always to be strictly construed, the more so because of the use of the term "expressly forbidden"; but this rule of construction has been from the first consistently disregarded. The reason may be gathered from a careful examination of the forbidden degrees which are enumerated in the chapter in question. Thus, while intercourse between a mother and son is expressly dealt with, nothing is said with regard to intercourse between a father and his daughter or granddaughter. A nephew is forbidden to marry his aunt, but there is no prohibition in the case of an uncle and niece. The Courts were therefore faced with this difficulty—that, if the statute only applied to the cases expressly mentioned in Leviticus, intercourse of the kind which most shocked the feelings of mankind fell to be treated as lawful. Accordingly verse 6, which in the Geneva Bible is thus expressed: "None shall come nere to any of the kindred of his flesh to uncover her shame," has been treated as a general prohibition; and, to use the words of Lord Fraser,[1] "the whole of the following verses, down to and including verse 17, are just examples and illustrations of what is meant by "near of kin" in verse 6. Those verses are not limitations of the general law but examples of it." The result of this method of construction, while it has avoided the evil of allowing persons who have committed incest of the most revolting description to escape punishment, has been to apply the statutory penalty to many cases in which there was neither blood relationship between the parties nor such affinity as made intercourse inexpedient or immoral. According to the older decisions, not merely has a man been convicted for having intercourse with his living wife's sister but also with his deceased wife's sister. So also a man who married his brother's widow has been sentenced to death. Perhaps the most extreme case is one where a widower, who had intercourse with the daughter of his wife's half-brother, was held to have come within the purview of the statute. In this case the parties were in no way related by blood; and there was no reason, apart from the previous marriage of the man, why he should not marry the woman with whom he had connection; yet the logic of the decision, according to the peculiar canon of construction applied to this statute, is unanswerable. Degrees of affinity are to be treated exactly on the same footing as degrees of consanguinity, and the half-blood as equal to the whole. The woman in question was the deceased wife's niece, because she was the daughter of a half-brother; hence, for the purpose of this statute, she was to be treated as the husband's niece; and although marriage between an uncle and his niece is not expressly forbidden it is, forsooth, to be implied from the express prohibition of marriage between an aunt and her nephew.

[1] Husband and Wife, (2nd ed.) vol. ii. p. 115.

Mar. 17, 1914.
H. M. Advocate v. Ryan.
Lord Salvesen.

It is to the credit of those responsible for the administration of our law that there have been very few prosecutions in Scotland where the relationship was not one of consanguinity. There are only one or two reported cases of a prosecution such as we are now dealing with. As the law, however, stands, it is the duty of the prosecutor to indict, when a case of the kind, capable of proof, is made the subject of a formal complaint; and I make no reflection upon the present Lord Advocate for having directed this indictment to be served. I assume that, in the circumstances, he had no option; but such a case as the present, and that of H. M. Advocate v. A B,[1] bring into strong relief the anomalies of the law of incest, and make it imperative that there should be a new and clear definition of the crime by a statute that would command general assent. But for the rarity of the prosecutions in the past in cases of this description, I think public opinion would long ago have revolted against a statute which leaves to implication one-half of the crimes which are now held to be within its scope, and which includes relationships which are not merely not criminal, but entirely void of offence.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with your Lordships, and as the Judge who certified this case from the Glasgow Circuit, I wish to say that I do not regret that I took up the time of this High Court by following that course.

The immoral conduct with which the prisoner at the bar is charged is so similar to the immoral conduct which, in the recent case of The Solicitor-General v. A B,[1] we held not to be criminal that the public are entitled to know why it is that we draw a sharp distinction between the two. The opinions which your Lordships have just delivered afford that explanation.

If public opinion considers that we have been constrained by the terms of this ancient statute to draw a distinction where no real difference exists, an easy remedy can be provided by Parliament.

LORD HUNTER.—I agree with the views of your Lordship and also with the views of Lord Salvesen. Personally, I do not think that prosecutions for incest ought to proceed except in cases where the offending parties are related by blood. But I agree that we cannot possibly take that view here, looking to the terms of this ancient statute, which is binding upon us.

LORD ANDERSON.—This is an indictment at the instance of the Lord Advocate against the panel, Martin Ryan, charging him with having had incestuous intercourse with his brother's wife, contrary to the Act 1 James VI. cap. 14, and the 18th chapter of Leviticus, therein referred to. When the case came, last month, before Lord Skerrington at the Glasgow Circuit, the panel's counsel objected to the relevancy of the indictment, in respect that the fact libelled does not amount to a crime according to the law of Scotland. The importance of the point thus raised induced Lord Skerrington to certify the case for the opinion of this Court,

[1] Supra (J.), p. 38.

Mar. 17, 1914.

H. M. Advocate v. Ryan.

Ld. Anderson.

and the question for our determination is whether the indictment against the panel is relevant. The answer to this question depends on a consideration of the terms of the Act of Parliament and of the chapter of the Scriptures which it incorporates.

A point was mooted at the debate as to whether incest is a crime under the common law of Scotland. It seems to me that there is no doubt that it was a common law crime before the statute of 1567 was passed. I entirely agree with what is said on this point by Lord Fraser in his work on Husband and Wife, vol. i., p. 113: "The Act 1567, cap. 14, did not declare the connections therein reprobated incestuous for the first time. The only object of that statute was to increase the punishment. The Act 1567, cap. 15, allowing parties to marry within certain degrees before prohibited, left all marriages outwith these permitted degrees in the same position as they formerly were by the common law of Scotland, i.e., incestuous and null. But the punishment under the common law was merely ecclesiastical penance, which was altered by the Act 1567, cap. 14, into death. It is a mistake to suppose that the Act 1567, cap. 14, created the law which denounces as incest all connections within the prohibited degrees." In the case of Neil M'Coll,[1] which decided that attempt to commit incest is an indictable offence at common law, Lord Neaves expresses himself thus: "It is a mistake to suppose that this crime rests on the Statute alone. The Statute itself sets forth that incest is a crime already; and the native vigour of the law of Scotland will enable us to punish an attempt to commit any such crime. . . . The common law defines the crime as a violation of the rules of propinquity, and the Statute lays down laws of propinquity: but that the crime of incest rests on the Statute alone is, to my mind, inadmissible." I find that in this case, where the indictment was in the old form, incest, and attempt to commit incest, are libelled, in the major proposition, as common law crimes. The indictments were in similar form in the cases of Simpson,[2] Russell,[3] Robertson,[4] Irvine,[5] and Lloyd.[6] In the case of Oman,[7] the crime of incest was libelled, in the major proposition, as a crime at common law.

This matter, however, is not really germane to the question we have to decide under the present indictment, which is laid solely on the Act of 1567. The one consideration here is, as Hume has pointed out (i. 447), What hath the statute said? Now, I have been unable to discover any ambiguity or dubiety as to the significance of the 16th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus, which is applicable to this case. The terms of the verse are these—"Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife." That prohibition is clear, express, and unambiguous, and we are bound to give effect to what is there so distinctly laid down. I am therefore of opinion, on the short ground that the scriptural language is clear and imperative, that the indictment is relevant.

The panel's counsel very properly pointed out the apparent anomaly or inconsistency between this case, if decided against the accused, and the

[1] (1874) 2 Coup. 538.
[2] (1870) 1 Coup. 437.
[3] (1869) 1 Coup. 441, note.
[4] (1877) 3 Coup. 496.
[5] (1875) 3 Coup. 496, note.
[6] (1875) 3 Coup. 497, note.
[7] (1855) 2 Irv. 146.

Mar. 17, 1914.

H. M. Advocate v. Ryan.

Ld. Anderson.

recent case of A B.[1] The degree of relationship, to wit, that of a sister-in-law, is the same, but in the former case the Court held that no crime had been committed. That case, however, depended on an interpretation of a different verse, which the Court held did not instruct any crime. Our duty is to administer the law as we find it, and not to repeal existing enactments which may have got out of harmony with modern ideas. It is for the Legislature, and not the Court, to remove the alleged anomaly or inconsistency, if modern sentiment demands that this should be done. The only way in which the Court can recognise the existence of this modern sentiment, if it does exist, is in connection with the imposition of a penalty.

ON the motion of the Advocate-Depute, in view of the time that the panel had already been in custody, the Court deserted the diet simpliciter.

SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—FREDERICK HILL, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 16.

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

DONALD AND FRANCIS D. DUNDAS, Appellants.—Constable, K.C.—Ingram.

CHARLES STEUART PHYN (Procurator-Fiscal, Dumfriesshire), Respondent.—Gillon, A.-D.

Statutory Offences—Protection of animals—Knackery—Prohibition against selling alive or permitting sale of animals delivered to knacker—Sale by knacker's assistant—"Permission" of knacker—"Delivery" of animal—Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912 (2 and 3 Geo. V. cap. 14), sec. 5 (2), First Schedule, Regulation 9.

The Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912, enacts, section 5 (2): "Every person who shall carry on, or assist in carrying on, the trade or business of a knacker shall observe and conform to the regulations set out in the First Schedule to this Act, . . ." and the First Schedule, Regulation 9, enacts: "The knacker shall not sell or part with alive, or cause or procure or permit any person to sell or part with alive, any animal which has been delivered to him."

A knacker's assistant, in the absence and without the knowledge of the knacker, purchased a horse at a market three miles from the knackery for the sum of £1, and tied it to the knackery cart. While the horse was standing there he sold it for the sum of £1, 10s. to a person who subsequently dispatched it for exportation to Antwerp. There was no evidence as to the purpose for which the knacker's assistant purchased the horse. The knacker's assistant and the knacker, having been convicted of a contravention of section 5 (2) of the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912, by respectively selling and permitting the sale of the horse alive, appealed to the High Court.

The Court (diss. Lord Salvesen) sustained the conviction of the assistant, holding (1) that Regulation 9 of the First Schedule applied not only to knackers but also to their assistants; (2) that, although it would not be a contravention of the section to sell a horse that was proved to have been delivered for other than knackery purposes, yet, (diss. Lord Salvesen) in the absence of such proof, the horse must be presumed to have been delivered for knackery purposes.

[1] Supra (J.), p. 38.

Further, the Court quashed the conviction of the knacker, holding that, in the absence of proof that he knew of or authorised the sale, or had failed to exercise a reasonable supervision over his assistant, he could not be said to have "permitted" the sale.

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Salvesen. Ld. Anderson.

DONALD DUNDAS, knacker's assistant, and Francis D. Dundas, knacker, both residing at Oakland House, Noblehill, Dumfries, were charged in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries on a complaint at the instance of Charles Steuart Phyn, procurator-fiscal. The charge against the accused was:—"You are charged at the instance of the complainer, that on 19th November 1913, on Whitesands, Dumfries, you, the said Donald Dundas, being an assistant in carrying on the trade or business of a knacker, did sell alive to David Purdie, cattle dealer, 142 Cotton Street, Castle-Douglas, a chestnut horse which had been delivered to you the said Donald Dundas, and you the said Francis D. Dundas, carrying on the trade or business of a knacker, did permit the said Donald Dundas to sell alive said horse, contrary to section 5 (2) of the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912,* whereby you are liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds, and in default of payment thereof, to imprisonment in terms of section 48 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908."

The accused, having both been found guilty by the Sheriff-substitute (Campion), obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth:—"The cause was tried on 5th December 1913, when the agent for the appellants objected to the relevancy of the complaint against the said Donald Dundas in respect that Regulation 9 of the First Schedule to the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912, only applied to a knacker and not to his assistant. I repelled said objection, and proof was then led both for the prosecution and in defence.

"The facts held proved in evidence were:—That Thomas Walls, a general dealer, who had bought the horse in question at a farm sale a few days previously, and had driven it yoked to a trap on the date libelled a distance of fourteen miles, sold it to the said Donald Dundas for £1. That Donald Dundas then took the horse and tied it to the cart belonging to the knackery conducted by his father the said Francis D. Dundas, a younger brother being in charge of the cart at the time. That this transaction took place at Whitesands, the market-place of Dumfries, three miles distant from the knackery, on a Wednesday, the Dumfries market day. That while the horse was standing at said cart, the said David Purdie came along and offered to purchase it from Donald Dundas. That after some bargaining, Donald Dundas sold the horse for £1, 10s. to Purdie, who despatched it to a Mr Mills, at Menston, near Leeds,

* The Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912 (2 and 3 Geo. V. cap. 14), enacts:—Section 5 (2). "Every person who shall carry on, or assist in carrying on, the trade or business of a knacker shall observe and conform to the regulations set out in the First Schedule to this Act, and if any person, carrying on or assisting in the carrying on of the said trade or business, contravenes or fails to comply with, or causes or procures or permits any contravention or non-compliance with, any such regulation, he shall be liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding ten pounds."

Regulation 9 of the First Schedule to the Act is quoted in the rubric.

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

for exportation to Antwerp. That the said Francis D. Dundas was not present at Whitesands at the time of the purchase and sale of the horse, and only afterwards came to know of the facts. That the said Donald Dundas assists his father the said Francis D. Dundas in carrying on the trade or business of a knacker. That the said Francis D. Dundas holds a licence as a manure manufacturer, besides carrying on the trade or business of a knacker. On the facts stated I found the appellants severally guilty as libelled, fined the said Francis D. Dundas £5, or in default of payment, sentenced him to ten days' imprisonment, and dismissed the said Donald Dundas with an admonition."

The questions of law were:—"(1) Was the relevancy of the complaint rightly sustained? and (2) Were the appellants rightly convicted, as libelled, on the facts stated?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 9th March 1914.

Argued for the appellants;—Both appellants had been wrongly convicted, no offence of any description having been committed by either of them against section 5, subsection (2), or the Schedule which related to the section. The offence alleged here was selling or permitting the sale of an animal which had been "delivered" to a knacker. The horse here had not been "delivered" in the sense of Regulation 9 of the First Schedule. It was obvious from the Act that delivery meant delivery either at the knackery, or to the knacker or his assistant for the purpose of destruction in the knackery. It did not cover every delivery to a knacker or his assistant, for in that case it would be impossible for a knacker to buy a horse to run in his trap, seeing that Regulation 3 of the First Schedule enacted that every animal must be slaughtered within two days from the time at which it had been "delivered." In the present case it was not found, and there was no evidence to show, that the assistant had bought the horse with the object of destroying it, and this fact could not be presumed against the accused. As regarded the assistant, the case against him failed on the further ground that Regulation 9 of the First Schedule clearly applied only to the knacker and not to his assistant, and the complaint, accordingly, as against the latter was irrelevant. It was true that section 5 (2) enacted that the assistant was to obey the Regulations set out in the First Schedule, but when the Schedule was examined it was obvious that certain of the Regulations, e.g., Regulations 1 (providing that the knacker's name should be painted over the door), 6 (providing that proper books should be kept), and 9, could only apply to the principal. As regarded the knacker, it was further clear that the case against him, which was a charge of permitting the sale, had in no way been proved. He was not present when the sale was made; he knew nothing about it until after it had taken place; and it was not suggested that he could have prevented it in any way, or that he had failed generally to exercise reasonable supervision over the actions of his assistant. The cases under the Licensing Acts were distinguishable, because under the Licensing Acts there was no provision for punishing assistants,[1] whereas under the present Act the case of an assistant was expressly provided for, and further, a clear distinction was drawn between actual selling and merely permitting a sale.

[1] Commissioners of Police v. Cartman, [1896] 1 Q. B. 655.

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

Argued for the respondent;—The horse had been "delivered" in the sense of the Act. There was nothing in the Act to indicate that delivery must be at the knackery, and the facts found by the Sheriff-substitute showed beyond doubt that the horse had been sold to and purchased by the assistant with the object of its being destroyed and not for service. As regarded the case against the assistant, Regulation 9 of the First Schedule applied to assistants as well as to principals. It was true that the knacker himself was the only person actually mentioned in the Regulation, but section 5 (2) was perfectly explicit in its statement that the Regulations were to apply not only to principals but also to assistants, and in cases of ambiguity a section of an Act must override a schedule.[1] As regarded the case against the knacker, he had "permitted" the sale in the sense of the Act even although he knew nothing about it. The sale had been effected by an employee in the course of his employment, and that was sufficient to make the employer responsible. There was no necessity for the presence of mens rea to constitute the offence, the prohibition being an absolute one. The same rule of law had been repeatedly applied in the case of offences against the Licensing Acts.[2] Section 7 of the Act was instructive by way of contrast, for in that section the word "knowingly" was expressly introduced.

At advising on 19th March 1914,—

Lord Justice-General.—The appellant Francis Dundas, who is a knacker in the neighbourhood of Dumfries, and the appellant Donald Dundas, who assists his father in carrying on the trade or business of a knacker, were charged before the Sheriff-substitute in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries, with a contravention of subsection 2 of the 5th section of the Act for the Protection of Animals, 1912. Both pleaded not guilty and, after evidence had been led, the Sheriff-substitute found both the appellants guilty as libelled. I am of opinion that the appellant Donald Dundas was rightly convicted and that the appellant Francis Dundas was not.

I take, first, the case of Donald Dundas. He was charged, being an assistant in carrying on the trade or business of a knacker, with selling to David Purdie, a cattle dealer, a chestnut horse which had been delivered to him, Donald Dundas, contrary to section 5 (2) of the statute I have mentioned. The facts proved and found in the stated case were as follows:—On the market day, Wednesday 19th November last, Donald Dundas was at the market-place in Dumfries and bought from a general dealer named Walls a chestnut horse for 20s. The horse was there and then delivered to Donald Dundas who tied it to the cart belonging to his father's knackery—a younger brother being in charge of the cart at the time. Subsequently, while the horse was thus tied up, a man named Purdie, a cattle dealer, came up and offered to purchase it. After some bargaining, Donald Dundas, to whom the horse had been delivered a [1] Jacobs v. Hart, (1900) 2 F. (J.) 33, 3 Adam, 131.

[2] Bond v. Evans, (1888) 21 Q. B. D. 249; Sherras v. De Rutzen, [1895] 1 Q. B. 918; Parker v. Alder, [1899] 1 Q. B. 20; Toppin v. Marcus, [1908] 2 I. R. 423.

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

Lord Justice-General.

short time before, sold it to Purdie for 30s., and by him it was exported to Antwerp.

Upon these facts, the Sheriff-substitute found Donald Dundas guilty of the contravention charged, and I think rightly so, for section 5 (2) runs as follows (I read it short):—Every person who shall assist in carrying on the trade of a knacker shall conform to the regulations set out in the First Schedule appended to the Act; and if any person assisting in that trade contravenes any such regulation he shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding £10. And when I turn to the First Schedule, I find that the 9th Regulation runs as follows:—"A knacker shall not sell alive, or permit any person to sell alive, any animal which has been delivered to him."

An objection was taken to the relevancy of the indictment in respect that Regulation 9 of the First Schedule to the 1912 Act only applied to a knacker and not to his assistant. But the statute prescribes exactly the opposite, for the statute says every man who assists in carrying on the business of a knacker is to observe all the regulations, and Donald Dundas was confessedly assisting in carrying on the business of a knacker. Therefore, if he failed to observe any of the regulations he was bound to suffer the penalty. Accordingly, if this objection had been sustained, in my opinion the express words of the statute would have been violated, its aim and object would certainly have been defeated, and no amending Act could have cured the mischief because the words of the statute could not, I think, be made plainer than they at present are. Therefore, I think the Sheriff-substitute was right in repelling the objection to the relevancy.

Now, let it be observed that there was no other objection stated to the relevancy except the one I have just mentioned. It was not objected, for example, that the complainer had failed to charge Donald Dundas with having had delivered to him a horse for knackery purposes for or on behalf of his father and employer Francis Dundas. No such objection was taken, nor do I think that such an objection if it had been taken could have been sustained, because the public prosecutor here charged the offence in the very words of the statute. But it was contended to us that the conviction could not stand because the prosecutor had failed to prove, and the stated case had not found, that the horse was delivered to Donald Dundas for knackery purposes. The statute throws no such obligation upon the prosecutor. If he prove that the horse was delivered to the assistant knacker, then, if the assistant knacker sells the horse, he is liable to the penalties, because the statute presumes that, if a horse is sold to a man who assists in carrying on the business of a knackery, it is sold for knackery purposes, the transaction being one in the ordinary course of trade. Of course, if the knacker's assistant or, for that matter, the knacker himself were to prove to the satisfaction of the Sheriff that the horse had been delivered to ride or to drive or for re-sale, and a finding to that effect were pronounced, the accused would, in my judgment, be entitled to acquittal. But the prosecutor has, in my opinion, no onus here to discharge. He is not bound to prove—what the statute, of course, presumes—that, when a horse is delivered to a knacker or to an assistant knacker, it is delivered for knackery purposes. And in the absence, therefore, of any finding that the horse was not delivered for knackery purposes, I am of opinion that the conviction against the appellant Donald Dundas was right.

I turn now to the case of Francis Dundas. The charge against him was that he "permitted" all that I have narrated to be done, and accordingly was guilty of an offence under subsection 2 of the 5th section. But all that is found in the stated case with regard to Francis Dundas is that he was not present at Whitesands—the market-place—at the time of the purchase and sale of the horse, and only afterwards came to know the facts. How a man could have "permitted" an offence to be committed of which he was in utter ignorance I am wholly at a loss to understand. It was argued to us that a man might, in the sense of the statute, permit an act to be done without actually knowing of it. That may be so; but the prosecutor would certainly be bound to prove facts and circumstances from which permission could be inferred. If I am asked to say what is the meaning of the word "permit" as used in this statute, I find a capital glossary in section 1 (2) of the Act, where it is provided that an owner shall be deemed to have permitted a certain act prohibited, to wit, cruelty within the meaning of this Act, if he shall have failed to exercise reasonable care and supervision in respect of the protection of the animal therefrom. And I draw the inference—I think sound and just—that an owner might be convicted of having permitted an act to be done if he failed to take reasonable care and supervision in respect of a particular act, in this instance in respect of the conduct of his assistant. What the prosecutor would require to show in order to prove a lack of the exercise of reasonable care and supervision, I forbear to speculate upon; but, undoubtedly, facts and circumstances might be established—and it would be for the prosecutor to establish them—from which the absence of reasonable care and supervision might be inferred.

The truth is that all the questions raised in this case depend upon onus. Is the onus upon the prosecutor to prove that a horse, which has been delivered to a knacker or an assistant knacker, was delivered for knackery purposes, or was delivered to the assistant knacker on behalf of his employers? I am of opinion that it is not, and that the statute makes that very clear. On the other hand, is the onus upon the prosecutor to prove permission when an owner is charged with having permitted an act to take place? I am of opinion that it is, and that he does not discharge that onus by simply proving that the owner knew nothing at all about the transaction; and that is all that is proved in this case against Francis Dundas.

My view, therefore, is that the first question put to us ought to be answered in the affirmative and that, with regard to the second question, we ought to say that Donald Dundas, the assistant knacker, was rightly convicted and that Francis Dundas, his father and master, was not.

Lord Salvesen.—The material facts found by the Sheriff-substitute in this case may be briefly summarised as follows. On 19th November 1913 Donald Dundas, who assists his father, the other appellant, in carrying on his business as a knacker, bought a horse at Whitesands, the marketplace of Dumfries, at the price of £1 from a man called Walls, who had driven it fourteen miles that day. He tied the horse to the cart belonging to the knackery, when a certain David Purdie came and offered him 10s. more than the price he had paid for it. Donald Dundas thereupon sold the horse to Purdie, who afterwards dispatched it to a Mr Mills for exportation to Antwerp. It is not said that Donald Dundas knew the destination to which Purdie meant to send the horse. Francis Dundas was not present at the time of the purchase and sale of the horse, and only afterwards came to know the facts. This apparently innocent transaction has been made the subject of a prosecution under the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912; and both Donald and Francis Dundas have been convicted.

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

Lord Salvesen.

The charge against Donald Dundas is that he, being an assistant in carrying on the trade or business of a knacker, did sell alive to David Purdie, cattle dealer, a chestnut horse which had been delivered to him; and the charge against Francis Dundas is that he, carrying on the trade or business of a knacker, did permit Donald Dundas to sell alive said horse. The section of the Act libelled is section 5 (2), which provides that every person who carries on, or assists in carrying on, the business of a knacker shall observe the regulations set out in the First Schedule. The particular article of the schedule said to have been contravened is in these terms: "The knacker shall not sell or part with alive, or cause or procure or permit any person to sell or part with alive, any animal which has been delivered to him."

The first question is whether this part of the schedule applies to a knacker's assistant. Having regard to the language of section 5 (2) I think it must be held so to apply, because it is reasonably capable of being so applied. In this respect it differs from some of the other regulations; as, for instance, the first—that the name of the knacker shall be painted on the gate of his yard; or the sixth, which prescribes that the knacker shall enter in a book kept for the purpose a description of every animal delivered to him and other particulars. These matters are within the sole control of the knacker; and I think it would be absurd to indict his assistant for a breach of these regulations. On the other hand, there is no prohibition against a knacker's assistant carrying on the business of a dealer in horses, as there is by section 6 in the case of a person who is licensed to slaughter horses. It is, therefore, plain to my mind that, in the case of a knacker's assistant, the mere fact that he sells a live horse cannot be treated as an offence. In the same way, as regards the knacker himself, he may require a horse for the purposes of his business; and, if the language of the regulations be strictly applied, whenever he buys any horse he must kill it within two days from the time it has been delivered to him.

It is obvious, therefore, that the regulation requires construction, and I think it means, both with regard to the knacker and his assistant, that the animal has been sold to either of them for the purpose, whether express or implied, of its being slaughtered. Under such circumstances, I can well understand that Parliament should have thought it desirable, from motives of humanity, that a horse sold for such a purpose (being presumably unfit for any other) should be immediately slaughtered; but unless this is found as a fact, or has been reasonably inferred by the convicting magistrate from the facts proved before him, I do not think he is entitled to convict. Now, the Sheriff-substitute has not made any finding of this nature. He does not say that Walls knew that Donald Dundas was assistant to his father or that he sold the animal for the purpose of slaughter. The mere fact that the price was only £1 would not by itself be sufficient to entitle the Sheriff-substitute to draw this inference. For all that appears, the motive of the original owner, in selling the animal, may have been that he discovered in the course of his fourteen miles' drive that it was sluggish or vicious, and so useless for his purpose. But the Sheriff-substitute does not inform us what inference, if any, he drew from the facts. If the original owner knew that Donald Dundas was a knacker's assistant, this, taken in conjunction with the price paid, might perhaps justify an inference that, in the owner's opinion, it ought to be slaughtered at once, and was sold for that purpose; but this, to my mind, essential fact is not found at all. I am, therefore, of opinion that neither of the accused should have been convicted on the facts stated.

Even if I had been of a different opinion, I should still have held that there were no sufficient grounds for convicting Francis Dundas. It is expressly found that he knew nothing of the purchase or sale of the horse; and there is no statement that his son was authorised by him to buy on his behalf or to sell alive any horse which had been delivered to him. I cannot see how, in these circumstances, he can be held to have permitted a sale of which he knew nothing. He may be responsible for what goes on in his own premises, of which he has control; but he cannot be responsible for the unauthorised acts of an assistant committed at a distance of three miles from his knackery. On this separate ground, therefore, I would have quashed the conviction so far as relating to Francis Dundas.

Lord Anderson.—This is the first prosecution to come before the Court under the Protection of Animals (Scotland) Act, 1912. The Act deals, in the main, with offences of cruelty to animals, but it also contains provisions as to the registration of knackers, and, in the First Schedule, regulations are enacted for the conduct of the business of a knacker. Sections 5 and 6, and the definition section (section 13) contain the provisions of the Act which deal with knackers. One of the mischiefs for which this part of the Act endeavoured to provide a remedy was the exportation of worn-out horses from Great Britain to Continental ports.

The appellants, who are a knacker and his son, a knacker's assistant, were charged in the same complaint—the son with having sold alive a horse which had been delivered to him, and the father with having permitted the sale, contrary to section 5 (2) of the Act. The offence which was really meant to be charged was one against Regulation No. 9, which prohibits the sale alive of an animal which has been delivered to the knacker. The Sheriff-substitute at Dumfries, after evidence had been led, convicted both accused of the respective offences charged, and fined the father £5, the son being dismissed with an admonition. Both the appellants, being dissatisfied with this judgment, craved and obtained a stated case for the opinion of this Court. The questions submitted in the stated case for our opinion are these:—1. Was the relevancy of the complaint rightly sustained? 2. Were the appellants rightly convicted as libelled, on the facts stated?

Mar. 19, 1914.

Dundas v. Phyn.

Ld. Anderson.

The ground on which the relevancy of the complaint was challenged, as disclosed in the minutes of procedure, was "that Regulation 9 of First Schedule to 1912 Act only applied to a knacker and not to his assistant." It is to be observed that this was a special defence which was proponed on behalf of the knacker's assistant, and had reference solely to the charge against him. The Sheriff-substitute repelled this plea, and I am of opinion that he was right in doing so. Section 5 (2) provides—[His Lordship read the subsection]. According to the terms of the subsection, therefore, a knacker's assistant is taken bound to observe the regulations. It was pointed out that certain of the regulations, such as the first and the sixth, are inappropriate or inapplicable to a knacker's assistant. This may be so, but the enactment of the subsection quoted must be given effect to so far as that can competently be done, and its purpose, in my opinion, is to make the regulations binding, so far as they are applicable, on knackers' assistants. Regulation 9 is, in my judgment, applicable to a knacker's assistant. If the regulation has not this effect, it will be an easy matter for a knacker to evade its provisions. He need only do the prohibited act through the agency of his assistant, and deny privity or complicity. I am accordingly of opinion that the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

The second question creates greater difficulty. It raises questions of fact which are primarily for the Sheriff-substitute. We can only reverse him on the facts if we are of opinion (a) that he misdirected himself in law in reaching his conclusion in fact, or (b) that his conclusion in fact is unreasonable and improper on the evidence adduced.

Two general points, applicable to both accused, were taken by the appellants' counsel. It was said, in the first place, that the delivery figured in Regulation 9 was delivery at the knacker's yard. If this construction is correct the regulation could easily be evaded. It seems to me that the suggested construction is negatived by the terms of section 5 (5):—"For the purposes of this Act, an animal shall be deemed to have been delivered to a knacker, if it has been delivered either to the knacker himself, or to any person on his behalf, or at the knacker's yard." If it be the case that the horse was delivered to the knacker's assistant on behalf of the knacker, although not at the yard, this seems a delivery covered by the regulation. It was urged, in the second place, that the Sheriff-substitute has not specifically found that the sale from Walls to Donald Dundas was what I may describe as a knackery transaction. It is not found in the case that Walls knew that Donald Dundas was a knacker's assistant. I do not regard this as vital, in respect that Walls's conduct is not in question. But the point seems more formidable which emphasizes the absence of a finding that Donald Dundas bought the horse for the knackery. I am, however, of opinion that this finding is obviously implied. The trial of the appellants, their conviction, and the statement of the case, all proceeded on the footing that the horse had been bought for the knackery. If the transaction was something different, it was for the appellants to obtain a finding to that effect from the Sheriff-substitute. I am unable, therefore, to give effect to either of these general arguments. Mar. 19, 1914. Dundas v. Phyn. Ld. Anderson.

I have already dealt with the special point which was taken on behalf of Donald Dundas, and the conclusion I have reached as to him is that he was properly convicted.

A special argument was advanced on behalf of the knacker, which, I think, is unanswerable. He is charged with having permitted the sale by Donald Dundas to Purdie. Now, this prohibited sale took place at Dumfries, three miles from the knackery. It is not found that the knacker was in Dumfries at the time, or that he knew anything about what was taking place. I am of opinion that, under the regulation, there can be no permission if there is not knowledge and sanction. In the absence of any finding that the knacker was cognisant of and authorised the forbidden sale, I am of opinion that he was wrongly convicted.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the second question should be answered to the effect that Donald Dundas's conviction was justified, but that the conviction of his father was not.

THE COURT quashed the conviction against Francis Dundas and quoad ultra dismissed the appeal.

J. GEORGE REID, Solicitor—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

ROBERT PATERSON, Complainer.—Christie, K.C.—Ingram.
THOMAS MACLENNAN (Procurator-Fiscal, Aberdeen), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen, Morison—Morton, A.-D.

No. 17.

May 18, 1914.

Procedure—Sentence—Court of Summary Jurisdiction—Form of sentence—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), sec. 53 and Schedule E. Paterson v. MacLennan.

The sentence of a Court of Summary Criminal Jurisdiction should always be minuted in the form contained in Schedule E to the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.

Held, however, that, where an accused was charged on a complaint setting forth twenty separate offences, a sentence finding the accused "guilty" might stand although the statutory words "as libelled" had been omitted, it being clear from the subsequent part of the sentence, which imposed a cumulo pecuniary penalty, that the accused had been found guilty of each of the twenty offences libelled.

ROBERT PATERSON, farmer, Lendrum, parish of Monquhitter, Aberdeenshire, was charged on a complaint at the instance of Thomas MacLennan, Procurator-fiscal, Aberdeen, with contravening the National Insurance Act, 1911, by failing to pay timeously certain contributions payable by him in respect of a number of servants in his employment. The complaint charged the accused with twenty separate offences.* HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Dundas. Ld. Anderson.

The Sheriff-substitute (Laing), after proof, pronounced the follow-

* The complaint was long, confused, and complicated, and at the hearing before the High Court of Justiciary there was considerable discussion as to the precise number of offences charged. The Court eventually decided that they were twenty in number.

May 18, 1914.

Paterson v. MacLennan.

ing sentence:—"The Court found the accused guilty, and imposed a fine of 15s. for each offence, or £15 sterling in all, and in default of payment sixty days' imprisonment."

The accused presented a bill of suspension in which he sought a suspension of the conviction on the ground, inter alia, that the finding and sentence of the Court were not minuted in the forms contained in Schedule E to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908,* and did not state of which offence or offences he was found guilty.

The case was heard on 18th May 1914.

Argued for the complainer;—The sentence fell to be quashed in respect that it was not in the form contained in Schedule E to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1908, the use of which form was made imperative by section 53 of the Act. It ought to have been in the form "guilty as libelled," if the Sheriff-substitute's intention was to find the accused guilty of all the offences charged. As the sentence stood it was impossible to tell with certainty to which offences the conviction applied, especially in view of the fact that this complicated complaint might just as well be held to contain 140 charges (one for each week's contribution unpaid) as 20. The question was one of substance and not merely one of form.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—There were twenty offences charged, and a simple sum in arithmetic showed that the Sheriff-substitute had convicted the accused of them all. That was equivalent to a finding of "guilty as libelled," and satisfied the requirements of section 53. In any event, the matter was one of form, and the Court could amend the sentence under the powers conferred by section 75 of the Act.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think it is to be regretted that in this case the sentence did not contain the words "as libelled," and was thus not in the form given in Schedule E to the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908. How the words "as libelled" got into the form given in the Schedule, I am at a loss to understand, because they constitute an innovation upon the form which was formerly employed in the inferior Courts, and which, in my experience, was never the cause of any inconvenience. Still, the words being in the Schedule, I think—and I say it emphatically—that the statute should be followed, and that Judges in the inferior Courts should use the form prescribed in the Schedule.

When, however, I look at the form of the sentence in the present case,

---

* The Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 65), enacts:—Sec. 53. "The finding and sentence and orders of Court, both as regards offences at common law and under any statute or order, shall be minuted in the forms contained in Schedule E to this Act. . . ."

Schedule E contains the following forms:—

Finding. The Court found the accused guilty as libelled (or as first (or last) alternatively libelled, or state to what extent found guilty), (or not guilty), (or found the charge not proven), (or found A. B. guilty as libelled and C. D. guilty as second libelled), (or as the case may be),

Fine. Fined £ (or £ each), and in default of payment days' imprisonment (or days' imprisonment each).

[1] Johnstone v. Lindsay, 1907 S. C. (J.) 9, 5 Adam, 192; Muirhead v. M'Intosh, (1890) 2 White, 473.

I think that it contains what we may hold to be the equivalent of the omitted words. The sentence is that "the Court found the accused guilty, and imposed a fine of 15s. for each offence, or £15 sterling in all." Now, the complaint charges the accused with twenty offences, and a simple sum in arithmetic shows that the finding of guilty must have extended to all the offences charged.

I wish, however, again to impress upon those who have to try such cases that it is most inadvisable to run the risk of having difficulties raised as to the sentences passed by not adhering to the words prescribed by the Schedule. This case may not be held to be a precedent ruling any future case.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree with your Lordship, and think that the sentence may stand, because, as I read it, it finds the accused guilty of the twenty offences charged in the complaint, and imposes a fine of 15s. for each offence.

LORD ANDERSON.—I concur with your Lordships. The Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1908 by section 53 enacts that the sentence of Court shall be minuted in the form contained in Schedule E, and the form in the Schedule applicable to a conviction on the whole charge or charges which had been made against an accused is "guilty as libelled." Now, the words "as libelled" are omitted in the sentence with which we are dealing in this case. If the sentence had been framed in accordance with the prescribed form, it would have run,—"the Court found the accused guilty as libelled"; and then, I think, all that the Sheriff-substitute need have added would have been to impose a fine, without specifying, as he has done, how he made up the total amount of the fine. But the words "as libelled" have been omitted, and the only point we have to decide is whether that omission is fatal to the conviction. Now, I do not think that the presence of these words is absolutely essential, provided you have what may fairly be taken as their equivalent, and I think that the words which follow the word "guilty" in the sentence before us clearly indicate that the Sheriff-substitute convicted the accused of all the offences charged, and imposed a fine in respect of each. I accordingly agree with your Lordships that we may hold that in the words to which I have referred we may find an equivalent of the statutory phrase "as libelled," and that, accordingly, the conviction ought to be sustained.

THE COURT refused the bill of suspension.

MACKENZIE & FORTUNE, S.S.C.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

No. 18.

May 25, 1914.

JOHN JAMES M'INTYRE (Police Court Procurator-Fiscal, Glasgow), Appellant.—Cooper, K.C.—M. P. Fraser.
FRANK PERSICHINI, Respondent.—Lippe.

M'Intyre v. Persichini.

Statutory Offences—Keeping premises open contrary to bye-law—Conviction—Necessity of proving purpose for which kept open—City of Glasgow Bye-laws made under Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1911.

A bye-law by the Corporation of the city of Glasgow enacted that "a person registered . . . to keep or use any . . . premises as a place for public refreshment shall not keep such premises open, or suffer them to be kept open," except during hours specified.

Held that proof that an accused person had kept his premises open, or had suffered them to be kept open, after the hours specified was sufficient per se to establish a contravention of the bye-law, without any proof as to the purpose for which they were kept open.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Guthrie. Ld. Ormidale.

FRANK PERSICHINI, 26 Waterloo Street, Glasgow, was charged in the Central Police Court, Glasgow, on a complaint at the instance of John James M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, which set forth:—"You are charged at the instance of the complainer that, being a person registered in terms of section 82 (1) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, to keep or use premises situated at 26 Waterloo Street, Glasgow, as a place for public refreshment, you did (first) on Saturday, 17th January 1914, keep said premises as a place for public refreshment open later than 11 P.M. on said day; and (second) on Thursday, 22nd January 1914, keep said premises as a place for public refreshment open later than 10.45 P.M. on said day, contrary to Bye-laws Nos. 1 and 7 * of the bye-laws made and enacted by the Corporation of the city of Glasgow, in virtue of the powers conferred on them by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1892 to 1911 (said bye-laws being approved of and confirmed by (1) the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 30th June 1913, and (2) the Secretary for Scotland on 3rd October 1913), and particularly by sections 82 (2) and 82 (4) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, and section 1 (2) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, and sections 405 to 413 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, said section 82 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, having been adopted by the said Corporation by resolution on 25th April 1905,

---

* These Bye-laws enacted:—

"1. A person registered in terms of section 82 (1) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, to keep or use any house, building, part of a building, or other premises, as a place for public refreshment, shall not keep such premises open, or suffer them to be kept open, on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, except during the hours between five of the clock in the morning and a quarter to eleven of the clock at night, nor on Saturdays except during the hours between five of the clock in the morning and eleven of the clock at night.

"2. Such person shall not keep such premises open, or suffer them to be kept open, on Sundays, except during the hours from ten of the clock in the morning till eight of the clock at night."

. . . . . .

7. [Bye-law 7 imposed a penalty for contravention of the bye-laws.]

and duly recorded in the Sheriff Court Books of Lanarkshire at Glasgow on 12th May 1905."

After proof the Magistrate (Police Judge Neilson) found the charge not proven.

The prosecutor obtained a stated case for appeal.

The following facts were, inter alia, set forth as proved:—

"The respondent is a person registered in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 82 (1), as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, to keep premises at 26 Waterloo Street, Glasgow, as a place for public refreshment. . . .

"On Saturday, 17th January 1914, two police-officers observed that the door of the respondent's premises was open after 11 P.M. at night, and remained open until 11.45 P.M., when it was shut. On Thursday, 22nd January 1914, they also observed that the door of the premises remained open after 10.45 P.M. until 11.10 P.M., when it was shut. It was reopened about 12.20 A.M. to allow several persons to come out, all of whom, except his wife and a personal friend, were in respondent's service. On both occasions respondent was personally in charge of the premises, which were being 'tidied up' for the night by him and his servants. The police-officers took no steps to ascertain, and it was not proved, that on either of the dates libelled, after the closing hour, any person not in respondent's service was admitted into the premises; that any customer was allowed to remain on the premises; or that any resort to or use whatever of the premises as a place of refreshment was made. They expressly stated that they did not know anything of what was being done inside the premises, and that the place might have been, so far as they knew, in course of being tidied up for the night as the defence maintained."

The case further set forth, inter alia:—"I held (1) that the mechanical fact that the door was indiscreetly not closed did not itself constitute proof of contravention, and (2) that further circumstances than those adduced were required, such, for example, as the presence of customers, to show that the premises were kept open for some business use beyond the closing hour. . . . There was reason to suspect that respondent believed himself free to make some use of the premises more than the bye-laws, as I interpret them, would sanction, but the actual facts established nothing either done or purposed beyond the tidying up of the premises."[1]

The questions submitted for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Does the failure to close the door per se constitute the offence of keeping the premises open under bye-law 1? (2) Ought I to have convicted the respondent?"

The case was heard on 25th May 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The Magistrate ought to have con-

---

[1] The Magistrate referred to Lena v. Davidson, 1913 S. C. (J.) 76, 7 Adam, 129; Wood v. Campbell, (1877) 5 R. (J.) 1, 3 Couper, 508; Stirrat v. Lang, (1877) 3 Couper, 510; M'Call v. Wood, (1878) 5 R. (J.) 28, 4 Couper, 43; Jeffrey v. Weaver, [1899] 2 Q. B. 449; Commissioner of Police v. Roberts, [1904] 1 K. B. 369; Lloyd v. Barnett, (1900) 19 Cox M. C. 622, 64 J. P. 708; and also to the Shop Hours Act, 1904 (4 and 5 Edw. VII. cap. 31), sec. 2 (2); Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 380 (6); Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), sec. 135 (19).

May 25, 1914.

M'Intyre v. Persichini.

victed the accused, the prosecutor having proved all that was necessary to entitle him to a conviction, viz., that the premises were open during prohibited hours. It was unnecessary to prove that they were open for purposes of public refreshment, and, indeed, any proof bearing on the purpose or object for which the premises were kept open would have been irrelevant, the prohibition in the bye-law being a simple and absolute prohibition against opening, entirely irrespective of the purpose or object of the opening. This was made clear by Lord Kinnear in Lena v. Davidson.[1] It was true that the complaint contained the words "as a place for public refreshment," but these words were merely parenthetical and descriptive of the premises, and did not form part of the substantive charge. They were really irrelevant, and any objection with regard to them ought to have been taken at an earlier stage in the proceedings. None of the cases referred to by the Magistrate supported his decision. In the English cases the section of the Act[2] which was alleged to have been contravened was different in its terms from the bye-law here in question, the prohibition being against keeping premises open "for the sale of intoxicating liquors," and further, in Jeffrey v. Weaver[3] and Commissioner of Police v. Roberts,[4] the doors of the premises were closed. Lloyd v. Barnett[5] had to be read in the light of the decision last cited. As to the Scots cases, Wood v. Campbell[6] was quite different; the prohibition there was against "keeping open house," and the doors were proved to have been open solely for purposes of cleaning. In both Stirrat v. Lang[7] and M'Call v. Wood[8] the doors were shut. It was useless and irrelevant to compare, as the Magistrate had attempted to do, the language of other statutes.

Argued for the respondent;—The Magistrate had rightly found the charge not proven. What the Legislature had in view, when it permitted town-councils to make bye-laws regarding the opening and closing of registered premises, was the regulation of the hours during which such premises might be open for purposes of business; and that it was only with opening for business purposes that the bye-law here in question was concerned was clear from the occurrence of the words "as a place for public refreshment" in the earlier portion of the bye-law. This was obviously the view of the prosecutor, as otherwise he would not have introduced these words into the complaint. It followed accordingly that mere proof that the doors were open was not sufficient, and would not have been sufficient even had the complaint merely libelled that the premises were kept open. Even on such a complaint the prosecutor, in order to succeed, would have had to establish the fact that they were open for purposes of public refreshment, or, at anyrate, to negative the possibility that they were open for a legitimate purpose such as cleaning. The cases cited by the Magistrate all supported this view. Lena v. Davidson[1] merely dealt with the question of the relevancy of the complaint, and did not determine what facts the prosecutor would have had to prove in order to establish a contravention.

---

[1] 1913 S. C. (J.) 76, at p. 82, 7 Adam, 129.
[2] Licensing Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 49), sec. 9.
[3] [1899] 2 Q. B. 449. [4] [1904] 1 K. B. 369. [5] 19 Cox M. C. 622.
[6] 5 R. (J.) 1, 3 Couper, 508. [7] 3 Couper, 510.
[8] 5 R. (J.) 28, 4 Couper, 43.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—We are merely interpreters of Acts of Parliament and of bye-laws which have the force of statutory enactments, and it is no part of our duty to express our views upon the policy of the enactments or bye-laws which we are called on to interpret.

Here I think that the very experienced Magistrate who tried the case has erred in his interpretation of the bye-law, which seems to me to be a very clear one. The respondent is a person who is authorised under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, to keep premises situated in Glasgow as a place for public refreshment, and he is charged with two offences, viz., (1) that on the 17th January of the present year he kept these premises open as a place for public refreshment later than 11 P.M., which is the hour of closing on Saturdays fixed by the bye-law which is said to have been contravened; and (2) that on 22nd January 1914, he kept the premises open as a place for public refreshment later than 10.45 P.M., which is the hour fixed by the bye-law for closing on other week days.

Now some comment has been made upon the fact that the complainer here did not charge the offence in the exact terms of the bye-law; but it appears to me that he has substantially done so, and that the introduction of the words "as a place for public refreshment" is mere surplusage. He was authorised to keep the premises as a place for public refreshment, and he could not well keep them—either open or closed—except as a place for public refreshment. If, however, the words are not surplusage, but signify that the premises were kept open for the purpose of doing business, then it must be conceded that the complainer has failed to prove that purpose. But his failure to prove the purpose for which the premises were kept open does not necessarily involve failure to prove a contravention of the bye-law. He may succeed in proving that the premises were kept open, which is all that I think is incumbent upon him in view of the bye-law, and the introduction of the words referred to would merely show that the complainer had undertaken a burden which was not thrown upon him by the bye-law.

Now, it is of importance to notice what exactly was proved against the complainer here. The Magistrate sets out in the stated case that he found that the premises, upon the first occasion charged, were open after 11 P.M. and remained open until 11.45 P.M. Now, critical and subtle observations may be made upon the phraseology that is used; but I think, giving to the language its ordinary meaning, we would understand the Magistrate to mean that he found that at 11 P.M. the accused left his door open and that it remained open for three-quarters of an hour. I read the Magistrate's statement in no other or different sense, and when I come to examine the subsequent part of the stated case, in which the Magistrate more fully develops the facts as he found them proved, I find nothing to warrant the suggestion that the premises were closed at 11 P.M. and merely opened temporarily for a minute or two minutes in the succeeding three-quarters of an hour. The facts relative to the second offence are found in clearer terms, because the Magistrate there says that he found it proved that the door of the premises remained open after a quarter to 11 until 11.10 P.M. when it was shut. I come, therefore, to the conclusion without hesitation that on both occasions the premises were kept open after prohibited hours.

May 25, 1914.

M'Intyre v. Persichini.

Lord Justice-General.

Now, in order to constitute an offence under the bye-law, it is not necessary to prove anything more than that the offender kept the premises open, or suffered them to be kept open, after the prohibited hours. The Magistrate has, in distinct terms I think, found that on the two occasions libelled the premises were kept open after the prohibited hours, and, therefore, an offence was committed. I come, accordingly, without hesitation to the conclusion that the first question put to us,—which probably might be improved in its phraseology, but the meaning of which we all understand quite well,—ought to be answered in the affirmative; and that it is unnecessary for us to answer the second question.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I concur. The bye-law is not challenged, and the complaint purports to be in terms of the bye-law. It is not so in fact, because, as your Lordship has pointed out, it introduces an element which the bye-law does not contain. The bye-law, no doubt, refers to the person registered to keep or use any house or other premises "as a place for public refreshment," but it then goes on to say that he "shall not keep such premises open, or suffer them to be kept open," on certain days except during certain hours, the words "as a place for public refreshment" not being repeated. But the words "as a place for public refreshment" are used in the complaint, not only in the passage where the registration is referred to, but in the part where the charge itself is tabled—"you did keep open such premises as a place for public refreshment." That apparently has been done in forgetfulness of the case of Lena v. Davidson,[1] in which Lord Kinnear said that, if such words were introduced, they would be plainly irrelevant. I agree therefore that, in this case, we are entitled to disregard them; and, indeed, if an objection had been taken on this ground, the Magistrate would, no doubt, have given effect to the motion that would have been made to allow them to be deleted.

The decision which your Lordship proposes to pronounce will not, so far as I can see, in any way conflict with such a case as Wood v. Campbell,[2] which was a case of a door being opened after hours in connection with certain cleaning operations, and obviously bore no resemblance to the essential facts of the present case.

LORD ORMIDALE.—To my mind the only difficulty in this case arises from the introduction into the complaint of the words "as a place for public refreshment." Occurring, however, where they do, I think they may be read as a mere parenthetical description of the premises—"being a place for public refreshment." But I think the complaint would have been better without them, because, agreeing as I do with what your Lordship has said as to the facts which it is necessary for a prosecutor to prove in order to secure a conviction of a contravention of the bye-law in question, it appears to me that by introducing the words I have referred to the procurator-fiscal ran the risk of finding himself called upon to prove more than was really necessary.

---

[1] 1913 S. C. (J.) 76, 7 Adam 129.

[2] 3 Couper, 508.

On the matter of the merits I have no hesitation in agreeing with your Lordship that the first question must be answered in the affirmative and that it is not necessary to answer the second question.

May 25, 1914.

M'Intyre v. Persichini.

THE COURT answered the first question in the affirmative, and sustained the appeal.

CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—MENZIES, BRUCE-LOW, & THOMSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 19.

June 6, 1914.

Gordon v. Hansen.

ROBERTSON BARCLAY GORDON (Procurator-Fiscal, Elgin), Appellant.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—W. Mitchell, A.-D.
GUSTAV HANSEN, Respondent.—Horne, K.C.—A. R. Brown.

Fishings—Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), secs. 12 and 14 (2)—Powers of sea-fishery officer—Refusing to obey officer's order—Legality of order—Power to "take" offending trawler to nearest port—Trawler ordered to "go" to nearest port—Trawler subsequently acquitted of illegal fishing.

The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, section 12, enacts that for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the Act a British sea-fishery officer may exercise certain enumerated powers, including a power, in the case of any person "who appears to him" to have committed a contravention of the Act, to "take the offender and the boat to which he belongs and the crew thereof to the nearest and most convenient port." Section 14 (2) enacts,—"If any person obstructs any sea-fishery officer in acting under the powers conferred by this Act, or refuses or neglects to comply with any requisition or direction lawfully made or given by . . . any sea-fishery officer in pursuance of this Act, such person" shall be liable to a penalty.

A sea-fishery officer, who had reasonable grounds for believing that he had detected a trawler fishing within the three-mile limit, ordered the captain to go with his vessel to Cromarty, which was the nearest and most convenient port. At the time the sea was too rough to permit of a boat being sent to the trawler to put anyone on board.

Held that the order to go to Cromarty was a lawful order, although the only express authority given by the statute was authority to "take" the offender to port, and that the master of the trawler by refusing to comply was guilty of a contravention of section 14 (2) of the Act. Opinions that the order would have been lawful even if the weather had permitted of a boat being sent to the trawler.

Held further that, as the officer had reasonable grounds for believing that the master had been trawling within the three-mile limit, the lawfulness of the order was not affected by the fact that the charge against the master was subsequently found to be not proven.

Procedure—Appeal by stated case—Method of stating case.

Observed that a stated case ought to contain a statement of the facts found proved, not a statement of what the witnesses said.

GUSTAV HANSEN, master of the foreign trawler "Nestor" of Sandefjord, and residing at 146 King Edward Street, Grimsby, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Inverness, Elgin, and Nairn, at Elgin, on a complaint at the instance of Robertson Barclay Gordon, Procurator-fiscal, Elgin, firstly, with having on 30th November 1913 used the method of fishing known as beam or otter trawling at a specified locus within the three-mile limit, contrary to the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act, 1889, section 6, as amended by the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act, 1890, section 3, and secondly, with having on the same date and at the same place refused "to comply with the directions lawfully given by William Angus, commander of the Fishery cruiser 'Freya' to proceed to Cromarty with the said trawler 'Nestor,' contrary to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, section 14, subsection 2." *

HIGH COURT. (Full Bench.) Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Dundas. Lord Salvesen. Lord Mackenzie. Ld. Anderson.

June 6, 1914.

Gordon v. Hansen.

On 29th January 1914 the Honorary Sheriff-substitute (Hugh Stewart) found the charges not proven.

The prosecutor obtained a stated case on appeal.

The case set forth:—"The material facts proved were as follows:—The 'Freya' was lying off Cromarty when the commander, Captain Angus, saw a trawler from 5 to 6 miles off steaming up the firth at about three miles an hour, and apparently within the 3-miles limit. Suspecting that she was trawling, he went in pursuit and came up with her at the place stated in the complaint. He hailed certain persons on deck through a megaphone that they were trawling within the prescribed limits, and ordered them to go to Cromarty, and he was answered by a man on board whom he did not recognise, but who was afterwards proved to be Karl Rolander, the fishing master on board the trawler, that they were not trawling, and that they would not go to Cromarty. Captain Angus stated that the sea was too rough to send a boat to the trawler to put men on board, and in this he was supported by the second officer, James Murray Logan, and John Stenhouse Grant, leading seaman; that what appeared to be warps were over the starboard side of the trawler and into the sea, and taut as if attached to a heavy weight; that a man came on deck with a buoy, and threw the buoy into the sea, when the warps disappeared. It

---

* The Sea Fisheries Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 22), which by sec. 7 makes it an offence for a foreign fishing boat to fish within the three-mile limit, enacts:—

Sec. 12. "For the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this Act and of any Order in Council under this Act or under the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, as amended by this Act, a British sea-fishery officer may with respect to any sea-fishing boat within the exclusive limits of the British Islands and with respect to any British sea-fishing boat outside of those limits, exercise the following powers;

. . . . . .

"(4) He may require the master to appear and give any explanation concerning his boat and her crew, and any person on board his boat. . . .

"(7) He may make any examination or inquiry which he deems necessary to ascertain whether any contravention of the provisions of this Act, or of any such Order of Council as aforesaid, has been committed. . . .

"(8) In the case of any person who appears to him to have committed any such contravention he may, without summons, warrant, or other process, both take the offender and the boat to which he belongs and the crew thereof to the nearest or most convenient port, and bring him or them before a competent Court, and detain him, it, and them in the port until the alleged contravention has been adjudicated upon."

Sec. 14 (2). "If any person obstructs any sea-fishery officer in acting under the powers conferred by this Act, or refuses or neglects to comply with any requisition or direction lawfully made or given by, or to answer any question lawfully asked by, any sea-fishery officer in pursuance of this Act, such person shall be liable" to a penalty.

was proved that the trawler steamed off immediately after said order was given, that the 'Freya' followed the trawler and again informed those on board that they had been trawling within the prescribed limits, and further asked those on board of her to take her to Cromarty, and that the same man again refused; that respondent heard this order being made, but did not comply with it; that the commander of the 'Freya' returned and picked up the buoy already referred to, but the rope attaching it, whatever it was attached to, broke; that, not having grappling irons, he fished with a light anchor for the space of an hour or thereby, but found neither trawl nor warps. On the Tuesday following (2nd December) the 'Freya' returned and again fished with an anchor for the trawl which the commander believed had been cut adrift, but no trace was found. It was not proved that the commander of the 'Freya' intimated to the respondent or to anyone else that he wished to go on board or put men on board the trawler, although it was proved that the fishing master said, 'No one will board this boat,' which statement was made after Captain Angus (the commander) showed some signs of launching a boat. It was proved that the respondent heard the answers given by the fishing master, and did not object to them, but it was not proved that Captain Angus (the commander) had addressed the respondent individually, nor was it proved that the 'Nestor' (the trawler) was actually trawling. It was sworn to by the captain and the fishing master of the trawler, and by Harry Klein, that they had no starboard trawl on the trawler, as it had been lost the night before off Wick, and that they had no trawl in the sea and no warps over the starboard side. It was admitted that on the date libelled the respondent was the master or skipper on board the said 'Nestor,' but there was also on board the 'Nestor' Karl Rolander as fishing master; that the said 'Nestor' when at the locus set forth in the complaint was 1⅛ miles from low-water mark of the coast in the parish of Dyke and Moy, Elginshire. The Sheriff found on the evidence that the first charge was not proved. With regard to the second charge the Sheriff decided that inasmuch as the charge of illegal trawling was not proven, and the appellant had not shown that the commander of the 'Freya' had the right on any other ground to order the respondent to take his vessel to Cromarty, the respondent must be held not to have been acting illegally, when the order to go to Cromarty was given, in failing to obey that order, and he was not bound to obey that order, even if it had been proved that the order had been given to him personally, which it was not, although it was given to the fishing master in his hearing. It was contended by the appellant that the order was lawful, and that respondent was bound to obey it, whatever the finding of a Court of law might be as to the matters contained in the first charge. The contrary was maintained on behalf of respondent."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Whether the order given by the commander of the 'Freya' to the respondent to go to Cromarty was lawfully and effectually given? (2) Whether the respondent was guilty of an offence under section 14 (2) of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, in not going to Cromarty in compliance with said order? (3) Whether on the facts stated the Sheriff should have convicted the respondent of the second charge contained in the complaint?"

June 6, 1914.

Gordon v. Hansen.

The case was heard before the High Court on 18th May 1914, when it was remitted to a full bench by whom it was heard on 1st June 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The accused ought to have been convicted upon the second charge, viz., that of refusing to obey the lawful order of the Fishery officer. The only question in the case was whether the order given was lawful. The Sheriff-substitute had held that the order was unlawful because the master had after trial been acquitted upon the main charge. That ground of judgment was indefensible, and was not supported by the respondent, it being now admitted that the officer was entitled to issue any lawful order provided he had reasonable grounds for suspecting that an offence was being committed, and, further, that the ultimate result of the trial for that offence did not affect the question. On the facts found by the Sheriff-substitute the officer had clearly reasonable ground for suspicion. The real point in the case was one to which the Sheriff-substitute's attention had apparently not been directed, viz., Was the officer entitled to order the trawler to go to Cromarty, when the word used in section 12, subsection (8), was "take"? He clearly was entitled to give the order. The word "take," reasonably construed, covered and included an order to "go." It could not be imagined that the Legislature intended that every offending vessel had to be towed by the Fishery cruiser into harbour without any assistance from her own engines, gear, officers, or crew; but this was what was logically involved in the pedantically strict interpretation of the word "take" contended for by the respondent. If the remainder of the subsection were construed in the same spirit, the Fishery officer would in person have to conduct the offending master into Court, and would in person have to see that he remained in harbour until the trial was concluded. It was clear that subsection (8) covered any reasonable order to precede, accompany, or follow into harbour. Even, however, if the word "take" in section 12 was to be strictly read, the order was still lawful. The powers conferred by section 12 were not exhaustive of the powers of the Fishery officer, and subsection 2 of section 14 impliedly conferred a power to give reasonable directions and to ask reasonable questions. Further, the same subsection made it an offence to obstruct a Fishery officer, and the respondent's conduct was obstruction of the most obvious kind.

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent did not maintain that the view of the Sheriff-substitute that the lawfulness of the order depended upon the result of the trial could be supported. If an order were otherwise unobjectionable, it was sufficient if the Fishery officer had reasonable grounds for his suspicions. In the present case, however, he had not, or at anyrate there was no finding by the Sheriff-substitute that his suspicions were reasonable. Accordingly, upon this independent ground it should be held that the order was illegal. But in any event the order to "go" to Cromarty was per se illegal, and accordingly the person who had disobeyed it had not contravened section 14, subsection 2, either by obstructing an officer "acting under the powers conferred by this Act" or by refusing to "comply with any requisition or direction lawfully made or given by . . . any sea-fishery officer in pursuance of this Act." The only orders which could be "lawfully made" were orders which were sanctioned by the Act. Now the Act conferred no general power on an officer of issuing orders at his discretion, but, on the contrary, conferred by section 12 a very large number of special and widely different powers. That list of powers was obviously meant to be exhaustive, and the only powers referred to in section 14, subsection 2, were those enumerated in section 12. But section 12 did not authorise the order that had been given. "Take" clearly meant to arrest and convey to harbour, which was quite different from an order to "proceed" or to "go," the officer who gave the order perhaps not following himself for hours or days. The argument of the appellant postulated a right to order an offender to "wait" at the nearest port, but such a right was nowhere hinted at in the statute. A penal statute must always be strictly construed.

At advising on 6th June 1914,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—When this case first came before the Court it was thought advisable, in view of the fact that it was an appeal against an acquittal, and that the prosecution was directed against a foreigner, that it should be considered and disposed of by a full bench. But in sending it forward I did not, and I think my brethren did not, consider that it was a case of serious difficulty. The view I took at the first hearing was that there was ground for the appeal, and a consideration of the case after the second hearing has confirmed me in that opinion.

There were two charges against the accused—first, that he was guilty of trawling in an area of the sea within the three-mile limit, in which trawling was illegal, he not being in the service of or having the written authority of the Fishery Board, and that he so contravened section 6 of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act of 1889, as amended by section 3 of the subsequent Act of 1890. The second charge was one of refusing to comply with the directions lawfully given by the commander of the Fishery cruiser "Freya," contrary to section 14, subsection 2, of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, which is as follows—[His Lordship read the subsection].

No question of law arises in regard to the first charge. The Sheriff, as he was entitled to do, found that charge not proven, a conclusion which was not contrary to law, as the facts he found proved did not imply that an acquittal must be wrong in law. It is therefore only the second charge which requires to be dealt with. In dealing with it the Sheriff, as it appears to me, has fallen into error. He appears to have been of opinion that the legality of directions, given by the commander of a Fishery cruiser, depends upon whether the offence which that commander believes to have been committed is afterwards proved against the person whom the commander accuses and detains. This view is untenable. It is in order that persons reasonably suspected of offending against the Herring Fisheries Acts may be secured and brought to trial that the power of detention is given to the commander of a Fishery cruiser. Although the proof at a trial may fail, that in no way affects the legality of the action of the commander in taking steps to secure that the supposed offender shall be brought to trial. The Sheriff holds that the respondent was not bound to submit to directions of the commander, because it has turned out that there is not sufficient evidence for a conviction, and that, this being so, the respondent "must be held not to have been acting illegally when the order to go to Cromarty was given in failing to obey that order." I have no doubt or difficulty in holding that this judgment was erroneous. The right of the Fishery officer was to have the suspected person secured with his vessel, if it reasonably appeared to him that a breach of the law had been committed; and if he had that right, disobedience to his order was unlawful, and could not cease to have that character because a Court afterwards held that a case had not been made out. The offence was committed by the refusal, and nothing happening afterwards could make the lawful order that was disobeyed an unlawful order. Of course there might be a case where a commander's action was grossly oppressive, as if, without any ground of suspicion, and actuated by malice, he gave an order which had no justification whatever. When such a case occurs it can be dealt with. But here, where it cannot be suggested on the facts stated that the commander of the cruiser had not ground for taking action to bring the trawler's master to trial, the respondent's contention—which the Sheriff has given effect to—that he was entitled to sail away, when challenged with a view to his being brought in and subjected to trial, is obviously untenable.

June 6, 1914.

Gordon v. Hansen.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

But further, it is contended for the respondent that, assuming the right of the cruiser's commander to detain the trawler in the circumstances, the action which he in fact took was not such as to be covered by the powers given to him by the Act, and especially by section 14, subsection 2, of the Act of 1883. It does not appear that this point was dealt with by the Sheriff, although the form of the questions put may point to it. The contention is that the order given to the trawler to go to Cromarty was not an order that the master of the trawler was bound to obey. The circumstances were that owing to the roughness of the sea the cruiser could not board the trawler, but that the commander through the megaphone accused those on board of trawling in forbidden waters, and ordered the master to go to Cromarty, the nearest or at least the most convenient port. The question is, was that a lawful direction? I have no doubt that it was. It was in the circumstances the only way in which the cruiser's commander could carry out his duty of taking the suspected vessel to a place for the investigation of the charge before a Court, and I think that he was entitled to put an arrest on the vessel, and that, if the master of the vessel paid no regard to that arrest and steamed away, the master was offending against a legal seizure of his vessel. Just as a man may be arrested on the street by a constable accusing him and directing him to come with him to the police-office, and just as he is then under arrest although the policeman has not touched him, and just as he owes obedience to the officer and need only be taken by force if he tries to run away or refuses and resists, so it appears to me that the power to take and bring in a vessel includes the power to direct those on board to bring it in, and that if those on board steam away after receiving the order they are refusing to comply with an order lawfully and effectually given.

I would move your Lordships therefore to answer all the questions in the affirmative.

I would like to say further that the case is not properly stated for, as regards both the parties, the Sheriff states what witnesses said instead of giving the facts which he found proved. It is to be regretted that in both cases before the Court to-day there are instances of this mistaken practice, which is much too common.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion. The second charge in this complaint—with which alone we are concerned—is that the respondent refused to comply with the directions lawfully given by the commander of the "Freya" to proceed to Cromarty with his trawler, contrary to the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883, section 14, subsection 2. The Sheriff-substitute seems to have decided in the respondent's favour upon the ground that, inasmuch as the first charge—that of illegal trawling—was not proven, the respondent could not be held to have acted illegally in refusing to obey the direction given to him to go to Cromarty. I do not think this ground of judgment will do at all; and indeed it was not maintained at our bar. If it were well founded, no conviction under a charge such as we are considering could be obtained unless the accused were convicted of an antecedent offence. The respondent's main contention in this Court was that the direction was not lawfully given, inasmuch as the statute does not expressly authorise a commander to order a trawler to go to the nearest or most convenient port, but only to take or bring her there. This view is not, to my mind, in accordance with the fair reading and intendment of the Act. I think that, assuming that the commander had reasonable ground for believing that the respondent was engaged in illegal trawling, a direction given by him to the trawler to proceed to the most convenient port was a direction lawfully given. I hold it to be proved, though the case is not well stated upon the point, that the sea was too rough to enable the "Freya's" commander to put a boarding party on the trawler, and so take her forcibly to Cromarty. That he might legally have done so, if the condition of the sea had permitted the manœuvre, could not be seriously disputed; and I consider that, in these circumstances, the reasonable implication of the statute is that his direction that the trawler should proceed to Cromarty was lawfully given. I do not, however, wish it to be understood that I should have arrived at any different result even if the condition of the sea had been such as to make it possible (or easy) to board the trawler. The Sheriff-substitute ought, in my judgment, to have convicted.

LORD SALVESEN.—The question in this case, although of importance, appears to me to be free from difficulty. The ground on which the Sheriff found the second charge not proven is in my opinion unsound. The Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 confers by section 12 certain powers on British sea-fishery officers with regard, inter alia, to sea-fishing boats within the exclusive limits of the British Islands. These powers I take it were conferred with a view to ascertaining whether a contravention of the Act has been committed; and the legality of their exercise cannot depend upon whether a contravention is afterwards proved to have been committed. It was scarcely disputed that the commander of the "Freya" would have been acting lawfully if, when he found the "Nestor" apparently engaged in trawl fishing within the three-mile limit, he had boarded her and taken the boat with her crew to the nearest or most convenient port. All that the Act provides is that it shall appear to the sea-fishery officer that a contravention has been committed; in other words that he has reasonable grounds for honestly coming to such a conclusion. He may find on inquiry that he is unable to establish that any offence was committed, but that will not make his actings illegal.

June 6, 1914.

Gordon v. Hansen.

Lord Salvesen.

The question however remains whether there was evidence upon which the Sheriff-substitute was entitled to convict the accused under section 14 (2) of refusing or neglecting "to comply with any requisition or direction lawfully made or given by a sea-fishery officer." The facts found proved are to the effect that the commander of the "Freya" did not board the "Nestor" because it was not safe to do so in the then state of the weather, but that he ordered the "Nestor" to proceed to Cromarty, and that his order was not complied with although it was heard by the respondent. Was the order then lawfully given? It was contended that it was not so, on the ground that section 12 contains a complete enumeration of the powers conferred upon British sea-fishery officers. If this were so, I fail to see any reason why a refusal or neglect to comply with the direction given by the sea-fishery officer in pursuance of the Act should be made a separate offence from that of obstructing the sea-fishery officer in acting under the powers conferred by the Act. In my opinion the separate offence is created so as to cover inter alia the case of an order having to be given in circumstances where the specific powers conferred by section 12 cannot be exercised; as in a case where a boat is found trawling within the three-mile limit but owing to the state of the weather cannot be boarded. It is obvious however that the lawfulness of the order will depend upon circumstances. It must be given in pursuance of the Act; in other words for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act. An order to proceed to a distant port would not have been a lawful order; nor would an order to go to any port, if there was no reasonable ground to suppose that the master of the boat to whom the order was given had committed a contravention of the Act. In the present case however the order was to proceed to Cromarty, which as appears from the chart produced in evidence was, if not the nearest, at all events the most convenient port; and the combined circumstances that the "Nestor" was within a mile and a half of the land, that there were warps from her starboard side which were taut as if attached to a heavy weight, that a man on board came on deck with a buoy and threw the buoy into the sea when the warps disappeared, and that the master of the "Nestor" behaved as detailed in the case—all these circumstances taken together I think fully justified the commander of the "Freya" in giving the order which he did, even although it must now be held that in fact the "Nestor" was not illegally trawling at the time. I think it is matter of fair implication that a person who has right to board a trawler and take it to the nearest or most convenient port is in the same circumstances entitled to order the boat to proceed to such port, especially where the weather or other cause prevents him from boarding her, and that the master of a boat who refuses to obey the order commits a contravention of section 14 (2). I am therefore for answering the first two questions in the affirmative; and remitting to the Sheriff to convict the respondent of the second charge contained in the complaint. June 6, 1914. Gordon v. Hansen.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I concur in the conclusion to which your Lordships have come, and I desire to make only one observation. I do not consider it necessary that there should be a finding that the sea was too rough to send a boat to the trawler to put a man on board. I should arrive at the same conclusion even if there were no finding to that effect. I regard the provisions of subsection 2 of section 14 of the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883 as being ancillary to the powers conferred by section 12.

LORD ANDERSON.—The important question raised by this stated case is what is the meaning of section 14 (2) of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1883? The Sheriff-substitute acquitted the respondent of a charge, brought under that subsection, of having refused to comply with the direction lawfully given by the commander of the British Fishery cruiser "Freya" to proceed to Cromarty with the trawler "Nestor" of which the respondent was captain. The contention of the Crown is that, in the circumstances disclosed in the stated case, the said direction was lawfully given and that the respondent ought to have been convicted for failing to comply with it.

The respondent contended that, in order to ascertain what is a lawful direction, it is necessary to refer to the provisions of section 12, that section 12 sets forth a list or code of powers which is exhaustive, and that the power to direct a sea-fishing boat to proceed to a port is not embraced therein. The rejoinder of the Crown to this argument was that, if reference must be made to section 12, the necessary power is to be found in subsection 8 thereof which authorises the sea-fishery officer to "take" the sea-fishing boat to the nearest or most convenient port. It was maintained for the Crown that this power to "take" involves the right to order the sea-fishing boat to go. I have difficulty in accepting this contention, and I am not prepared to assent to the proposition that it is the same thing to take a boat to a port and to order a boat to go there.

I have, however, reached the conclusion that it is not essential to refer to the provisions of section 12 at all in determining the question which is before us. The scheme of this part of the Act, which provides for the enforcement of its provisions, is to specify, in section 12, a number of particular acts which a sea-fishery officer may do, and then, in section 14 (2), to set forth a penalty for obstructing the officer in doing any of these particular acts. But it is only the first clause of that subsection which deals with this matter of obstruction. The subsection does not stop there, but goes on to confer on the officer two additional powers of a general nature, to wit, (1) a power to give lawful directions, and (2) a power to ask lawful questions. In my opinion these are new and independent powers which have no relation to, or necessary connection with, the specific powers set forth in section 12. These new powers are expressed in the most general terms, and seem to endow the officer with a very wide discretion. The limitations on the exercise of that discretion are these—(1) the direction can only be given by sea-fishery officers, among whom the commander of a Fishery cruiser is included; (2) the officer must, at the time, be acting in pursuance of the statute, that is, in the ordinary case, he must be dealing with a sea-fishing boat in territorial waters; and (3) the direction must be lawfully given.

June 6, 1914.

Gordon v. Hansen.

Ld. Anderson.

As to the last point, to wit, when a direction may be said to be lawfully given, it seems to me that there are two distinct tests which must be satisfied—(a) the officer must have reasonable grounds for issuing a direction; and (b) the particular direction given must be reasonable in the circumstances in which it falls to be complied with. I recognise that this construction is open to the formidable criticism which the respondent's counsel levelled against it—that it makes the officer the creator, in a sense, of the offence against which the penalty enacted by the subsection is directed. But, if my interpretation of the subsection is correct, that is just what the Legislature has enacted, and it is our duty to give effect to the obvious intention of the enacting body. If this construction is sound, I am of opinion that the two tests I have mentioned are satisfied in the present case. It appears from the stated case that the commander of the cruiser saw, or thought he saw, the trawler engaged in trawling within the three-mile limit. These were circumstances in which it seems to me he was justified in issuing a direction. I am also of opinion that, in directing the trawler to proceed to Cromarty, which was only a few miles distant, and which was the nearest, or at all events the most convenient, port, the commander of the cruiser gave a direction which, in the circumstances, was reasonable, and which should have been complied with.

The only other observation I desire to make is as to the law laid down by the Sheriff-substitute in the stated case. He seems to consider it necessary, in order to a conviction under section 14 (2), that a conviction of another offence should have been antecedently or concurrently obtained. I think that this view is unsound, and am of opinion that there may be a conviction under this subsection although no other offence has been proved.

I therefore agree that the questions should be answered as suggested by your Lordship.

Lord Justice-General.—I agree with all your Lordships, but I desire to associate myself expressly with the opinion which has been delivered by Lord Mackenzie. We are here deciding a question of general interest, viz., whether a direction given by a British sea-fishery officer may be lawful within the meaning of the statute of 1883 although it is not sanctioned in express terms by that statute, or, to put it otherwise, whether or no the list of powers given in section 12 is exhaustive of the directions which may lawfully be given under the statute? I answer this latter question, as your Lordships do, in the negative; but, for my part, I desire to lay down no hard and fast rule to the effect that an order such as this may only lawfully be given when the weather is heavy and the operation of boarding, therefore, risky. There may be other circumstances in which such an order as was given by the sea-fishery officer in this case may be justified under the statute. But, to be a legal direction under the statute, I am very clearly of opinion that the direction must be to proceed to the nearest or most convenient port, and that it would be a complete defence to this complaint if it could be established to the satisfaction of the tribunal trying the case that the port, to which the order to proceed was given, was not the most convenient or the nearest port, as the case may be.

We shall, therefore, follow the proposal made by the Lord Justice-Clerk, and answer all the questions in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the questions of law in the affirmative, and sustained the appeal.

SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—ALEX. MORISON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 20.

June 6, 1914.

JOHN BOYD KINNEAR, Appellant.—D. P. Fleming.
GEORGE BRANDER (Procurator-Fiscal of Fife and Kinross), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Morton, A.-D.

Kinnear v. Brander.

Insurance—National Insurance—Failure to pay contributions—Proof—Sufficiency of evidence—Ordinary and emergency cards—Separate charges—Evidence of single witness to each charge—National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55)—Regulations (1913), secs. 3 and 6.

An employer, charged with failure to pay the contributions due by him under the National Insurance Act, 1911, in respect of two servants in his employment, was convicted upon an admission in the witness-box, by each of the servants, that he did not get an insurance card (i.e., an ordinary card) stamped by the accused while in his service, and upon proof that the accused and the two servants had refused to give any information when interrogated by the representatives of the National Insurance Commissioners.

Held that the charge had not been proved as, even assuming that the evidence was sufficient to establish that no ordinary cards had been stamped, the prosecutor had failed to prove that the accused had not adopted the alternative course of stamping "emergency" cards.

Observations on the evidence required to prove a charge of failure to pay contributions under the National Insurance Act, 1911, and, in particular, upon the question whether the evidence of one servant that the employer had not stamped a card for him was evidence supporting a similar charge made against the accused with regard to another servant.

HIGH COURT. (Full Bench.) Lord Justice-General. Lord Justice-Clerk. Lord Dundas. Lord Salvesen. Lord Mackenzie. Ld. Anderson.

JOHN BOYD KINNEAR, Kinloch House, Collessie, Ladybank, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Fife and Kinross at Cupar, on a complaint at the instance of George Brander, procurator-fiscal of Fifeshire, with having failed to pay the weekly contributions payable by him under the National Insurance Act, 1911, between 13th January 1913 and 28th November 1913, in respect of Robert Macfarlane, an employed contributor in his service, in contravention of the National Insurance Act, 1911, section 4, Second Schedule, Part I.: Third Schedule; and sections 3 and 6 of the National Health Insurance (Collection of Contributions) Regulations (Scotland) 1913.* The complaint further charged him with a similar offence

* The Regulations provide, inter alia:—

Sec. 3. "Every contribution payable under Part I. of the Act shall, except as otherwise provided in these Regulations, be paid by the affixing

June 6, 1914.

Kinnear v. Brander.

relating to the same period with respect to John Crichton, another employed contributor in his service.

On 3rd February 1914 the Sheriff-substitute (Armour-Hannay) found the accused guilty and imposed a fine.

The accused obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth that at the trial "evidence was led on behalf of the complainer, the appellant not tendering any evidence. The following witnesses were examined on behalf of the complainer:—1. David Gerrand, assistant law-agent of the Commissioners. 2. Alexander Smith, depute head of Approved Society Branch. 3. William Leitch, Dundee, inspector of the Eastern District of Scotland. 4. James Thomson, Dundee, assistant inspector of the Eastern District. 5. Robert Macfarlane, grieve, Kinloch Home Farm, and 6. John Crichton, Trafalgar Cottages, Collessie, Ladybank. It was proved that the appellant had been repeatedly written to on behalf of the National Health Insurance Commissioners for Scotland in respect of the non-payment of contributions under the Act, but the appellant refused all information. On 10th February 1913 two inspectors under the Act saw the accused outside his residence and asked him if he had carried out his duties under the National Insurance Act as an employer, but the appellant refused to give any information. On the same day the two servants, Robert Macfarlane and John Crichton, were also interviewed, but they refused to give any information, and referred the inspectors to the accused. Each of the servants admitted in the witness-box that he did not get an insurance card stamped by the appellant while in his service. No evidence was led by the appellant to show that either of the servants had failed to deliver up a card for the purpose of being stamped, or that he (the appellant) had obtained an 'emergency card' in terms of the National Health Insurance (Collection of Contributions) Regulations (Scotland), 1913, section 6 (1) (c). The servant Robert Macfarlane, in reply to the Procurator-fiscal, stated that he knew nothing about whether an 'emergency card' had been stamped by the appellant for him. On the evidence adduced I found the appellant guilty as libelled, and fined him four pounds as a cumulo penalty."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Was the evidence legally sufficient to convict? (2) Was it necessary for the Procurator-fiscal to prove that an 'emergency card' had not been procured and stamped by the accused?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 18th May 1914, of a stamp to the card of the contributor in the space indicated for that purpose upon the card."

---

Sec. 6. "(1) An employer . . . shall pay . . . contributions . . . in accordance with the following provisions . . . (a) he shall, before paying to the contributor the wages . . . affix to the card of the contributor a stamp or stamps in payment of the contributions due . . . (c) Where an employed contributor fails to deliver up to his employer a card for the purpose of being stamped under these Regulations, the employer shall pay any contribution payable in respect of him by affixing a stamp to a card, to be obtained for the purpose from a postmaster (in these Regulations called an 'emergency card'), and by delivering the emergency card forthwith to the contributor duly stamped, and the contributor shall thereupon receive the same."

and was remitted to a full bench, before which it was heard on 1st June 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The conviction was bad, because the case against the accused had not been established. There were two methods of paying contributions under the Regulations, viz., by means of the ordinary card, and by means of the "emergency card." Assuming for the moment that the prosecutor had proved that the first of these methods had not been employed, he had not proved that payment had not been made by an "emergency card," and accordingly his case was obviously incomplete. The duty of proving his case lay upon the prosecutor, and there was no foundation whatever for the contention of the Solicitor-General that, if the prosecutor proved that an ordinary card had not been used, the onus then shifted on to the accused to prove affirmatively that he had used an emergency card. But, in any case, the prosecutor had not even established that payment had not been made in the ordinary way by the ordinary card. The evidence was entirely incomplete. The fact that the accused had refused to give the Commissioners any information could not be used against him, it being a cardinal rule of law that a person suspected of, or charged with, a crime was not bound to say anything which might incriminate himself. Further, no evidence had been adduced to show that the insurance authorities had searched for cards and found none. The result, accordingly, was that the only evidence in the case was the admission of each servant that he did not get a card stamped by the employer. Each of them, however, only spoke to his own case. Therefore, there was only one witness to establish each charge against the accused; and the evidence of a single witness was not, except where expressly provided by statute, sufficient to establish guilt.[1] It was true that in the case of a continuing crime one witness to each of its phases or stages might suffice.[2] But here there were two offences and two charges, which might have been brought by separate complaints, and the fact that no card had been stamped for Macfarlane was not evidence that no card had been stamped for Crichton. The evidence of one witness to a charge was not corroborated by evidence bearing upon a similar but different charge.[3]

Argued for the respondent;—The statement of the servants that they "did not get an insurance card" was broad enough to cover emergency as well as ordinary cards. But, if it was not, it did not matter, because, if the prosecutor proved that payment had not been made in the ordinary way by the ordinary card, it lay upon the accused to establish that the extraordinary method had been adopted. The other criticisms of the appellant with regard to the sufficiency of the evidence were also unfounded. There was really only one charge against the accused, viz., a failure to comply with the provisions of the Insurance Act, and the evidence of both the servants was relevant to establish that charge. The crime was a continuing one, with a number of instances all connected together

[1] Ewing v. Cullen, [1833] 6 W. & S. 566, at p. 577.

[2] Alison's Criminal Law, vol. ii., p. 552; Hume on Crimes, (3rd ed.) vol. ii., p. 385; Dickson on Evidence (Grierson's Edition), pars. 1807, 1808, 1809; Macdonald's Criminal Law, (3rd ed.) p. 497.

[3] A v. B, (1895) 22 R. 402; H. v. P., (1905) 8 F. 232; Inglis v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, 1909 S. C. 1038.

June 6, 1914.

Kinnear v. Brander.

and forming part of one and the same criminal conduct, and therefore two witnesses to each instance were unnecessary.[1] Even if the complaint were regarded as making two separate charges the evidence was quite sufficient. One witness, corroborated by circumstances, was sufficient legal proof.[2] Here there were ample corroborative circumstances in the fact that no insurance cards had been produced, the obvious method of showing that payments had been made, and in the conduct of the accused and of his servants towards the insurance authorities, which was entirely inconsistent with payments having been made. The criminal acts in the two cases were repeated and were of a precisely similar nature, and accordingly, even if the charges were separate, each threw a light upon the other. Where an employer was charged with failing at a certain date to pay a certain contribution due in respect of one of his employees, the appellant would apparently argue that no corroboration would be derived from the statements of fifty other employees, similarly situated, that he had failed at the same date to pay similar contributions due in their respect. Such a contention was absurd.

At advising on 6th June 1914,—

LORD DUNDAS.—The appellant was prosecuted in the Sheriff Court at Cupar for having failed to pay certain contributions payable under the Insurance Act in respect of two of his servants, being employed contributors, during the periods specified in the complaint. The prosecutor's task was thus, ex necessitate rei, to prove a negative. The Sheriff-substitute convicted the appellant, and we are asked to decide whether the evidence adduced was "legally sufficient to convict"? In deciding that question we must proceed upon the evidence which is laid before us as the basis of the legal question, and must assume that the learned judge by whom the case is stated has given us the whole material facts, admitted or proved, upon which he decided to convict.

So far as the case discloses, the proof led by the Procurator-fiscal was of a most meagre description. He examined six witnesses; but I gather from the stated case that the evidence of the first four of these merely went to show that, prior to the raising of proceedings, the appellant had been repeatedly written to on behalf of the Insurance Commissioners in respect of non-payment of contributions under the Act, but refused all information; that, when two inspectors under the Act saw him outside his house and asked him if he had carried out his duties under the Act, he refused to give any information; and that, on the latter occasion, the two servants in question, Macfarlane and Crichton, were interviewed, but refused to give any information and referred the inspectors to the appellant. I do not think this evidence advanced the prosecutor's case to any material extent. I take it that the appellant was under no legal obligation to furnish information to the Insurance Commissioners, personally or through his servants, in regard to any proceedings the Commissioners might think fit to institute against him for non-compliance with the Act. The two other witnesses were the appellant's servants, Macfarlane and Crichton. All that we learn from the stated case as to their evidence is that "each of the servants admitted in the witness-box that he did not get an insurance card stamped by the appellant while in his service." Upon this evidence the conviction followed.

[1] Counsel referred to the authorities enumerated in footnote [2], p. 143 supra; and also cited Milton, (1667) M. 12,636; Landles v. Gray, (1816) 1 Murray's Reps. 79, at p. 81; M'Kenzie v. Ewing, (1832) 10 S. 497; Dombrowitzki v. Dombrowitzki, (1895) 22 R. 906.

[2] Ramsay v. Nairne, (1833) 11 S. 1033.

The case, therefore, for the prosecution seems to have consisted solely of the testimony, to the effect just quoted, of one witness in support of each of the separate charges contained in the complaint. I am unable to hold that there was sufficient legal evidence to support the conviction. The testimony of one witness, uncorroborated, is not enough to prove a charge in a case of this sort, which is a quasi-criminal one, unless the statute creating the offence shall so provide. I am not at all convinced that the evidence of each of these two witnesses can be taken, as was argued for the Crown, to corroborate the evidence of the other, and I cannot find in the stated case any trace of extraneous corroboration of the testimony of either of them; but, even if one accepts the argument of the Crown, the conjoined evidence of the two witnesses would not, in my judgment, amount to proof of the charges laid in the complaint. It was urged on behalf of the prosecutor that, if the evidence here were held to be insufficient, the Procurator-fiscal would in many cases be unable to secure a conviction. This general argument did not, I confess, greatly move me. If the Act is, to some extent, ineffective, that does not appear to me to be the concern of the Court; our duty is not to fortify, but to construe, the language of Acts of Parliament. The Legislature has in many cases provided, for example, that the evidence of one credible witness shall be sufficient to establish a statutory charge (see Dickson on Evidence, sec. 1813, and note); and there are other cases where the burden is to some extent imposed by statute upon the accused to rebut presumptions adverse to him; but the Legislature has not, in the present case, thought fit to adopt these, or the like, expedients. I am not, however, at all satisfied that the prosecution might not have, at least, bettered its case if it had taken proper care to do so. The charges against the appellant are that he failed to pay certain contributions. No direct evidence was adduced to show that the Commissioners have not, in fact, received the contributions. Again, beyond the single "admission" which appears to have been elicited from the witnesses Macfarlane and Crichton, there seems to have been no attempt made to discover whether or not, in point of fact, either of these witnesses, on entering the appellant's service, took out a contribution card from an approved society or from the postmaster; and if so, whether the appellant ever required the servant to produce it to him. If such cards, or card, were in existence, and unstamped, the case for the prosecution might have assumed a different aspect. But apart from these considerations, which are more or less speculative, I am unable to affirm that, as matters are presented to us upon the stated case, there was legal evidence to warrant the conviction. The first question must, therefore, in my opinion, be answered in the negative. I confess that I reach this conclusion with reluctance, because one cannot avoid the impression that the appellant has been evading his duty under the Act. If he has in fact complied with that duty, nothing would have been easier than that he should have produced evidence of his compliance. But he was not bound to go into the witness-box; and I do not think that an adverse inference can be drawn from his not doing so, as I rather think the Sheriff-substitute has drawn it, though such an inference might have been quite legitimate in a purely civil case. The question is put to us as a question of law; and the Court is bound to see to it that no conviction is sustained which is not supported by legal evidence.

June 6, 1914.

Kinnear v. Brander.

Lord Dundas.

If the above views are correct, the second question put to us is of no direct importance in the present case; but it seems right that we should answer it for the guidance of future prosecutions under the Act. The appellant is charged with failure to pay contributions legally due in respect of his two servants. One mode by which the contributions might be paid was by means of an emergency card taken out by the employer, in terms of section 6 (1) (c) of the Regulations, stamped by him, and delivered to the contributor. As already pointed out, the prosecution (in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary) is put to prove a negative; and it is, therefore, in my judgment, for the prosecutor to exhaust the problem by establishing, as part of his case, that the mode of payment above indicated has not in fact been resorted to. He has not, so far as I see, established this. The Solicitor-General insisted that the "admission" by each of the two servants "that he did not get an insurance card stamped by the appellant while in his service" applied, according to its true import, to emergency, as well as to ordinary, contribution cards. If that were so, it is difficult to understand the introduction into the stated case of the passage about Macfarlane who "in reply to the Procurator-fiscal, stated that he knew nothing about whether an emergency card had been stamped by the appellant for him"; and impossible (to my mind) to account for the fact that the learned Judge has stated the second question for our consideration. I think we ought to answer that question in the affirmative.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—The opinion which Lord Dundas has just delivered so entirely expresses the views I hold in this case that it would be superfluous for me to add anything.

Lord Salvesen.—In this case two charges were preferred against the appellant of failing to pay the contributions due under the National Insurance Act, and relative Regulations, in respect of two of his servants. The Sheriff-substitute found both the charges proved; and he has stated the facts on which he proceeded. We are bound to assume that he has stated all the facts which he considered relevant. The question for us is whether the facts so found are sufficient to support the conviction. In my opinion they are not.

It may well be that the appellant had really no case on the merits; but he took up the attitude that every accused is entitled to take up of refusing to give any information, and of requiring that sufficient evidence shall be adduced to prove the offences with which he is charged. Now the only facts which were proved in evidence were that the appellant had been repeatedly written to on behalf of the National Insurance Commissioners for Scotland in respect of non-payment of contributions under the Act and had refused all information; that he gave the same answer to two inspectors who called upon him and asked him if he had carried out his duties under the Act as an employer; that each of the two servants stated in the witness-box "that he had not got an insurance card stamped by the appellant while in his service." This latter statement is open to the construction that the servants neither gave an insurance card to the appellant to be stamped nor received from him an emergency card which he had stamped on their behalf. If this were the true construction of the finding I am not prepared to say that the evidence would not have been sufficient. As at present advised I think that the statement of a servant that the employer did not stamp any insurance card on his behalf might be corroboration of the charge made with reference to another servant. But it is plain from the subsequent part of the Sheriff-substitute's statement that the evidence given by the servants related only to insurance cards which it was their primary duty to obtain and present to the appellant to be stamped; and that no evidence was led to exclude the view that the appellant might have obtained an emergency card and duly stamped it. Were it otherwise I cannot conceive that the Sheriff-substitute should have put to us the question "Was it necessary for the Procurator-fiscal to prove that an emergency card had not been procured and stamped by the accused." This is undoubtedly a way in which an employer can discharge his duty under the Act; and if there is no evidence to exclude his having done so the conviction against him cannot stand.

I desire to add that it appears to me that, assuming the case against the appellant to be well founded in fact, it would have been very easy to have established it by the witnesses adduced. The National Insurance Commissioners must have the means of knowing whether a particular employer has or has not paid his contributions under the Act. If they do not find amongst their files cards applicable to a particular employer, their statement in the witness-box to that effect would be prima facie evidence of non-payment. If in addition they cited the servants in question and these deponed that no deduction was made from their wages and that no stamped card of any kind was given to them by their employer, the case would appear to be complete in the absence of any evidence led on behalf of the accused. I presume such evidence must have been available to the prosecutor, for I cannot understand a demand for payment of the contributions unless the files had first been searched to ascertain whether the appellant had complied with the Act; and it would have been as easy to address a question to the servants on the subject of the emergency card as on the subject of the ordinary card which it was their duty in the first instance to take out and hand to the employer for the purpose of its being stamped. I regret that I am unable to affirm the conviction; but the failure of the prosecutor to adduce the evidence that I have referred to leaves me no option.

Lord Mackenzie.—In my opinion the second question should be answered in the affirmative, and it follows that the answer to the first ought to be in the negative. The offence with which the appellant was charged was failure to pay contributions. These contributions may be paid either by fixing a stamp to the card of the contributor, or by fixing a stamp to an emergency card. As I read the case there is no evidence whatever as regards the emergency card. That that must have been the view of the learned Sheriff-substitute I think is plain, otherwise he would not have proponed the second question for our consideration. I think the matter may be brought to a very simple test—if a complaint had been served upon the appellant charging him with failure to pay contributions under the Insurance Act inasmuch as he had failed to affix a stamp on the card of the contributor, and if the complaint had stopped there, the complaint would have been irrelevant because it would not have exhausted the modes in which payment might have been made. I regard the evidence in this case as leaving the matter in exactly the same position. The Insurance Commissioners have failed—or the Procurator-fiscal as acting on their behalf has failed—to discharge the onus which lies upon the prosecution to complete the negative evidence necessary to its success.

June 6, 1914.

Kinnear v. Brander.

Lord Mackenzie.

That being my view, I do not think it necessary to express an opinion upon the argument expressly directed to the first question Speaking for my own part, I much doubt whether, in any future prosecution, the matter can be advanced by putting an officer of the Insurance Commissioners into the box to say that he has made a search for cards and that he has failed to find them. I think the Solicitor-General pointed out that that would be by no means conclusive of the matter, as non constat, even if that were said, that the cards were never taken out and stamped.

Lord Anderson.—I had some difficulty in regard to this case at the first hearing. My doubt was as to whether the appellant, under the guise of a question of law, was not really inviting us to review the Sheriff-substitute's decision on the facts. I have, however, reached the conclusion, with your Lordships, that the first question raises what is undoubtedly a point of law. It is a question of law, for the determination of this Court, whether the general conclusion in law which the Sheriff-substitute has reached, is justified by the facts which he has held to be proved. In submitting such a question the Sheriff-substitute ought to state all the facts which have influenced him in reaching his conclusion, and we are bound to assume that he has done so in this stated case. In stating the case, the Sheriff-substitute has fallen into the error, which has been the subject of frequent judicial animadversion, of setting forth what certain witnesses said, instead of stating the facts which were held to be proved. But, on the assumption that the Sheriff-substitute believed what these witnesses deponed, it is plain that there is not a sufficiency of legal evidence to support the conviction. The only material evidence set forth consists of what the two servants admitted as to stamped insurance cards not having been got from the appellant, and what the servant Robert Macfarlane said as to an emergency card. In my opinion this evidence is legally insufficient to convict.

The only point of general importance which emerged at the debate was whether the two servants could be held as corroborating each other in the testimony which they gave. Decisions were cited which had been pronounced in civil actions, but it is probably unsafe to apply these to criminal procedure, where the rules of evidence are more stringently enforced. I therefore do not propose to examine these authorities. With reference to criminal procedure, Hume (ii. 385) states that the evidence of single witnesses has been held sufficient to establish separate acts of the same kind. Hume refers to a case of attempt to suborn, in which the libel charged a number of instances which had happened at different times and places and with different persons. Each fact was proved by only one witness, but this was held sufficient to warrant conviction of the whole charges. Alison (ii. 552) states that "where a number of instances of the same crime are charged under one general denomination, and connected together, and forming part of one and the same criminal conduct, as subornation, adultery, &c., each separate act may be competently established by the evidence of a single witness, as each act is in truth nothing but the link by which the guilt upon the whole is established." This matter is also dealt with in the case of Lees v. Macdonald,[1] where the Lord Justice-Clerk says,[2] "Even apart from the statutory rule in cases of day trespass that one credible witness is sufficient, I am of opinion that in any case any fact can be proved by one witness, although the whole case cannot be so proved"; and Lord M'Laren says,[3] "The rule that two witnesses are required to prove the grounds of action or defence in civil or criminal proceedings has been, as I think, sometimes misunderstood. All that the law demands is that there should be two witnesses to prove a case; and, provided that is so, any fact in the case may be proved by the testimony of one credible witness."

Applying these authorities to the present case it seems to me that although the complaint apparently contains two distinct charges, it may fairly be regarded as setting forth a general charge of failure to pay the insurance contributions due in respect of the two servants. The two branches of the complaint libel the same species facti—in locus, time, and modus. I should therefore have been prepared to hold, in this case, that the two servants might have been taken as corroborative of one another, and, if they had said enough, that the case would have been proved on their evidence alone.

I have nothing to add to what has fallen from your Lordship as to the second question, and, as regards both questions, I agree that they should be answered as suggested by your Lordship.

Lord Justice-General.—My opinion in this case rests on the identical ground adopted by Lord Mackenzie. This statute prescribes two modes by which an employer may pay his contributions—(first) when paying the servant's wages, he may affix to the servant's insurance card stamps denoting the amount of contributions due. That may be called the usual mode of payment. (Second) if the servant fails to deliver his insurance

[1] (1893) 20 R. (J.) 55, 3 White, 468.
[2] 20 R. (J.), at p. 57.
[3] Ibid., at p. 58.

June 6, 1914.

Kinnear v. Brander.

Lord Justice-General.

card, the employer must then secure an emergency card, affix the stamps to it, and hand it to his servant, who is bound to receive it.

Now, I have formed no opinion and express none on the question whether or no the prosecutor has here negatived effectually the first or usual mode of payment. I am very clearly of opinion that there is no evidence at all to negative the second mode of payment, because I think it impossible to hold—as the Solicitor-General contended—that where the word used is "card" it includes both the servant's insurance card and the emergency card. As Lord Dundas has pointed out, the way the second question is stated quite precludes that view.

In my opinion, it is incumbent on the prosecutor, in order to secure a conviction under a complaint charging failure to pay contributions under the Insurance Act, effectually to negative both modes of payment prescribed under the statute. Accordingly, because I am now prepared to answer the second question in the affirmative, I am also prepared to answer the first question in the negative. We shall, therefore, answer the questions as has been proposed by Lord Dundas.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative and the second in the affirmative, and sustained the appeal.

TODS, MURRAY, & JAMIESON, W.S.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

No. 21.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

JAMES KEITH, LIMITED, Appellants.—Murray, K.C.—Keith.
WILLIAM DENNETT KIRKWOOD (Inspector of Factories), Respondent.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Gillon, A.-D.

Statutory Offences—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 22), sec. 149 (1), and Sixth Schedule, Part II. (28)—"Non-textile factory"—Bottling beer by machinery in wine merchant's premises—"Bottle washing works"—Washing bottles by machinery in wine merchant's premises.

On the first floor of premises occupied by a firm of wholesale and retail grocers, wine merchants, and Italian warehousemen, there was a portable bottle filling machine used for bottling beer, and on the ground floor another machine used for washing the firm's bottles, both machines being worked by electricity.

Held (1) that the premises on the first floor were not a "non-textile factory" within the meaning of sec. 149 (1) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, in respect that the process of bottling beer was neither an "adapting for sale of any article" nor a "manufacturing process"; (2) that the premises on the ground floor were not "bottle washing works" within the meaning of the same section and subsection and the Sixth Schedule, Part II. (28), in respect that the bottle washing was merely incidental to the firm's proper business.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Mackenzie. Ld. Anderson.

JAMES KEITH, LIMITED, were charged in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Hamilton on a complaint at the instance of William Dennett Kirkwood, His Majesty's Inspector of Factories, 74 York Street, Glasgow, that, being the occupiers of a factory at 86 Cadzow Street, Hamilton, within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, they failed, on 20th January 1914, to keep constantly affixed at the entrance to the said factory the prescribed abstract of the Act.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

The Sheriff-substitute (Shennan) having convicted the accused, they obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, the point at issue being whether the appellants were the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901.*

The case set forth that the following facts were admitted or proved:—"The appellants are wholesale and retail grocers and wine merchants and Italian warehousemen in Hamilton.

"Their premises extend to six storeys. In the lowest flat (ground floor) there are two cellars, containing respectively 1509 square feet and 1364 square feet. In the former there is a bottle washing machine, covering an area of 45½ square feet, which is worked by electricity. On the flat above this (first floor) there is a wine store extending to 1364 square feet, and a beer bottling department extending to 1509 square feet. In the latter there is a portable bottling machine, covering 12 square feet, worked by electricity. The next floor (second floor) is devoted to wine bins and to wine bottling, which is done without mechanical power. The floor above this (third floor) contains stores and cellars and a stout bottling department covering 208 square feet, the work here being also done without mechanical power. The fourth floor contains shop, saloon, and offices and loading premises. The highest floor (fifth floor) consists of stores. The conditions of employment are considerably more favourable than the Factory Acts require. The respondent treats the appellants' premises as a factory because of (1) the electrically driven bottle washing machine on the ground floor, and (2) the electrically driven beer bottling machine on the first floor. There was not evidence to show what proportion of the appellants' business the bottle washing represents. It is merely carried on incidentally to the business of wholesale and retail grocers and wine merchants and Italian warehousemen. It includes among much else the washing of bottles, which are afterwards filled by the appellants with wine or beer. Three women and one man work for about twenty-four hours and a half per week at bottle washing, and cleaning up the premises in which the bottle washing is carried on. Only bottles used in the appellants' business are washed, and the bottle washing is a mere ancillary branch of their business. The beer bottling machine on the first floor occupies an area of about 12 square feet, is moveable, and could be shifted to another

---

* The Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 22), enacts:—Sec. 149 (1). "Subject to the provisions of this section, the following expressions have in this Act the meanings hereby assigned to them, that is to say, . . . The expression 'non-textile factories' means . . . (b) any premises or places named in Part Two of the [Sixth] schedule wherein . . . mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there; and (c) any premises wherein . . . any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for purposes of gain in or incidental to any of the following purposes, namely—(i.) the making of any article or of part of any article; or (ii.) the altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing of any article; or (iii.) the adapting for sale of any article, and wherein . . . mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there. . . ."

Sixth Schedule.—List of Factories and Workshops.—Part II. Non-textile Factories and Workshops—(28) Dry cleaning, carpet beating, and bottle washing works.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

floor if the necessary electrical connection was made. There is a circular pan to which the beer is conveyed from the cask by gravitation. To this circular pan syphon tubes are attached, and the pan is revolved slowly by electrical power. A woman puts each empty bottle on to the syphon tube as the pan revolves. When the bottle is filled a man removes it and places it in a holder on an adjoining disc. This latter disc is revolved by electrical power by which also the bottle is corked, after which it is removed from the machine. The beer is simply bottled, no special treatment being applied to it. In this process the bottler does not alter the beer or "finish" it. He merely puts it under the conditions favourable to the development of certain qualities potential in the beer. Probably some process of fermentation takes place within the sealed bottles. Bottled beer is an article of commerce distinguished from draught beer. Draught beer is ready for drinking practically at once when sold. Bottled beer must be kept from six to eight weeks to mature before it is ready for consumption. The said beer bottling machine is used solely for the bottling of Bass's beer, the sale of which by the appellants constitutes about one-sixtieth part of their business. Bass's beer is never sold by the appellants by retail except in bottle."

The case further stated:—"On these facts I held (1) that no part of the appellants' premises were a bottle washing work within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the bottle washing being merely an ancillary part of their business, and (2) that the bottling of beer above described brought the appellants' premises (or part thereof) under the third category of branch (c) of the definition of non-textile factory contained in section 149 of the said Act, viz., 'The adapting for sale of any article.' I was of opinion that the proportion of the beer bottling work to the total business of the appellants was immaterial, and irrelevant to the question raised. Accordingly I convicted the appellants of a technical breach of the Act, and found them liable in £1, 3s. 6d. of expenses."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"1. Are the appellants' premises, or any part thereof (1) a bottle washing work within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901; or (2) a non-textile factory within the meaning of the said Act? 2. On the facts stated, was I right in convicting the appellants?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 1st June 1914.

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff had rightly held that no part of the premises was a bottle washing work within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901. The appellants were grocers and wine merchants and not bottle washers, the washing of bottles being purely ancillary to their ordinary business, in which a constant supply of clean bottles was a necessity. This question had been definitely settled in the appellants' favour by Kavanagh v. Caledonian Railway Company,[1] and Caledonian Railway Company v. Paterson.[2] The Sheriff, however, had erred in holding that the premises on the first floor where the beer was bottled constituted a non-textile factory within the meaning of the Act of 1901. The premises were indubitably a shop; and, if they were also a factory, then they came under both the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and the Shops Act, 1912,[1] and that meant a system of dual control, with incompatible regulations as to holidays, meal hours, and so forth, such as could never have been within the purpose of the Legislature. But if the Act were carefully considered it became clear that the premises were not a factory. To be a factory (i.e., a "non-textile" factory) the premises in this case must, under section 149 (1), be premises in which manual labour was exercised in "the adapting for sale" of an article in a "manufacturing process." Bottling beer, however, was not "adapting" beer. Adapting involved the idea of change and alteration in the article, whereas bottling was merely the transferring from one vessel to another. The fact that some chemical change might take place in the beer after bottling was quite immaterial. Further, it was clearly not a "manufacturing process"; and, as both these factors had to be present to constitute the premises a factory, the Sheriff's judgment was wrong. Moreover, this bottling of beer was a mere incident in the grocery business of the appellants, and the argument and authorities adduced to show that the ground floor was not a bottle washing works were equally apposite to negative the idea that the first floor was a non-textile factory.

[1] (1903) 5 F. 1128.

[2] (1898) 1 F. (J.) 24, 2 Adam 620; cf. Nash v. Hollinshead, [1901] 1 K. B. 700.

Argued for the respondent;—The fact that on the respondent's view there might be an overlapping of administration between those responsible for the administration of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and those responsible for the administration of the Shops Act, 1912, did not affect the question, because such overlapping was unavoidable and was clearly contemplated by the Legislature.[2] That in popular language no part of the premises would be described either as a "non-textile factory" or a "bottle washing works" was also beside the mark, because all the cases showed that the terms of the Act, and other kindred Acts, had to be strictly construed, although construction might lead to seemingly absurd results from a popular point of view, such as that a tripe-shop,[3] a shop where natural flowers were made into bouquets,[4] and a room where sweetmeats were made up into packets,[5] had all been held to be factories. Further, the whole premises, ground floor and first floor, must be taken together, the washing of the bottles and the bottling of the beer being all part of the same process. As regarded the bottling:—bottling beer was clearly "adapting" beer for sale. It was not simply transferring it from one receptacle to another. "Bottled beer" and "draught beer" were commercially and chemically different articles, and it was the process of bottling which produced the change. So in Henderson v. Corporation of Glasgow,[6] it was the sorting out of the refuse, as contrasted with the mere putting of it into carts, that brought the process there under the expression "adapting for sale." Bottling beer was much nearer to

[1] 2 and 3 Geo. V. cap. 3.
[2] E.g., Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, sec. 31 (4).
[3] Doswell v. Cowell, (1906) 95 L. T. 38, 22 T. L. R. 628.
[4] Hoare v. Robert Green, Limited, [1907] 2 K. B. 315.
[5] Fullers, Limited, v. Squire, [1901] 2 K. B. 209.
[6] (1900) 2 F. 1127.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

the popular idea of "adapting" than the processes already referred to in Hoare,[1] and Fullers, Limited.[2] In Law v. Graham,[3] Lord Alverstone stated that the very process here in question, viz., bottling, might be said to be adapting for sale, although he added that it was somewhat straining the words of the section. It was also in the same way a manufacturing process, and from the respondent's point of view compared in this respect favourably with the stone-dressing in Petrie v. Weir,[4] or the carpet-beating in Johnston v. Lalonde Brothers & Parham,[5] or the laundry in Owner v. Cottingham Sanitary Steam Laundry Company, Limited.[6] But in any event the words "manufacturing process" in the section[7] did not offer any stumbling block to the respondent, because they introduced nothing new but simply referred back to the three processes already described in the section, of which the third was the one here under consideration, viz., "adapting for sale." The only question, therefore, was, Was this adapting for sale?—for the "manufacturing process" was nothing more nor less than the adapting for sale. As to the ground floor premises they were clearly bottle washing works. A reference to any directory showed that bottle washing was not a separate industry; it was always part of some other business. Bottle washing here was an integral part of the appellants' business; without bottle washing the appellants could not have carried on one of the most important branches of their business, viz., the selling of wines and beer, which was a business which they held themselves out to conduct with anyone and everyone. This distinguished the case from those of Kavanagh[8] and Caledonian Railway v. Paterson,[9] where the hotel washed bottles and clothes on a very small scale and only for the service of the occupants of the hotel.

At advising on 9th June 1914,—

Lord Justice-General.—In this case we have had the advantage—denied, I observe, in more than one of the cases cited from the King's Bench—of listening to an excellent argument from both sides of the bar. The question we have to consider and decide is whether the appellants' premises fall within the Factory Acts, and that again resolves itself into two separate and distinct questions—(first) Do the premises on the first floor constitute a non-textile factory in the sense of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901? and (second) Do the premises on the ground floor constitute a bottle washing work in the sense of that statute?—for I cannot agree with the Solicitor-General, for the reason I shall presently give, that the premises on both the first and ground floors must be regarded as forming only one set of premises, and that the operations conducted on both these floors must be considered as forming only one operation in the sense of the statute.

The appellants are wholesale and retail grocers and wine merchants and Italian warehousemen in Hamilton. Their premises extend to six storeys. With the four uppermost storeys we are not concerned in this

[1] [1907] 2 K. B. 315.
[2] [1901] 2 K. B. 209.
[3] [1901] 2 K. B. 327, at p. 330.
[4] (1900) 2 F. 1041.
[5] [1912] 3 K. B. 218.
[6] (1910) 102 L. T. 571.
[7] 149 (1) (c) (iii.).
[8] 5 F. 1128.
[9] 1 F. (J.) 24, 2 Adam, 620.

case. But, on the first floor, it appears that there is a portable bottle filling machine where beer, taken from casks or other receptacles, is filled into bottles, the operation being conducted by means of a machine actuated by electricity.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

Lord Justice-General.

The question whether the first floor premises, because of the existence and the operation of this machine actuated by electricity, are a non-textile factory in the sense of the statute depends upon the construction to be placed upon section 149 (1) (c) (iii.), which, read short, is as follows:—Non-textile factory means any premises wherein any manual labour is exercised by way of trade incidental to adapting for sale any article, and wherein mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing processes carried on there. Now, it appears to me that there are two pre-requisites—statutory pre-requisites—to the inclusion of premises within the category of non-textile factory—(first) in the premises there must be manual labour exercised for the adaptation of articles for sale, and (second) the premises must be premises in which mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing processes carried on there. Accordingly, the first question we have to consider is whether, in premises where there is in use a machine for bottling beer such as is described in the case—in other words, a machine for transferring beer from one receptacle into another—there is in progress an adaptation of an article for sale, and (for it is not alternative) a manufacturing process aided by mechanical power.

I am of opinion that we have no such premises here; for I cannot assent to the argument that merely transferring an article from one receptacle into another can be said to be adapting it for sale. Reference was made to the case of Hoare v. Robert Green, Limited,[1] in the Court of King's Bench, and to Lord Alverstone's judgment where he said that, by straining the words of the Act, he could place such an interpretation upon the Act that this operation of transferring beer from one receptacle to another might be considered such an adaptation. We are not asked and we are not entitled, I think, to strain the words of this or of any other Act of Parliament. Our duty is to put a fair interpretation upon the words used by the Legislature. And, as I pointed out during the argument, if it were legitimate to strain the words of the Act of Parliament for the purpose of giving effect to what we had reason to believe was its purpose, this is not a case in which the Court is encouraged to take that course, because we are distinctly informed that the conditions of employment in these premises are considerably more favourable than the Factory Acts require. But it is upon a fair construction of the Act of Parliament that I consider that the transference of beer from one receptacle to another is not an adaptation of the article for sale. It appears to me that the case of Hoare[1] is a typical case of the adaptation of an article for sale, and, although the case of Fullers, Limited, v. Squire[2] is somewhat nearer the line, as Lord Alverstone pointed out, it is also a typical case. But, as was pointed out in the course of the argument, the case of Fullers, Limited,[2] related to a workshop and not to a factory, and accordingly the words to which I now come were not construed in Fullers, Limited.[2]

[1] [1907] 2 K. B. 315.

[2] [1901] 2 K. B. 209.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

Lord Justice-General.

The words I now come to are those at the conclusion of the clause—the premises must be premises wherein mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing processes. Now, I do not think that, in any reasonable sense of the word, it can be said that transferring an article from one receptacle to another is a manufacturing process. It was argued, no doubt, that carpet beating and laundry work were not manufacturing processes any more than transferring beer from a barrel to a bottle is a manufacturing process, and yet they are there in the Act of Parliament. But the answer is they are there per expressum, and if they were not there in express terms, they would not be included within the limits of the Factory Acts. I observe, therefore, that all the cases that have been cited to us seem to me to be in complete harmony with one another. I see no conflict in the decisions, and, following them and placing upon the words of this statute the plain ordinary meaning of language, I have come without hesitation to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong in finding the premises on the first floor to be a non-textile factory within the meaning of the statute.

The second question is whether we find here a bottle washing work on the ground floor? Now, we are not left to grope in the dark with reference to the operations conducted on the ground floor. We are told that the bottle washing is carried on merely incidentally to the business of wholesale and retail grocers and wine merchants. "It includes among much else the washing of bottles which are afterwards filled by the appellants with wine or beer." And again, "only bottles used in the appellants' business are washed, and the bottle washing is a mere ancillary branch of their business." In these circumstances, it appears to me to be vain to contend that we are here dealing with a bottle washing work in the sense of the Act. Mr Gillon told us, no doubt, that when you ransacked the Glasgow Directory, or I suppose the Edinburgh Directory, you would not find under trades or professions any category consisting of bottle washing works alone. That may be so, but their absence from the directory does not appear to me to be a sufficient reason for putting a strained and unnatural interpretation upon the words used in the statute. Indeed, to hold that this was a bottle washing work would, I think, be inconsistent with the cases of Kavanagh v. Caledonian Railway Company,[1] and of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Paterson,[2] both of which cases I consider to have been well decided. The principle of these two cases, and the reasoning of the learned Judges seem to me to be directly in point here. Accordingly, on this question I come without hesitation to the conclusion that the Sheriff-substitute gave a right decision.

I propose to your Lordships, therefore, in accordance with these views, that we should answer the first and second parts of the first question in the negative, and the second question also in the negative.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff-substitute has dealt with this case as raising two separate and independent points, and in that view of the matter I agree, because I cannot follow the argument of the Solicitor-General that the two parts of the case are to be taken in combination in order to make an offence under the Act.

[1] 5 F. 1128. [2] 1 F. (J) 24, 2 Adam, 620.

The first finding of the Sheriff-substitute I agree with—that no part of the appellants' premises was a bottle-washing work; and it was frankly admitted that, to reach any other conclusion, would be to go directly counter to the decisions already pronounced in the cases of Kavanagh[1] and of Paterson.[2] Not only do I not find myself entitled to do that, but I entirely agree in the view that was taken by the Lord President in the case of Kavanagh.[1]

In regard to the second point, I am unable to take the same view as the Sheriff-substitute, and for the reason which has been fully explained by your Lordship. I am unable to agree with him, even taking the case as he puts it, and as though the whole question for our consideration was whether there was any adapting for sale of any article in pouring beer into bottles. If that was the whole point, even then I should take the view that that was not adapting for sale. But I think it is impossible to stop there because of the language of section 149 (1) (c) which introduces other elements that we must take into consideration. We must consider whether any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for purposes of gain in or incidental to (and then I pass to subhead iii.) "the adapting for sale of any article." Not only, however, has that question to be considered, but the concluding part of the subhead is just as important as the first part,—"wherein or within . . . the precincts of which steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there."

The argument on behalf of the conviction really amounted to this, that either we must read out of the section altogether the words "manufacturing process," or else we must give those words a meaning which they certainly never would receive in ordinary parlance. We are told that we must give that unnatural meaning to this expression in consequence of a decision[3] relating to carpet-beating works, and it was argued that, although carpet beating cannot be said to be a manufacturing process in the ordinary acceptation of the term, yet because carpet-beating works are included in the list of non-textile factories given in the statute, therefore, when you come to consider the applicability of the term "manufacturing process" to some other doubtful operation you must give to the words the same forced and unnatural construction. As I followed the judgment in the case of Johnston,[3] which was read by the Solicitor-General, it appeared to me that that case was inapplicable to the present circumstances, because in Johnston[3] the Court were compelled by the terms of the statute and by the inclusion of carpet beating in the Schedule, to give to the expression "manufacturing process" a highly technical meaning, whereas in the present case, where we are dealing with bottling which is not mentioned in the Schedule, we are not constrained to give any construction to the words which is not in accordance with ordinary common sense. Accordingly I am unable to see that pouring beer into bottles

[1] 5 F. 1128. [2] 1 F. (J.) 24, 2 Adam, 620.
[3] Johnston v. Lalonde Brothers & Parham, [1912] 3 K. B. 218.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

can, by any stretch of language, be called a "manufacturing process." I therefore agree with your Lordship.

In regard to the other point that was made by Mr Murray, viz., that in any event the bottle washing and beer bottling were merely ancillary to the business proper of the premises, I should prefer at present not to express any opinion.

LORD ANDERSON.—I agree. The debate which we have heard was concerned mainly with section 149 of the statute of 1901, but I think it is not unimportant to keep in view what the appellants are actually charged with in the complaint. They are charged that they, being the occupiers of a factory, did fail to keep constantly fixed at the entrance to the said factory the prescribed abstract of the Factory and Workshop Act of 1901, contrary to section 128 (1) (a) of the said Act.

Now, the appellants are shopkeepers and nothing else, and yet, if the Sheriff-substitute is right, they will have to put up at the entrance to their grocers' shop in Hamilton the lengthy abstract of the provisions of this Factory Act. Well, that is a somewhat startling proposition; and, as Mr Murray very properly pointed out, the appellants, in respect that they are shopkeepers, are already subject to the provisions of the Shops Act, 1912, an Act whose purposes are the same as those of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, to wit, to compel employers of labour to conform to certain provisions with regard to the conditions of labour under which their employees fulfil their duties.

Now, the Sheriff-substitute has dealt with this case by discriminating between the work which was done on the first floor, namely, bottling beer, and the work which was done in the cellar, namely, washing bottles, and I agree with your Lordships that he took a right course in so discriminating, and that the Solicitor-General was wrong when he suggested that these were really parts of one operation.

With regard to the bottling process, the prosecutor undertakes to prove that this is a non-textile factory, and he says that he does so by reference to the section of the Act which has been alluded to, namely, section 149 (1) (c). Now, it seems to me that, in order to make out that any premises are a non-textile factory in the sense of that section, it is essential that three circumstances should concur: In the first place, there must be manual labour exercised by way of trade in the premises for one or other of three specified purposes. Now, it is common ground that the first of these purposes is out of the case, because it is not said that any article was being made in these premises. The Sheriff-substitute, by his finding that the beer was neither altered nor finished, has ruled out the second subhead; and, accordingly, we are left with the third subhead, and the prosecutor maintains that the manual labour by way of trade was concerned with the adapting of the beer for sale. That is in the first place. Secondly, there must be mechanical power exercised in the premises; and, in the third place, there must be a manufacturing process carried on there.

It is agreed by both sides that there was mechanical power employed, but the appellants dispute that there was either manual labour exercised by way of trade for adapting an article for sale, or that there was anything in the nature of a manufacturing process carried on in transferring beer from casks to bottles.

June 9, 1914.

James Keith, Limited, v. Kirkwood.

Ld. Anderson.

I take the view that on both these points the argument of the appellants is well founded. I am unable to affirm the proposition of the Crown that the beer, by what was done, was adapted for sale, and I do not think there was anything of the nature of a manufacturing process connected with that operation, giving to these words their ordinary signification. I think we are bound to give them that ordinary signification, with this explanation—that the Legislature has provided, with reference to certain special occupations dealt with in the schedule, that they may be treated as if they were manufacturing processes. Accordingly I agree with your Lordships with regard to the process of beer bottling, and the result is that we must reverse the decision of the Sheriff-substitute on that point.

Upon the matter of bottle washing, I think the Sheriff has come to a right conclusion. He has stated that this is ancillary to the main business of the establishment, and the case accordingly is ruled by Paterson[1] and Kavanagh.[2]

THE COURT answered both branches of the first question in the negative and the second question in the negative; sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

JAMES PURVES, S.S.C.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

THE PARISH COUNCIL OF THE PARISH OF GLASGOW, Appellants.—Horne, K.C.—J. W. Forbes.
JANE EDWARD, Respondent.—Christie, K.C.—Paton.

No. 22.

June 15, 1914.

Glasgow Parish Council v. Edward.

Procedure—Instance—Public or private prosecution—Statutory offence—Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 67), Part I.—Title of Parish Council to prosecute for offences under Part I.

A Parish Council has no title to prosecute a complaint charging a contravention of any of the provisions of Part I. of the Children Act, 1908.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Guthrie. Ld. Ormidale.

JANE ROBERTSON OR EDWARD, certified midwife, residing at 3 Elmbank Street, Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow on a complaint at the instance of the Parish Council of the Parish of Glasgow, as the Local Authority under Part I. of the Children Act, 1908, with concurrence of James Neil Hart, Procurator-fiscal of Court, which set forth "that (1) you did fail to give notice to them [the complainers], within forty-eight hours, that on 24th October 1913, at 3 Elmbank Street aforesaid, you had received an infant named Yang Sen Leong or Johnston, then aged seventeen days, whose nursing and maintenance apart from its parents you had undertaken for ten shillings per week, contrary to the Children Act, 1908, section 1, subsection (1); (2) you did fail to give notice to the complainers, within forty-eight hours thereof, of the death, on 28th November 1913, at 3 Elmbank Street aforesaid, of the said infant Yang Sen Leong or Johnston, whose nursing and maintenance apart from its parents you had undertaken for ten shillings per week, as from 24th October 1913, contrary to the said Act, section 1, subsection (5); and (3) you did fail to give notice to the Procurator-fiscal of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, within twenty-four hours thereof, of the death, on 28th November 1913, at 3 Elmbank Street aforesaid, of the said infant Yang Sen Leong or Johnston, whose nursing and maintenance apart from its parents you had undertaken for ten shillings per week, as from 24th October 1913, contrary to the said Act, sections 6 and 132, subsection (5), whereby you are liable, for each offence, under section 9, subsection (1), of said Act, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to a fine not exceeding £25. JAS. R. MOTION, Inspector of Poor and Clerk to Complainers." *

[1] 1 F. (J.) 24, 2 Adam, 620. [2] 5 F. 1128.

June 15, 1914.

Glasgow Parish Council v. Edward.

On the case coming before the Sheriff-substitute (Lyell) the accused's agent objected that the complainers had no title to prosecute. The Sheriff-substitute sustained the objection and dismissed the complaint, and the complainers obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

In the case the Sheriff-substitute stated:—"I sustained the objection on the ground that the Children Act founded on gave the complainers no title, either express or implied, to prosecute for contraventions under Part I. of the Act, and that they had no personal or pecuniary interest, and were not persons aggrieved or injured by the contraventions complained of so as to entitle them to prosecute even with the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal."

The question submitted for the opinion of the Court was:—"Was I right in sustaining the objection that the complainers had no title to prosecute, and dismissing the complaint?"

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 15th June 1914.

Argued for the appellants;—The appellants, the Parish Council of Glasgow, had a good title to prosecute for offences against Part I. of the Act. The Parish Council had always prosecuted for this class of offences under the old Act—the Infant Life Protection Act, 1897 [1]—and there was at least a strong presumption that the new Act, which took the place of the old Act, had not altered the status quo in this respect. Such an alteration could not be inferred by mere implication, and there was no provision in the Act expressly taking away the power. It was true that under the Act of 1897 the Parish Council obtained the penalties, and that fact by itself

* Part I. of the Children Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 67), consists of sections 1 to 11, and deals with "Infant Life Protection."

Section 1 provides for the notices to be given by persons receiving nfants for reward.

Section 9 provides for the prosecution of offences and application of fines, and enacts "(1) Every person guilty of an offence under this Part of this Act shall on summary conviction be liable to" imprisonment or fine. "(2) Any fines under this Part of this Act shall . . . be paid to the local authority" [in Scotland, the Parish Council]. By section 132 (23) of Part VI., however, it is enacted that subsection (2) of section 9 shall not apply to Scotland.

Part II. of the Act deals with "Cruelty to Children and Young Persons," and enacts, section 34 (1), "A board of guardians [in Scotland, a Parish Council] may institute any proceedings under this Part of this Act for any offence in relation to a child or young person . . ."

[1] 60 and 61 Vict. c. 57.

would doubtless have given a title to prosecute. But the terms of the Act of 1897 also gave a title to prosecute by implication, and it was this implied title to prosecute which was carried on into the Act of 1908, and upon which the appellants founded. It was true that the right of a parish council to penalties had been taken away by section 132 (23) of the Act of 1908, but that fact did not detract from this title by implication. The implication followed clearly from the direct interest which the Parish Council had in the provisions of Part I. of the Act. Part I. dealt with Infant Life Protection, and its eleven sections were in the main concerned with the notices, &c., which had to be given to the Local Authority, i.e., the Parish Council, in order to enable the Parish Council to enforce the Act. As the authority to whom such notices had to be given the Parish Council had an interest to prosecute quite different from the general interest which every member of the public had in seeing that the laws were obeyed. The offences under Part I. were in effect offences against the Parish Council, which rendered the Parish Council's interest in Part I. of the Act quite different from the interest which they had, e.g., in Part II. Part II. dealt with Cruelty to Children and Young Persons, and struck at a series of offences against the ordinary law of the realm, with which the Parish Council had no more concern than any other members of the public, and they would, accordingly, have had no title to prosecute had not a title been expressly conferred upon them by sections 34 (1) and 132 (7). The fact, therefore, that an express title to prosecute was given to the Parish Council as regarded Part II., but not as regarded Part I., was capable of this simple explanation, and did not militate against the appellants' contention. The cases on this branch of the law all supported or, at worst, were not adverse to the appellants. The most recent and authoritative of them was Rintoul v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners.[1] The appellants in the present case had a title to prosecute in virtue of two of the four qualifications there mentioned (at pp. 128-9) by Lord Justice-General Dunedin, viz., they were "personally wronged" by the offences committed, and they had a title "by implication." In Rintoul[1] the Insurance Commissioners were not immediately interested, and for that reason they were held to have no title. In Simpson v. Corporation of Glasgow,[2] the interest of the complainer derived from his proximity to the offending tramway line, and in Burns v. Turner,[3] the prosecutor's interest to see that his trade mark was not infringed, were not appreciably greater or more personal than the interest of the present appellants in seeing that the requisite notices were given. Similarly, the railway company's interest to prosecute for the offence of trespassing in contravention of their private Act in Caledonian Railway Company v. M'Gregor,[4] and their interest to prosecute for the use of obscene language in their carriages in Great North of Scotland Railway Company v. Anderson,[5] were not essentially different from the appellants' interest in this case. Simpson v. Board of Trade,[6] on which the respondent founded, was easily distinguishable. The offence there charged was the making

[1] 1913 S. C. (J.) 120, 7 Adam, 210.
[2] (1902) 4 F. 611.
[3] (1897) 25 R. (J.) 38, 2 Adam, 450.
[4] 1909 S. C. 1010.
[5] (1897) 25 R. (J.) 14, 2 Adam, 381.
[6] (1892) 19 R. (J.) 66, 3 White, 167.

June 15, 1914.

Glasgow Parish Council v. Edward.

of a false statement by a seaman on engagement, a matter in which the Board of Trade, who prosecuted, had no special interest. Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents[1] afforded another instance of the class of interest which conferred a right to prosecute, and was not adverse to the appellants. Further, and independently, the appellants had a right to prosecute under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.[2] Section 132 (19) of the Children Act, 1908, provided that offences were to be tried under the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, and section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908, enacted that all proceedings for the trial of offences should be instituted by complaint in the form of Schedule C, and should be signed by the prosecutor, and section 2 defined prosecutor as including "any other persons prosecuting in the public interest," under which category the appellants were clearly included.

Argued for the respondent;—A parish council had no title to bring a prosecution under Part I. of the Act. An express title was given to prosecute for offences against Part II., and this in itself was almost sufficient to show that they had no title under Part I. There were other indications in the Act pointing in the same direction. For example, section 6 provided for notice to the procurator-fiscal, which indicated that he was the natural and proper prosecutor, and section 132 (23) enacted that the parish council were not to get the penalties (which they had formerly got under the Act of 1897), which was explicable only on the footing that they were not to have the right to prosecute. None of the conditions were present which had been held to confer a right by implication. As already mentioned, the parish council did not get the penalties,[3] and they had no interest in the matter of such a particular and personal nature as was to be found in all the cases cited by the appellants in which the Court had held that a right to prosecute had been impliedly conferred. The appellants' only interest arose out of the fact that on them was imposed the duty of carrying out the provisions of the Act, but an analogous duty was also present as regarded the prosecutors in Simpson v. The Board of Trade,[4] and Rintoul v. Scottish Insurance Commissioners,[5] where private prosecutors had been held to have no title. [The Court did not call for an answer to the argument of the appellants founded on the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1908.]

Lord Justice-General.—This case has been remarkably well argued to us, but I have no doubt, for my part, what is the decision at which we ought to arrive.

The complaint is presented at the instance of the Parish Council of the Parish of Glasgow against a person named Edward for contravention of certain provisions of the Children Act, 1908, contained in the first eleven sections of the Act, which form Part I. of the Act and relate exclusively to infant life protection. The complaint was met by the defence that there was a fatal defect in the title of the Parish Council to pursue the

---

[1] 1913 S. C. (J.) 8, 7 Adam, 14. [2] 8 Edw. VII. cap. 65.

[3] Lockwood v. Chartered Institute of Patent Agents, 1913 S. C. (J.) 8, 7 Adam, 14.

[4] 19 R. (J.) 66, 3 White, 167. [5] 1913 S. C. (J.) 120, 7 Adam, 210.

action. That contention was sustained by the Sheriff-substitute and he gives his reasons in the stated case for coming to the conclusion he reached. With these reasons I am perfectly satisfied.

It is true that, under Part I. of the Act, very clear and definite duties are confided to the Local Authority for the purpose of administering the Act and seeing to the care and control of the infants referred to. Notice is required to be given by persons to whom are entrusted the nourishment and maintenance of these young children, not merely to the Local Authority to which is confided the administration of Part I. of the Act but, in certain cases, to the Procurator-fiscal. These notices are required obviouslyto secure the efficient administration of the statute by the public body; and it was contended to us that its title to prosecute for a contravention of the provisions of this part of the Act was based, not on the terms of the statute itself, or on general grounds of expediency, but on the fact that it was wronged, or injured, or aggrieved, by the contravention of the statutory provisions.

Now, I think it plain that a public authority, to which is confided the administration of an Act of Parliament, is not thereby authorised to prosecute for a contravention of the provisions which it is its duty to administer, and that the failure to observe these statutory provisions does not constitute an "injury" done to the Local Authority. If there were any patrimonial interests at stake here, the question would be totally different. But I cannot conceive any case in which a public body—whether a Government Department or a Local Authority—entrusted with the administration of an Act of Parliament can be said to be aggrieved or injured by failure to observe the statutory provisions.

In Scotland there is set up the machinery by which prosecutions for infringement of statutory provisions require to be conducted, and to that machinery is entrusted, in every instance I think, the prosecution for statutory offences, except where the right to prosecute is expressly conferred; for I can find no example in the books of any instance in which, by reasonable implication from statutory provisions, a right to prosecute is conferred on any public body.

It appears to me that this case is covered by authority if authority were needed, for the same plea was stated in the case of Simpson v. The Board of Trade.[1] It was there said that, by a violation of the Merchant Shipping Act, the Board of Trade was aggrieved, because the Act of Parliament confided to the Board of Trade the duty of administering the Act of Parliament. Now, it is nothing to the purpose to say, by way of distinguishing this case from the case of Simpson,[1] that, in the Act here under consideration, very precise and very definite machinery is provided for the purpose of enabling the Local Authority effectively to administer the Act; for in Simpson's case[1] it was clearly recognised that the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 empowered the Board of Trade "to carry into execution the provisions of the Act," and yet that it could not be said that the Board of Trade was aggrieved if the Act of Parliament was contravened. The Lord Justice-General says in his opinion at p. 73 of the report, "It would be a most extraordinary and unwarrantable stretch of such language

[1] 19 R. (J.) 66, 3 White, 167.

June 15, 1914.

Glasgow Parish Council v. Edward.

Lord Justice-General.

to represent the department of Government which was concerned with the administration of the Act as aggrieved by the violation of some of its provisions . . . I do not think that on the statute itself the mere contravention of one of the provisions constitutes a grievance in the sense of this Act, or that the Board of Trade can be fairly described as a party aggrieved." And Lord Adam also, at p. 76, says "I think it is idle to say that a public body in the meaning of this section is the party aggrieved by the proceedings here." Lord M'Laren expresses himself to the like effect. If authority, therefore, were necessary, I think there is ample, for Mr Horne quite frankly conceded to us that he could point to no one expression in any one of the eleven sections embraced in this part of the Act from which he could necessarily or reasonably infer a right to prosecute on the part of the Parish Council.

Comment was made upon the fact that power is expressly conferred on the Parish Council to institute prosecutions under the second part of the Act. That is quite true, but it obviously tells rather in favour of the respondent than in favour of the appellants here, because, although the offences set out in the second part of the Act are all of a different description from those set out in the first part of the Act, still, in both instances, it is merely a case of contravening the statutory provisions enacted in the public interest.

I, therefore, come to the conclusion, without hesitation, that the Sheriff-substitute's decision is right and that we ought to answer the question put to us in the affirmative.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree. I do not think that the Sheriff-substitute's decision raises any question of real public interest, because throughout Scotland there are recognised prosecutors who will be able to act when any offence arises such as is alleged to have arisen here.

The Sheriff-substitute puts the matter with accuracy when he says that the Act gave the Parish Council no title, either express or implied. That there is no express title is admitted, and by implied title I suppose he means something that would involve a necessary implication, such as a section which referred, even parenthetically, to prosecutions at the instance of the Local Authority.

He also says that they had no personal or pecuniary interest. As regards the former the Sheriff-substitute is not challenged; as regards the latter I cannot assent to Mr Horne's suggestion that they had a pecuniary interest in respect that they might incur greater expense in the course of their administration if such offences were committed. I do not think any of the cases at all favoured the view that a remote interest of that kind could be, in the sense of the decisions, a pecuniary interest. Then the Sheriff-substitute says lastly, "they were not persons aggrieved or injured by the contraventions complained of so as to entitle them to prosecute even with the concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal." It is admitted that no case has hitherto occurred coming directly under this category, and I do not think that we require now to decide whether there may not be cases of that kind where it would be held that the amount of injury was sufficient to give a title, even without a direct pecuniary consequence. The present case in no way approximates to the cases figured.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I agree with your Lordships. The matter appears to me to be concluded by authority. I can see no difference whatever between the present case and the case of Simpson v. The Board of Trade.[1]

June 15, 1914.

Glasgow Parish Council v. Edward.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—CLARK & MACDONALD, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 23.

MACBETH & MACLAGAN, Appellants.
ROBERT DUNCAN MACMILLAN (Procurator-Fiscal, Rothesay), Respondent.—Gillon, A.-D.

June 15, 1914.

Macbeth & Maclagan v. Macmillan.

Procedure—Administration of Justice—Counsel—Charge against firm—Appeal to High Court—Competency of partner appearing on behalf of firm.

Held that a firm of law-agents, appealing to the High Court of Justiciary against a conviction of failing to pay contributions due in respect of their employees under the National Insurance Act, 1911, could not be represented in the High Court by one of the partners of the firm, but must employ counsel.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General Lord Guthrie. Ld. Ormidale.

J. & A. PEDDIE & IVORY, W.S.—SIR W. S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

No. 24.

MARY ANN M'SPIRITS OR BLACKWOOD, Appellant.—Duffes.
JOHN JAMES M'INTYRE (Procurator-Fiscal, Glasgow), Respondent.—Millar, K.C.—A. Crawford.

July 6, 1914.

Blackwood v. M'Intyre.

Statutory Offences—Managing a brothel—Manager found "in" a "building" used as a brothel—Two tenements having same access, but separated by common court—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 403.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 403, enacts that any house or building reasonably believed to be used as a brothel may be entered under a magistrate's warrant, and "any person found therein" who manages such brothel shall be subject to a penalty.

Certain premises consisted of two separate tenements of dwelling-houses, a front tenement facing the street, and a back tenement separated from the front tenement by a common court. Access to both tenements was obtained by a close running from the street through the front tenement to the common court. A woman found in the front tenement was charged with, and convicted of, managing the back tenement as a brothel.

Held that as the accused had not been found in the back tenement she had not been found "in" a house or building used as a brothel in the sense of the section, and conviction quashed.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Salvesen. Lord Dewar.

MARY ANN M'SPIRITS OR BLACKWOOD was charged in the Eastern Police Court of Glasgow on a complaint at the instance of John James M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, which set forth "that you, being a person found in a house situated at 93½ Green Street, Calton, Glasgow, and occupied by Jane Murray, on the 18th day of November 1913, did on said 18th day of November 1913, and for a period of eleven days immediately preceding said date, manage or assist in the management of said house as a brothel, contrary to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 403,* duly adopted for the city and royal burgh of Glasgow by the Corporation of the city of Glasgow, in terms of said Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, section 15, as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, conform to resolution by said corporation of date 18th April 1912, declared by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 13th May 1912 to have been so adopted, and on the same date recorded in the Sheriff Court Books of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow."

[1] 19 R. (J.) 66, 3 White, 167.

July 6, 1914

Blackwood v. M'Intyre.

The magistrates found the accused guilty as libelled, and at her request stated a case for appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth, inter alia:—"We found the following facts proved:—That the building known as No. 93½ Green Street, Calton, Glasgow, consists of two tenements of dwelling-houses, one fronting the street and the other a back tenement separate from the front tenement, there being a common court about twenty yards wide between the two tenements; that the only access to both tenements is by the close forming No. 93½ Green Street aforesaid, which runs from the street through the front tenement to said court, that the whole building is tenanted by Jane Murray, Glasgow, and is used by her as a farmed-out property; that is, the rooms have a certain amount of furniture and crockery in them and are let out by the night to parties desiring a night's lodging: That the accused was the caretaker of said building employed by the said Jane Murray, and lived in one of the rooms in the front tenement: That the said back tenement had been managed by the accused as a brothel for eleven days prior to the date libelled, . . . [that certain officers of police entered a room in the back tenement on the date libelled] and that at the time the said officers of police entered the building the accused was in the room in the front tenement occupied by her, and was sent for by the said police officers and brought to said room in back tenement.

---

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), enacts:—Sec. 403. "The magistrate may, on a complaint by the burgh prosecutor, grant warrant to enter into and search from time to time, during any period not exceeding thirty days from the date of such warrant, any house or building, or part of a house or building, or other place, which on examination of the chief constable or an inspector or lieutenant of police and at least one other person, not holding any office or situation under this Act, the magistrate is satisfied there is reasonable ground for believing to be kept, managed, or used, or suffered to be used as a brothel; and any constable under authority of such warrant may take into custody and convey to the police-office the occupier of such house or building, or part of a house or building or place, or any person found therein who either temporarily or permanently manages or assists in the management of such brothel, and every such person shall be liable on conviction before the Sheriff or two magistrates of being the occupier of, or of temporarily or permanently managing or assisting in the management of such brothel, to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds, or to imprisonment without the option of a fine, for any period not exceeding sixty days, and failing payment of any such penalty, to imprisonment not exceeding sixty days. . . ."

July 6, 1914.

Blackwood v. M'Intyre.

"We then heard the assistant Procurator-fiscal for the prosecution and the accused's law-agent for the defence.

"On the facts above stated we held in law that the building known as 93½ Green Street aforesaid, comprising the front tenement and the back tenement as aforesaid, is a 'building' within the meaning of section 403 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, and that the accused was a person found in said building in terms of said section 403 of said Act, and found her guilty as libelled and passed sentence of a fine of £5, and in default of payment thirty days' imprisonment."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court included the following:—"(1) Was the accused on the facts stated a person found in a building managed as a brothel within the meaning of section 403 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892?"

The case was heard before the High Court of Justiciary on 6th July 1914, when counsel for the appellant argued, inter alia, that the appellant had not been found "in" a "building" used as a brothel. In the course of the argument on this point the undernoted authorities were referred to.[1]

Lord Justice-General.—This conviction cannot, I think, stand. The accused was charged before the Magistrates in Glasgow with a contravention of the 403rd section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. The charge against her was that she managed or assisted in the management of a certain house as a brothel. But it is essential to a conviction under that clause of the Act that the accused person be found in the house which it is said she managed as a brothel. Now, in this case, the accused was found in the front tenement of a certain house facing Green Street, Calton, and it is not said that she managed that house—that tenement—as a brothel. It is alleged and found to be proved by the Magistrates that she managed the back tenement as a brothel, but she was not found in the back tenement.

The stated case sets out, quite clearly, what is the difference between the two tenements. The building, it is said, consists of two separate tenements of dwelling-houses, one fronting the street and the other a back tenement separated from the front tenement, with a common court between them. Now, it appears to me that, on these facts, the Magistrates were not warranted in finding in law that these two separate and distinct tenements constituted a building in the sense of the Act; and, accordingly, that the complainer failed to prove his case, it being absolutely essential to secure a conviction that the accused should be found in the building which it is said she managed as a brothel.

This case, it seems to me, stands clearly distinguished from the case of M'Intyre v. Thomson,[2] which was strongly relied upon by Mr Crawford, for there the accused was found on the landing outside the house which he unquestionably owned and managed as a brothel. And, although no doubt the landing of the stair led to other houses as well as to the house

[1] M'Intyre v. Thomson, 1912 S. C. (J.) 19, 6 Adam, 564; Martin v. M'Intyre, 1910 S. C. (J.) 72, 6 Adam, 252; Woods v. Lindsay, 1910 S. C. (J.) 88, 6 Adam, 294.

[2] 1912 S. C. (J.) 19, 6 Adam, 564.

July 6, 1914.

Blackwood v. M'Intyre.

Lord Justice-General.

which he occupied, it was the one and only access to his house. Accordingly, as Lord Dundas pointed out, the place where the police came on him was the necessary and only access to the premises, and, although other persons had no doubt common rights in the passage, it seemed to his Lordship that none the less was he in the house in the circumstances stated in the case. And I observe that Lord Salvesen and Lord Guthrie gave opinions to the like effect. In the present instance the accused was found in a separate house altogether, not in the access to this house; and accordingly, it appears to me that an all-essential preliminary to a conviction was not established. [His Lordship then dealt with other questions with which this report is not concerned.]

Lord Salvesen.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The Magistrates have held that two separate buildings of dwelling-houses constituted one building because they have a common access and because a person residing in one used the other for a particular business. I do not think they were right in so deciding. It seems to me that the section has in view what, in popular language, is a building, that is to say, a separate physical structure; and that a person is not found in a particular building if he or she is, at the moment, in another and separate building.

I think the case is clearly distinguished from that of M'Intyre v. Thomson,[1] where there was only one building in question, but where part of that building was used for the purposes of a brothel, and we held that the landing or staircase by which the occupier of the building obtained access to it formed part of the house within the meaning of section 142 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

If Mr Crawford's argument were right, it would follow that the two buildings might be separated to any extent if, in point of fact, they were used for the purposes of the same business. Now, that is not what the statute means. This woman was not found within the building with regard to which the Magistrates held that it was used as a brothel. She was sent for by the police to come from another building in which she was, in point of fact, residing, and she was in that sense found in the back building, because she had been sent for by the police to come there. In other words, she was not found in the brothel, but brought there. Accordingly I agree with your Lordship in holding that the first question should be answered in the negative. [His Lordship then dealt with another question with which this report is not concerned.]

Lord Dewar.—I concur.

The Court answered the first question of law in the negative, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

James G. Bryson, Solicitor—Campbell & Smith, S.S.C.—Agents.

[1] 1912 S. C. (J.) 19, 6 Adam, 564.

GUISEPPE PORCELLI, Appellant.—Sandeman, K.C.—Lippe.
JOHN JAMES M'INTYRE (Procurator-fiscal, Glasgow), Respondent.—A. O. M. Mackenzie, K.C.—M. P. Fraser.

No. 25.
July 6, 1914.

Porcelli v. M'Intyre.

Statutory Offences—Registration of places for public refreshment— Ice-cream shop—Ice-cream vendor already registered under Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, 1885—Necessity for registration under Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1903 and 1911—Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, 1885, sec. 6—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), sec. 82—Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 57), secs. 1 and 3.

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, 1903 and 1911, impose a penalty on any person using premises as "a place for public refreshment" between certain hours without being registered in a register to be kept for that purpose; but by sec. 3 of the 1911 Act it is enacted that the expression "place for public refreshment" does not extend to "any premises in respect of which a licence or other sanction or permit is for the time being in force, issued in virtue of specific powers conferred on a town-council."

Held that the registration of an ice-cream vendor in a register of purveyors of milk, kept by the Corporation of Glasgow under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, 1885, was not "a licence or other sanction or permit" with regard to his premises in the sense of the above section; and accordingly that he was not exempt from registration under the Burgh Police Acts as a person using premises as a place for public refreshment.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Salvesen. Lord Dewar.

GUISEPPE PORCELLI, ice-cream dealer and confectioner, 27 and 29 London Street, Glasgow, was charged in the Central Police Court, Glasgow, on a complaint at the instance of John James M'Intyre, Procurator-fiscal, which set forth "that, being the occupier of premises situated at 27 and 29 London Street, Glasgow, you did, on Saturday 7th March 1914, between the hours of eight o'clock at night of said day and five o'clock of the following morning, keep or use, or suffer to be kept or used, said premises as a place for public refreshment without being registered as required by the Acts hereinafter mentioned; contrary to the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, section 82 (1), as amended by section 1 (1) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911,* said section 82 of the

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), enacts:—Sec. 82 (1). "Every person who shall keep, or suffer to be kept or used, or use any house, building, part of a building, or other premises, as an ice-cream shop or aerated water shop, without being registered in a register to be kept by the town-council, who are hereby required to keep a register for that purpose, in which they shall enter the names of applicants without charge, shall be liable to a penalty. . . ."

The Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 51), enacts:—

Sec. 1 (1). "Subsec. (1) . . . of section 82 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, shall . . . be amended by the omission of the words 'an ice-cream shop or aerated water shop' occurring therein, and by the insertion in lieu thereof of the words 'a place for public refreshment at any time between the hours of eight of the clock at night and five of the clock of the following morning or at any time on Sunday.'"

Sec. 3. "In section 82 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, as amended by this Act, the expression 'place for public refreshment'

July 6, 1914.

Porcelli v. M'Intyre.

Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, having been adopted by the Corporation of the city of Glasgow by resolution on 25th April 1905, and duly recorded in the Sheriff Court books of Lanarkshire at Glasgow on 12th May 1905."

The Police Court Judge, having found the accused guilty as libelled, imposed a fine; and at his request stated a case for appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth, inter alia:—

"The following are the facts found proved:—The appellant is the occupier of an ice-cream and confectionery shop situated at 27 and 29 London Street, Glasgow, which he acquired in 1906. About 11.15 P.M. on 7th March 1914 two police-officers of the Glasgow Police observed the shop of the appellant at 27 and 29 London Street aforesaid open, and on entering the shop found a number of persons therein. Some of them were consuming aerated waters and ice-cream, and some were being supplied with further refreshments of the same class, and the premises were being used as a place for public refreshment. Appellant was personally present, and the police-officers intimated to him that the case would be reported for prosecution. He replied that he had been advised by his law-agent that he did not come under the registration requirement. . . .

"Previous to 1894 the provisions of the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order did not apply to a dealer in ice-cream, but by the Glasgow Corporation and Police Act, 1895, section 28, the term 'purveyor of milk' was extended to include 'any dealer in ice-cream.' Since 1895 dealers in ice-cream have been registered in includes any building, or part of a building, or other place of public resort for the sale for consumption therein of provisions or refreshments of any kind (including confectionery, ice-cream as defined in the said section, fruit, and aerated waters), but does not extend to any premises certificated or registered under the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, or any premises in respect of which a licence or other sanction or permit is for the time being in force, issued in virtue of specific powers conferred on a town-council or other authority by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts or any other statute."

---

The Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, 1885 (issued by the Privy Council in terms of the powers conferred by the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. 74)), enacts:—"6. (1) It shall not be lawful for any person to carry on in the district of any local authority the trade of cowkeeper, dairyman, or purveyor of milk unless he is registered as such therein in accordance with this article. (2) Every local authority shall keep a register of persons from time to time carrying on in their district the trade of cowkeepers, dairymen, or purveyors of milk, and shall from time to time revise and correct the register. (3) The local authority shall register every such person, but the fact of such registration shall not be deemed to authorise such person to occupy as a dairy or cowshed any particular building, or in any way preclude any proceedings being taken against such person for non-compliance with or infringement of any of the provisions of this Order or any regulations made thereunder."

The Glasgow Corporation and Police Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. cxliii.), enacts:—Sec. 28. "In the application within the city of . . . the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885 . . . 'purveyor of milk' includes manufacturer of, merchant, or dealer in ice-cream, or any similar commodity manufactured or made, either wholly or in part, from or with milk or cream."

the register kept by the Corporation under the 1885 Act and other milkshop statutes. When appellant acquired the premises in London Street he was entered in the register under the Dairies Order on 8th May 1906, as a purveyor of milk, and his name still remains as such on that register.

"In the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, a provision was made requiring that every person keeping premises as an ice-cream shop must be registered in a register for that purpose kept by the Town-Council. In 1911, by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, section 3, an important change in the 1903 Act was made. The provision of section 82 of the 1903 Act originally applicable to an ice-cream shop or aerated water shop was altered and extended to apply to a place used for public refreshment at any time between the hours of 8 o'clock of the night, and 5 of the clock of the following morning, or at any time on Sunday. After the passage of the 1911 Act appellant's name and his premises at 27 and 29 London Street were on his application entered in the Register of Places for Public Refreshment, and remained upon that register until 6th March 1914, when he formally withdrew the entry. The entry was cancelled on the morning of 7th March 1914. That afternoon there was no entry of appellant's name or of his premises on the register."

The case further set forth:—

"At the trial appellant's defence was that his premises are a registered milkshop; that he is protected by the exception in the 1911 Act at the end of section 3 as holding a licence or other sanction or permit issued in virtue of specific powers conferred on the Town-Council by statute; and that therefore he is not liable to register under the 1903 and 1911 Acts.

"Previous to the 1911 Act the requirement of registration had been applicable to any ice-cream shop or aerated water shop, but by the 1911 Act, section 1, subsection 1, the provision ceased to be applicable to any such shop unless it was used as a place for public refreshment late at night or in the early morning. Section 3 expressly declared that this requirement did not 'extend to any premises certificated or registered under the Licensing (Scotland) Act, 1903, or any premises in respect of which a licence or other sanction or permit is for the time being in force, issued in virtue of specific powers conferred on a town-council or other authority by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Acts, or any other statute.' It seemed to me that this clause of exception was framed with a distinct view of a licence or permit under the liquor laws as the primary exception contemplated, and of some analogous licence or permit of kindred order being the only other class of exception. I was unable to find that appellant's registration as a purveyor of milk under the Dairies and Milkshops Order gave any solid ground for his contention that it amounted either for himself or for his premises to licence, sanction, or permit at all. Holding that appellant's premises came under the requirement for registration if used as a place for public refreshment, I convicted him of the charge as libelled, and fined him as above stated."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Did appellant's premises, which are used as a place for public refreshment, require to be registered as such in the Register of Places for Public Refreshment in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland)

July 6, 1914.

Porcelli v. M'Intyre.

Act, 1903, section 82 (1), as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, section 1 (1)? or, (2) Were said premises, in view of the entry in the Register kept under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order exempt from registration as a place for public refreshment by virtue of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911, section 3?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 6th July 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The appellant was registered as a purveyor of milk under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, 1885, and in respect of that registration he possessed "a licence or other sanction or permit" which, by section 3 of the Burgh Police Act of 1911, exempted him from registration as a keeper of a place for public refreshment.

Argued for the respondent;—The register kept under the Dairies Order, 1885, was a register of persons, and registration therein gave no licence to occupy any particular premises, whereas the exemption in section 3 of the Burgh Police Act, 1911, expressly referred to licensed premises. The exemption in that section had no reference to registration in such a register as was instituted by the Dairies Order for a purely sanitary purpose. The purpose of registration under the Burgh Police Acts was to regulate the hours of trading with a social object, and the exemption was only intended to apply to places already subject to similar regulation. If ice-cream shops were to be exempt from all regulation, the main purpose of the provisions as to registration of places for public refreshment would be entirely defeated, because, by selling ice-cream and registering under the Dairies Order, the keeper of any place of refreshment could escape these provisions.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—It has frequently been observed in this Court that it is no part of our duty to consider the intention or the policy of the Legislature in passing an Act of Parliament. We are required to put a construction upon its terms. It is equally true that it is no part of our duty to defeat the purpose of an Act of Parliament when we are called upon to construe it.

In this case, in order to give effect to the contention of the appellant, it appears to me we should require to do violence to the terms of the statute. A complaint was made against him for a contravention of the 82nd section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, as amended by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911. It is conceded that he did contravene that Act of Parliament if it applies to him, but he contends that it does not apply to him in respect that he, at the present moment is, or was at the time when the prosecution was brought, on the register of milksellers which is kept in terms of the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order. That order, which is dated in 1885, was extended to ice-cream sellers in Glasgow by the Glasgow Corporation and Police Act of 1895. In a single sentence, his defence is this—that the premises which he now occupies are a registered milkshop. In my opinion, that is a wholly irrelevant defence.

Even if his premises were a registered milkshop, they do not appear to me to be embraced within the exceptions set out in section 3 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1911. The part of that clause to which the appellant appeals in support of his defence states in effect that his premises are to be exempted if he holds a licence for them or a sanction for them or a permit for them issued in virtue of specific powers conferred upon a town-council or other authority by any statute.

Now, in respect of the premises at 27 and 29 London Street, Glasgow, the appellant, at the present moment, holds no licence, no sanction, and no permit issued to him in virtue of any powers whatsoever. He is upon a register of persons who are entitled to carry on the business of ice-cream selling and milk selling by virtue of section 6 (1) of the Dairies Order, but it is expressly set out in the order that the insertion of his name in that register is not to be deemed to authorise him to keep as a dairy or milk-shop any particular building. Reading the order as applied by the statute of 1895, his registration is not to be deemed to authorise him to occupy as an ice-cream shop any particular building. And, accordingly, it is a pure misnomer to say that his premises are registered. They are expressly excluded from licence or permission or sanction, or even from the register, by the terms of section 6 of the Dairies Order to which I have just referred. The object of the order is to secure, by sections 7 and 8, that before any premises can be occupied as a milkshop they must comply with certain regulations which are designed to make these premises healthy premises from which unwholesome milk cannot come.

Now, it appears to me that registration of premises is an impossibility under the Dairies Order of 1885, because that register may exist for an indefinite time. The magistrates are enjoined to revise it and correct it as they think proper from time to time, but, during the period it exists, and during the period the appellant's name is upon it, he may occupy a dozen different premises in all of which he may continue his business, provided, not that they are on the register, but provided that they are suitable, i.e., that they comply with the provisions of sections 7 and 8.

I agree with the Stipendiary Magistrate in the ground of judgment which he has adopted—that to place the interpretation upon section 3 of the Burgh Police Act of 1911 which the appellant contended for would be to defeat the prior part of the section, and to read that part of the section out of the Act altogether, and that the rule of ejusdem generis is clearly applicable to this case. But, speaking for myself, and myself alone, I hold that these premises are not registered premises under any Act of Parliament or Order which gives sanction, permission, or licence to sell ice-cream or anything else in them; and, accordingly, that the conviction ought to stand, and that we ought to answer the first question in the affirmative and the second question in the negative.

Lord Salvesen.—This case turns entirely on the exemption clause of section 3 of the 1911 Burgh Police Act. I agree with your Lordship that the appellant here does not hold a licence or other sanction or permit in respect of any premises. He is registered under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops Order, 1885, as a purveyor of milk, and he is subject, under that Order, to certain regulations in respect of the premises which he occupies, these regulations having been framed for reasons of public health. But the premises themselves are not sanctioned or licensed.

July 6, 1914.

Porcelli v. M'Intyre.

Lord Salvesen.

Apart from that perhaps somewhat technical construction of the statute, it appears to me that it would defeat the whole object of the Legislature if we were to adopt the construction for which the appellant contends. We should practically have to read section 3, which expressly includes ice-cream shops, as not applying to any ice-cream shops which were in existence at the time when the Act was passed, but as only having a possible application to subsequently established places of refreshment of the same kind.

I think there is a sufficiently clear indication in the statute that the exemption clause does not apply to places with which the main clause expressly deals, and that view is confirmed by a consideration of section 4, the effect of which appears to be that, after the expiration of three months from the date of the passing of this 1911 Amendment Act, all the regulations existing under previous bye-laws or statutes applicable to ice-cream shops are swept away. If the appellant's contention were well-founded, he would now be in the privileged position of being able to carry on his business without regulation by the local authority. Plainly the Act was not intended to have that effect. The exemption clause may reasonably be accounted for on the supposition that it was intended to apply to places of public refreshment—a theatre where there are bars was suggested by way of illustration—where there was a certificate or licence or sanction in the proper sense issued by the local authority in respect of the premises, and which, being already under public control, required no further regulation in the public interest.

LORD DEWAR.—I concur.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

MENZIES, BRUCE-LOW, & THOMSON, W.S.—CAMPBELL & SMITH, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 26.

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

JOHN TRAYNOR, Appellant.—M'Lennan, K.C.—Ingram.
CHARLES ANGUS MACPHERSON (Police Court Prosecutor, Edinburgh), Respondent.—Macmillan, K.C.—MacRobert.

Statutory Offences—Betting—Betting-house—Ready-money or credit betting—Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 119), sec. 1.

The Betting Act, 1853, by section 1, prohibits the keeping of any house or office for the receipt of money as the consideration for a promise to pay money thereafter on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race.

A bookmaker occupied premises in Edinburgh, where he carried on his business by receiving communications from his clients by telephone, the client subsequently sending by post a note of the bet along with a postal order for the sum staked. In a prosecution of the bookmaker for contravention of the Act no instance was proved of money being received by the bookmaker before the race on which it was staked was run, but it was proved that clients did not receive their winnings until after their money had been received by the bookmaker.

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

Held (diss. Lord Salvesen) that the bookmaker had committed a contravention of the Act.

Opinions reserved (per the Lord Justice-General and Lord Dewar) as to whether a credit system of betting would be an infringement of the Act.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Salvesen. Lord Dewar.

JOHN TRAYNOR was charged in the Edinburgh Police Court at the instance of Charles Angus Macpherson, public prosecutor, on a summary complaint which set forth "that you being the occupier of, or person using, a room or office at No. 85 Hanover Street, Edinburgh, and a room or office at No. 116 Rose Street, Edinburgh, between 1st and 16th, both days of January 1914, both days inclusive, did open, keep, and use said rooms or offices for the purpose of money or other valuable thing being received by you, or on your behalf, as the consideration for an undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to horse races, contrary to the Betting Act, 1853, sections 1 and 3,* as extended to Scotland by the Betting Act, 1874.†"

On 12th March 1914 the Judge of Police, after hearing evidence, found the accused guilty as libelled and fined him £50 with the alternative of three months' imprisonment.

The accused obtained a stated case for appeal to the High Court of Justiciary. The case set forth:—"The following facts were proved:—1. During the period libelled the appellant was occupier of an office at 85 Hanover Street, and of another at 116 Rose Street, both in Edinburgh. 2. During said period large numbers of letters were daily received by post at the office at 85 Hanover Street, and after each postal delivery, these letters were collected by one of the appellant's servants, and taken to the office at 116 Rose Street, where they were opened and dealt with. 3. That on 14th January 1914 a warrant was obtained to search both offices, and on 16th January 1914 said warrant was executed at 116 Rose Street. 4. The police officers arrived at the premises about 3.40 P.M. on said last-mentioned date, and although the appellant was absent at the moment of their entry, he arrived shortly afterwards. 5. The premises consisted of four apartments utilised as an office with three telephones and two safes. There was found a large quantity of betting material relating to horse racing carried on during the period libelled. 6. In one of the safes the police found a small brief bag which was locked. The appellant, on being asked what

---

* The Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 119), enacts:—Sec. 1. "No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise. . . ."

† 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 15, sec. 4.

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

it contained, replied that there was nothing of any value in it; just one or two private papers. When required to open same, he stated that he had not the key, but, on the police threatening to force it open, he eventually produced the key, and the police, on opening the bag found therein the parcel of 539 postal orders, amounting in value to £144, 7s. referred to in next article.

"7. In the premises there were found and taken possession of by the police, inter alia, the following:—(1) The said 539 postal orders amounting in value to £144, 7s. These postal orders varied in amount from 6d. to 21s., and for the most part bore dates within the period libelled. The majority of these were of small value, there being 9 at 6d., 129 at 1s., 60 at 2s., 52 at 3s., 74 at 4s., and 57 at 5s. (2) A large quantity of betting slips or investment forms containing bets on horse races run on 7th, 9th, 10th, 13th, 14th, and 15th January 1914. The amounts invested corresponded in a large proportion of instances with amounts in the postal orders above referred to, while the places from which they had been despatched likewise corresponded in a similar proportion with the post marks on the postal orders. The investment forms which were used in the great majority of instances were published by the appellant, and contained printed thereon the addresses of both his offices, with the date, name and address of sender, amount invested, and name of horse or horses backed filled in in blank spaces reserved for the purpose. A number of these slips bore on their face or by letter attached that accompanying them had been sent money to the value of the particular bet. . . . None of the slips referred to were proved by the senders. (3) A large number of unused investment forms similar to the above. (4) A number of ready stamped envelopes with address printed thereon 'John Traynor, 85 Hanover Street, Edinburgh.' (5) Two books, one for 1913 and the other for 1914 containing the conditions upon which the appellant was prepared to bet with his clients. Rule 14 reads, 'Letter commissions a specialty. Payment same night.' (6) Eight betting slips afterwards identified by the senders.

"8. Specific betting transactions by four individuals with the appellant during the period libelled were proved. In each case the betting slips sent to the appellant were identified by the senders, who stated that therewith they had sent postal orders for the exact amount invested, and explained the circumstances, as after stated, under which they did so. The said postal orders were not identified by them. Said slips were addressed to the appellant at 85 Hanover Street, and were among those seized in the premises at 116 Rose Street on 16th January 1914. In each case the bets were sent on the footing that if successful the sender would receive from the appellant the winnings due.

"9. The following are the specific transactions spoken to by the said four witnesses:—(a) Alexander Dickson, 9 Earlston Place, identified a slip sent by him, containing a bet for 2s., on 15th January 1914, on a race to be run on the same date, accompanied by a postal order for said amount. He posted it at Abbeyhill at 1.35 P.M., being prior to the hour of the race or races in which the horses he backed were to run. He had no prior communication with the appellant before putting on this bet, and had no arrangement for credit. There was no racing on 15th January 1914 owing to frost, and the race upon which the bet was laid was not run.

(b) William Gillan, 98 Montgomery Street, identified a slip sent by him, containing a bet for 2s., on 14th January 1914, and enclosing postal order for said amount. On the following day he wrote in these terms to the appellant:—'I sent 2s. yesterday as follows:—1s. each way "Mr Peffer." This horse did not run, so please make this bet for to-day 1s. each way "Sentry," 3.30 race.' As no racing took place on 15th January, he received back his money from the appellant on 16th January, by post, the one communication crossing the other. Witness telephoned the bet to the appellant in the morning of the 14th, and thereafter in the afternoon posted on the slip with the postal order. This was his first bet with the appellant, and he had no arrangement for credit, having had no communication with him thereanent. (c) Arthur James Warner, 34 Brunswick Road, Edinburgh, identified two slips sent by him on 14th and 15th January respectively. The former was a bet of 2s. 6d., along with which he sent a postal order for that amount. He received 4s. of winnings on the morning of 15th January, and thereafter, same date, sent a bet of 6s. together with postal order for that amount. He subsequently had the 6s. returned owing to no race taking place on 15th January. In each case he telephoned the bet in the morning, and posted the slip and the postal order therefor late in the afternoon, but in no case did he get a settlement of his winnings until after the appellant had received his money. (d) James Alexander, 4 Lauriston Park, Edinburgh, identified four slips sent by him on 9th, 10th, 13th, and 14th January 1914. These were bets of 8s., 5s., 7s., and 6s. respectively; along with each he sent postal orders for the amount invested. In each case he telephoned the bet in the morning, and posted on the slip and the postal order later in the afternoon. He had no credit from the appellant, and did not want it, and on no occasion had he asked for it. He had had other betting transactions with the appellant, and on no occasion had he received any winnings that were due him until after the appellant had received his money.

"10. It was maintained that in respect of the practice of the three last-named witnesses to telephone the bet in the morning and send on the written slip and postal orders later in the day, there was only disclosed a system of credit betting on the part of the appellant, but I was satisfied that in each case there was deposit of money in advance as the consideration for the appellant's undertaking to pay over any winnings that might be due."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court included:—"(2) On the facts stated, could I competently find the appellant guilty of the offence charged?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 6th and 11th July 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—In order to establish a contravention of the Betting Act it was necessary to show that the bookmaker received money from his client before the decision of the event on which the bet was made. If the bet was made by the bookmaker, not in consideration of an immediate money payment, but on the faith of a future payment by the client if he lost his bet, there was no contravention of the Act.[1] It was not found proved in the case

[1] Powell v. Kempton Park Race Course Co., [1899] A. C. 143, per Lord James, at p. 192; Traynor v. Macpherson, 1911 S. C. (J.) 54, 6 Adam, 407.

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

that the appellant had ever received money before a race was run, indeed, it appeared from the findings that in every case the money sent by the clients must have been received after the events were decided. But even if money had sometimes been received before the race was run, that was an ultroneous act on the part of the client and was not part of the accused's system. The system disclosed was a system of credit betting, which was not struck at by the Act. It was immaterial when the accused paid out the winnings, if the bets were accepted and the liability incurred before the payments were received. Counsel also referred to the undernoted authorities.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—It was immaterial whether the bookmaker received the money before or after the event. The essential question was whether the money was sent by the client as the consideration for which the bookmaker undertook to pay money on a contingency. It appeared from the facts found proved that the sending of the money by the client was a necessary preliminary to the bookmaker honouring his bet. In no case were winnings sent to a client until after his money had been received. The evidence adduced in this case was sufficient, on the authorities, to justify the magistrate in holding that the offence had been proved.[2]

At advising on 18th July 1914,—

Lord Justice-General.—This is undeniably an important case, although, as your Lordships are aware, I have not found it attended with difficulty.

The appellant was charged before the Magistrate with a contravention of certain sections of the Betting Act of 1853, as extended to Scotland by the Betting Act of 1874. What he was accused of doing was keeping and using certain premises at 116 Rose Street, Edinburgh, for the purpose of money being received by him as the consideration for an undertaking to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to horse racing. In plain and simple language, the contravention charged was this, that he kept these premises at 116 Rose Street for the purpose of receiving cash from senders on an undertaking given by him that he would send money to the people who sent him the cash, if the horses which they backed won the races for which they were backed. And, after evidence led, the Magistrate came to the conclusion that the facts which he found proved warranted a conviction.

The question we have to consider is whether or no the facts, as set out in the stated case, were sufficient to warrant the Magistrate's decision? I think they were, for what was found in the premises at 116 Rose Street when search was made leaves no doubt in my mind that the premises

---

[1] Duff v. Neilson, (1892) 20 R. (J.) 33, 3 White, 399; Hodgsons v. Macpherson, 1913 S. C. (J.) 68, 7 Adam, 118; Stoddart v. Hawke, [1902] 1 K. B. 353.

[2] Hart v. M'Creadie, (1899) 2 F. (J.) 1, 3 Adam, 35; Maguire v. Renton, 1909 S. C. (J.) 21, 5 Adam, 652; M'Connell v. Brennan, [1908] 2 I. R. 411, per Gibson, J., at p. 421; Rex v. Mortimer, [1911] 1 K. B. 70, per Lord Alverstone, C.J., at p. 75.

were used for receiving money to be retained by the appellant, and that the consideration which the appellant gave for the money was an undertaking to pay money to those who sent the cash, when the horses which they backed won the races for which they were backed. In the premises there were found 539 postal orders for small sums, amounting in all to £144, 7s. Upwards of a hundred of the postal orders were for one shilling, and a large number of them were for four and five shillings. That money was received undoubtedly in the premises, and it was unquestionably retained by the appellant, for there is no suggestion in the case that the 539 postal orders were found there by accident, and that, if the police had not anticipated the appellant, he would have sent the cash back to those who sent it. And the only question the Magistrate had to consider was—For what purpose was the money sent? What was the consideration which the appellant gave for the £144, 7s. of cash which he received in these premises?

The evidence led before the Magistrate left no doubt upon that question, because there were found hundreds of betting slips with the appellant's name upon them, and letters; and in hundreds of cases it was found that the betting slips and letters corresponded with hundreds of the postal orders. "The amounts invested," we are told, "corresponded, in a large proportion of instances, with the amounts in the postal orders above referred to, while the places from which they had been dispatched likewise corresponded in a similar proportion with the postmarks on the postal orders. The investment forms which were used in the great majority of instances were published by the appellant, and contained printed thereon the addresses of both his offices, with the date, name, and address of the sender, amount invested, and name of horse or horses backed filled in in blank spaces reserved for the purpose. A number of these slips bore on their face or by letter attached that accompanying them had been sent money to the value of the particular bet." It is nothing to the purpose, of course, to say that none of the slips were proved by the sender. There they were on the premises. 539 persons sent cash which the appellant retained, and the only consideration which he gave for that cash was an undertaking that he would pay them the winnings when the horses which they backed won.

Now it is said, no doubt, that all of these postal orders and betting slips might have arrived at 116 Rose Street after the race had been run. I ask—What then? The statute makes no reference whatever to the date when the cash is received. But the statute is very specific regarding the consideration which is given for the cash. The statute draws no distinction between cash being received before the race is run or after the race is run. All that the statute requires in order to constitute an offence against it is that the premises be kept open for the purpose of receiving cash for which the receiver gives a consideration, and the consideration he gives is to pay the senders money when the backed horses win. Accordingly I should have thought that the Magistrate had adequate evidence before him to convict on the facts which I have just narrated.

It was urged further, however, that the bets may all have been made

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

Lord Justice-General.

on the morning of the day by telephone, and that the bargain was then concluded, while the money was sent on at a later period. Once more I ask—What then? The statute says nothing about betting, so far as I am aware. The statute asks nothing except—Are the premises kept open for the purpose of receiving money as the consideration for an undertaking to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to horse racing?

But the Magistrate went on to investigate four specific and distinct cases on which, apparently, he rests his judgment. These cases certainly present three or four elements in common. (First) In all four cases the bettors sent their postal orders to the appellant, and he kept them. (Second) These postal orders were accompanied by investment slips or letters in which the senders told the appellant what he was to do with the money—the horses he was to back, and the races for which they were to be backed. And (third) in no instance were winnings ever paid except after the cash had been received. Now, these are the features which are common to all the cases; and it is nothing to the purpose to say that, when a race was off, the money was returned to the bettor, for it had been received, and received for the purpose specifically mentioned in the statute. Equally little to the purpose is it to say that the bets may have been concluded, and were concluded, by telephone before the race was run, for it is certain that in no instance were winnings paid to any man until after his cash had been received. The Magistrate was, therefore, well entitled to reach the conclusion which he did, for, in every instance, there was a deposit of money in advance as a consideration for the appellant's undertaking to pay over any winnings that might be due.

Throughout the opinion I have just expressed I have assumed that the statute specifically and clearly contemplates the payment of money by the man who keeps the premises if he has received cash from the bettor. The statute, when it speaks of "paying money thereafter," apparently speaks of money being paid after money has reached the premises. Now, that was the case in all the instances which were adduced. But I am not to be held as concurring in the view that the cash must be paid by the keeper of the premises after he has received cash from the bettors. It seems to me, so far as I can at present judge, to be wholly immaterial that cash is sent after cash has been received. What is the essence of the matter, so far as I can judge, is that the consideration given for the cash received is an undertaking to pay money upon certain contingencies relating to horse races, and, if that essential condition is satisfied, it does not appear to me to be material to consider what was the date when the money was actually received. What is material and what is the essential matter is the consideration that was undertaken to be given by the receiver to the sender in return for the cash sent.

I desire expressly to reserve my opinion whether or no a credit system of betting would be an infringement of this Act of Parliament. It is said, no doubt, in the present case that the appellant intimated clearly to the public and to his clients that he would receive no money in advance; that he proposed to conduct his betting transactions upon credit principles; and that, if clients chose to send money in advance, that was their affair and not his, but that that was not the system on which he carried on his business. To this, I think, there are two answers. The first is that de facto, in every case, he received the cash and retained the cash, and the Magistrate does not find that there was any intention on the part of the appellant to return the cash. And the second and conclusive answer is, as I think, that the statute makes no reference whatsoever to the time when the cash is sent, and confines its attention exclusively to the consideration for which it was sent.

I therefore think, on the facts which he found proved, the Magistrate was warranted in reaching the conclusion which he did reach; and accordingly that we ought to answer both questions put to us in the affirmative.

Lord Salvesen.—In this case the appellant asks us to quash a conviction obtained against him, under sections 1 and 3 of the Betting Act, 1853. The Act is said to have been contravened, in respect that the appellant kept an office for the purpose of receiving money as the consideration for an undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies of or relating to horse races. If in fact the appellant conducted his business, which is that of a bookmaker, on the footing of receiving deposits of money prior to a race, or other sporting event on which his customers desired to bet, there is ample authority for holding that he contravened the Act, and this I gather to have been found by the Magistrate who convicted. The question for our decision really is whether the facts found proved justify any such inference.

That the appellant does a considerable business with the working classes as a bookmaker is undoubted; but this fact ought not to allow us to be prejudiced against him. There is no law against betting; and, whatever one may think of the business of a bookmaker and of its effects upon the morals of society, it is not in itself an illegal business. Nor is there any illegality in a bookmaker, any more than any other person, receiving payment of a bet, which he has made on a sporting event and which his client has lost. A bookmaker must reside somewhere; and, no doubt, if he is in the habit of making bets, he will receive payment of his debts, from the persons with whom he makes them, at his office or place of residence. Obviously, this is not an offence under the statute. It may be reprehensible for people to make bets, but it is still more so for them to make such bets and not to pay when they lose; and I cannot see how it is an offence in the winner to receive payment of his winnings, any more than it is an offence for the loser honourably to pay his debt. Nor, again, can it make any difference, in the legal aspect of the case, whether a man engages only in isolated transactions of the kind, or repeatedly makes bets with the object of securing a profit to himself from his larger experience of the chances of success or failure of any particular horse in a race that falls to be run. It has already been held by this Court that credit betting, though indulged in by a bookmaker, is not an offence under our present law, any more than credit betting between private individuals. The object of the statute, as I gather from its terms, was to discourage betting amongst the humbler classes, whose circumstances may not be such as to justify the

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

Lord Salvesen.

bookmaker in giving them credit, by making it illegal for a bookmaker to receive a deposit beforehand of the sum which the customer stands to lose, as a condition of an undertaking to pay the customer his winnings if the latter should be successful. In such a case parties are not betting upon equal terms. The customer has only the honour of the bookmaker to trust to; whereas the bookmaker has in his possession the sum which the customer is prepared to risk before the sporting event takes place.

The above being, as I understand, the law which has been laid down both in England and in Scotland on this subject, it becomes necessary to consider the facts actually found proved, in order to see whether they justify the inference which the Magistrate drew—that the appellant kept an office, either for the purpose of receiving there deposits of the sums which his clients instructed him to put upon the horses they wished to bet on, or alternatively, on the footing that any bet which he accepted was conditional on a postal order for the amount which the client desired to risk being posted before the race took place. In my opinion that is not established by showing isolated cases in which clients did either send money to the appellant before the race was run, or put it beyond their control by dispatching a postal order before the race on which the bet was made was run.

A careful scrutiny of the facts found proved has convinced me that they do not justify the inference which the Magistrate drew. When the police made a raid on the appellant's premises, they found in his bag no less than 539 postal orders for small sums of money, which I take it represented so many bets which had been made by the senders. In only four isolated cases out of the whole number did the public prosecutor attempt to show that these were not remittances of debts of honour (originally incurred on credit), after the sporting event had taken place, and the appellant's customers had ascertained that they had lost their moneys. Had it been the appellant's system to receive money beforehand at the office where he carried on business, one would have expected a very different result. Again, if the conditions which the appellant issues as those upon which he does business had shown that he would not honour a bet that he arranged with a customer unless the customer first made him a deposit, it would have been easy to draw the inference that he kept his office for the purpose of receiving such deposits. Admittedly, however, there is nothing on which the public prosecutor can found in these rules. On the contrary, in his starting-price rules for 1914, the appellant commences by stating that "all business is done by correspondence. No contracts are entered into by Mr Traynor with persons resorting to his premises," and clause 23 is to the following effect: "Short credits will be understood to be clients who do not receive detailed weekly statements, but have one or two days' credit. Short credits are perfectly legal. No money taken in advance." Substantially the same clause appears in the rules for 1913. The appellant, accordingly, takes such means as he can to inform his customers that his office is not open for the purpose of receiving advances or deposits of money, that none such will be received, and that his whole system implies mutual trust. He conducts his operations, therefore, in exactly the same way as any private individual who makes a bet with a friend before a race, and who, of course, expects to be paid his winnings if the horse he backs is successful. These being the conditions on which the appellant does business, it was conceded at the bar that there is nothing in them which, if acted upon by a client, would contravene the sections founded on. Is there, then, anything to show that the appellant, contrary to his own rules, received deposits at his office, so as to infer that he kept his office open for that purpose? I think there is absolutely nothing. Only four witnesses were examined. In the case of the first two, the bets which they made were their first transaction with the appellant. One man posted his betting slip and the postal order for the amount staked—2s.—prior to the hour of the race being run. Why he did so does not appear from the Magistrate's statement; but as he had had no prior communication with the appellant, it must have been on his own initiative. No race was run; and, accordingly, this man was entitled to get back his money, which it may be assumed he did. The same observations apply to the next witness —Gillan—except that in his case the bet was telephoned on the morning of the 14th, and that it was not till the afternoon that the slip and postal order were posted—presumably after the race was over. The third witness—Warner—made two bets, both of which he telephoned in the morning. He posted the slip and the postal order therefor later in the afternoon—admittedly after the race was run. The fourth witness made four bets on four days in January, in each case telephoning the bet in the morning, and posting on the slip and postal order later in the afternoon; but it is not said that he did so before the race on which the bet was made was run. In not a single case, therefore, was there a deposit of money in advance, as the consideration for the appellant's undertaking to pay over any winnings that might be due; and yet that is the inference which the Magistrate has drawn. The correct inference, in my judgment, was just the contrary. Stress was laid upon the point that, in several of the bets with the last two witnesses, it is found as a fact that neither got a settlement of his winnings until after the appellant had received the postal orders. I cannot see how that affects the appellant. As the postal orders were sent the same day by the customer, and the winnings only fell to be remitted in the evening, it could not have been otherwise; but this was the result of the client unnecessarily sending his postal order before he knew the result of the race, and not of any invitation by the appellant. It might have been otherwise if it had been shown that sums of money deposited or received in the appellant's office before a race was run had been retained by him; but there is no evidence of this. If the decision of the case, therefore, rested on my judgment, I should have come unhesitatingly to the conclusion that the second question falls to be answered in the negative.

Lord Dewar.—The charge against the appellant is that he kept premises open for the purpose of receiving money in respect of a promise to pay money thereafter on horse-racing contingencies or events. There is no dispute that this is a relevant charge. The only question is whether the Magistrate was justified on the evidence in convicting. I think he was.

July 18, 1914.

Traynor v. Macpherson.

Lord Dewar.

The material facts found proved are briefly as follows:—The police found on the premises a large quantity of betting material—slips, forms, and rules, relating to horse racing—the usual stock-in-trade of a betting business. These slips, forms, and rules were obviously intended for the convenience and use of persons who desired to make bets on horse-racing events. And there is evidence that they were in fact used for this purpose. In the appellant's safe a small brief-bag was found, and in that brief-bag there were 539 postal orders, amounting in value to £144, 7s. How did these postal orders come to be in the appellant's possession? No explanation was offered, nor was it explained why the appellant had assured the police that there was nothing of value in the bag, and protested that he had no key until they threatened to open it without a key. In the absence of explanation I think the Magistrate was justified in assuming that these postal orders had been sent, to the knowledge of the appellant, in respect of his promise to pay in the event of some particular horse winning a particular race. I think that evidence would, in the circumstances, have been sufficient to warrant conviction. But that is not all. Four witnesses were examined, and every one of them admits that he sent money to the appellant's premises in respect of his promise to pay in the event of a particular horse winning some race. It is said that it was not proved that the money reached the appellant before the race was run, and that it therefore must be assumed to have been what is called "credit betting." I am not satisfied that it is lawful to keep premises open for the purpose of credit betting, and I reserve my opinion upon that question. But I do not think that it arises here, because it is clear that the appellant gave no credit. On the contrary, he required and received a deposit, and in respect of that deposit he promised to pay thereafter (that is after receipt of the deposit) money on an event relating to horse races. That, I think, is a breach of the statute. It does not appear to me to be material to consider at what moment the event was determined.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that both questions should be answered in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the second question in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

C. STRACHAN PETRIE, Solicitor—SIR THOMAS HUNTER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 27.

July 22, 1914.

Mather v. H. M. Advocate.

SAMUEL MATHER, Complainer.—Cooper, K.C.—Normand.
HIS MAJESTY'S ADVOCATE, Respondent.—Morton, A.-D.

Crime—Fraud—Relevancy of indictment—Tendering worthless cheque in payment for goods already delivered.

An indictment set forth that the accused, having purchased and obtained delivery of nine cattle through a cattle mart, did fraudulently tender in payment to the cashier of the mart a cheque upon a bank, although he had no funds in the bank and knew that the cheque would not be honoured, and that he thus defrauded the mart of the price of the cattle.

Held that the indictment did not contain a relevant charge of fraud, in respect that it did not set forth that the accused had obtained delivery of the cattle by means of the worthless cheque.

July 22, 1914.

Mather v. H. M. Advocate.

High Court. Lord Justice-General. Lord Dundas. Lord Guthrie.

SAMUEL MATHER was charged on an indictment at the instance of Thomas Hart, Procurator-fiscal of Forfarshire, by authority of His Majesty's Advocate, which set forth, "that on 7th June 1913, having purchased and obtained delivery of nine cattle through the Farmers' Mart, Limited, Brechin, within their premises at Park Road, Brechin aforesaid, you did on said date and within said premises fraudulently tender to John William Henderson, cashier of the said Farmers' Mart, Limited, a cheque for £189, 2s. 6d., in payment of the price of said cattle, which amounted to £183, 12s. 6d., and of a balance of £5, 10s., due by you on a former transaction, the said cheque being drawn by you on the West End Perth Branch of the British Linen Bank, you having no funds in said Bank to meet said cheque and well knowing that said cheque would not be honoured, and you did thus defraud the said Farmers' Mart, Limited, of the sum of £183, 12s. 6d."

An agent on behalf of the accused objected to the relevancy of the indictment on the ground that the facts contained therein did not constitute an indictable offence.

The Sheriff-substitute (Neish) repelled the objection, and the accused was thereafter tried before the Sheriff (Ferguson) and a jury, and found guilty as libelled.

He brought a bill of suspension in which he pleaded;—(1) The indictment being irrelevant, suspension and liberation should be granted. (2) No crime having been libelled in the indictment, suspension and liberation should be granted. (3) No fraud being libelled in the indictment, suspension and liberation should be granted. (4) No false representation by the complainer having been libelled in the indictment, suspension and liberation should be granted. (5) The complainer not having obtained either the delivery of the cattle, or goods, or payment of money by tendering said cheque, suspension and liberation should be granted.

The case was heard before the High Court on 22nd July 1914.

Argued for the complainer;—The indictment was irrelevant. An indictment for fraudulent misrepresentation, which was the crime charged here, was only relevant if the misrepresentation founded on induced the aggrieved person to put himself into a worse position than he otherwise would have been in. In the present case the sellers had parted with the cattle before the alleged misrepresentation was made, and there was no averment that the cattle had been delivered on the faith of a statement by the accused that he had money in the bank to meet the cheque.[1] The mere giving of a cheque was not a representation that the drawer had funds in the bank,[2] and even if it were, telling a falsehood was not per se a crime by the law of Scotland. Further, it had been held that a charge of presenting a cheque in the knowledge that there were no funds to meet it did not constitute a relevant charge of falsehood, fraud, and wilful imposition.[3]

Argued for the respondent;—The indictment must be read as a whole, and when so read it set forth a relevant charge of fraud at common law, viz., the obtaining of the cattle without the ability or

---

[1] Regina v. Brooks, (1859) 1 F. & F. 502; Rex v. Dale, (1836) 7 Car. & Payne, 352.

[2] Rex v. Hazleton, (1874) L. R., 2 C. C. R. 134.

[3] Rae v. Linton, (1874) 3 Coup. 67, 2 R. (J.) 17.

July 22, 1914.

Mather v. Lord Advocate.

the intention to pay for them. Although the cattle had been delivered to the accused before he presented the cheque, it was known to the accused that probably he would not be able to remove them from the market without payment, and it was this right to remove the cattle which the accused sought to obtain by his cheque. Accordingly, the whole circumstances clearly disclosed a case of fraud.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—I think this indictment relevantly charged the accused with telling a falsehood, but telling a falsehood simpliciter is not a crime by the law of Scotland. I think it is equally clear that it does not charge the complainer with fraud according to the law of Scotland; because it appears that he actually had purchased and obtained delivery of the nine cattle, and had obtained credit for the former debt of £5, 10s., before granting the cheque in question in this case. It is not a relevant statement of a crime to say, as the indictment does, that when the accused granted the cheque he knew that he had no funds at the bank to meet the cheque. Is it then relevant to infer fraud to add that he well knew that the cheque would not be honoured? I think not.

In plain language what he did was this. Having obtained delivery of the cattle—I know not how long before the cheque was granted—he said to the seller of the cattle: "Here is a written order upon A. B., who will pay you the money," well knowing that A. B. would not pay the money. That was a falsehood, but it was not the means by which he either secured delivery of these cattle or obtained credit for £5, 10s. I do not for a moment doubt that the law is as stated in the cases to which we were referred, viz., that if a person obtains goods or money by issuing a cheque, he having no funds in bank and knowing the cheque will not be honoured, he commits a fraud. The essence of that statement lies in the little preposition "by," which is lacking in this indictment. That, I think, is a fatal flaw.

Therefore I am of opinion that the conviction ought to be suspended and liberation granted.

LORD DUNDAS and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

ALLAN LOWSON & HOOD, S.S.C.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

---

[1] Macdonald's Criminal Law, (3rd ed.) p. 84; H. M. Advocate v. Hall, (1849) J. Shaw (Just. Reps.), 254; H. M. Advocate v. Bradbury, (1872) 2 Coup. 311.

WILLIAM MOIR SCOTT, Appellant.—Lippe.
MELVILLE JAMESON (Procurator-Fiscal of Perthshire), Respondent.—Morton, A.-D.

No. 28.
July 22, 1914.

Scott v. Jameson.

Statutory Offences—Motor car—Charge of exceeding speed limit—Proof—Sufficiency of evidence—Motor Car Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), sec. 9.

The driver of a motor car was convicted of driving his car over a measured distance at a speed exceeding the speed limit, the only evidence being that of two constables, who had been stationed at either end of the measured distance, and who deponed, the one to the time at which the car entered, the other to the time at which it passed out of, the measured distance.

An objection to the sufficiency of the evidence on the ground that, as each of these times was a fundamental fact in the charge, it could not be established by the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness, repelled; and conviction sustained.

HIGH COURT. Lord Justice-General. Lord Dundas. Lord Guthrie.

WILLIAM MOIR SCOTT, Elmbrae, West Park Road, Dundee, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire at Perth on a complaint at the instance of Melville Jameson, Procurator-fiscal, which set forth that "you did on the 13th May 1914, on the main Dundee road in Invergowrie, Longforgan Parish, Perthshire, from a point opposite the door of the dwelling-house in M'Gaffin's Land there, occupied by John Robertson, millworker, to a point opposite the west entrance gate leading to the dwelling-house there, occupied by James Wilson, mill manager, drive a motor car at a speed exceeding 10 miles per hour, contrary to the Motor Cars Regulation (County of Perth) (No. 2) Order, 1905, and to section 9 of the Motor Car Act, 1903."

The accused, having been found guilty by the Sheriff-substitute (Sym), obtained a stated case on appeal to the High Court of Justiciary.

The case set forth, inter alia:—"No proof was led for the defence. The question which was raised was raised on the evidence for the prosecution, whether it was sufficient in law for a conviction. It arose on the following facts, which were proved, viz.:—There is on part of the road from Dundee to Perth, where it passes through the village of Longforgan, Perthshire, what is known as a 10-miles-an-hour limit of speed for motor cars; the village being one which extends a considerable distance along the roadside, the 10-mile limit is about half a mile in length.

"Within this limit on the occasion in question there was taken a distance of about a quarter of a mile, or (exactly) 440 yards. At a point at one end of this distance was placed a constable with a chronograph watch. The hand connected with the movement which is used for measuring exact time stood at zero. The watch had on the same day very shortly before the events to be referred to been carefully compared with another chronograph watch which is mentioned below. This constable was so placed as to be able to observe the precise moment at which a motor car entered the 440 yards from the east or Dundee end thereof. At the other or west end of the 440 yards was posted another constable, provided with the said other chronograph watch with the hand of the movement for measuring exact time also standing at zero. This second constable—a sergeant of police—was so placed as to be able to note the exact moment at which such a car passed the point of exit from the 440 yards. A third constable was posted a short distance to the west of this latter point. His duty was to stop a motor car which had passed the exit. On the day mentioned in the complaint a motor car driven by the appellant came up to the point at which the first of these constables was stationed. That constable observed the exact moment at which it passed the point which he was watching—i.e., the entrance to the said portion of the 10-mile limit under observation. He started by pressure the movement of his chronograph watch and then cycled after the car. At the precise moment at which the car passed the exit point of the 440 yards the second constable—the sergeant of police—observed that precise moment and started by pressure the movement of his chronograph watch. The car was stopped by the third constable mentioned. He took the appellant's name and address. The first constable came up on his cycle to the sergeant and handed his watch to him and he instantly stopped both. The accurate stopping or starting of the watches was proved. The watches were forthwith compared and the difference noted. The difference was 62 seconds. The number of the car was noted. The appellant was—as was not disputed—given an opportunity of comparing the watches and checking the constables' comparison. The speed at which the car had travelled the 440 yards was then computed from the difference in time between the passing the point of entrance and the passing the point of exit of the 440 yards. It proved to be 14 miles 908 yards per hour.

July 22, 1914.

Scott v. Jameson.

"The point raised was whether there should not have been two witnesses at the first constable's point of observation (himself and another) to speak to the starting of the chronographic movement of the watch at the moment at which the car entered the space taken for observation, and also two witnesses—himself and another—at the second constable's point of observation to speak to the starting of the chronographic movement of his watch at the moment of exit from the said distance of 440 yards.

"In many previous instances—though not universally—I have observed that the plan was followed of there being two witnesses at each end of the distance chosen for observation. In this case the accused, William Moir Scott, maintained that this was indispensable in point of law to any conviction. He maintained that the matters which happened at each of the points must be established by two witnesses.

"It appeared to me that, while the amount of evidence had for some reason been in this particular case reduced to its lowest limit, I could not accept the view of the accused, because an individual fact in a case can competently be proved by one witness and another individual fact related to it can be proved by another witness. Each fact does not require to be proved by several witnesses, but the matter to be established requires to be proved by more than one. I thought that the constables provided with the chronograph watches each proved sufficiently an individual fact and that, taking their evidence, which I believe and hold to be correct, together, the fact as to the speed at which the car passed over the distance under observation was established.

"On the evidence I thought that a speed of between 14 and 15 miles over the distance chosen for examination had been maintained, and that the place being limited to speed of 10 miles an hour, it was needful to convict. The excess of speed not being great, I limited the fine to £1, 1s."

The question of law was:—"Was I right in holding that the evidence was sufficient in law to support the complaint?"

The case was heard before the High Court on 22nd July 1914.

Argued for the appellant;—The evidence was insufficient to warrant the conviction. It was a settled rule of the criminal law of Scotland that the evidence of a single witness, however clear and conclusive it might be, was not sufficient to warrant a conviction unless corroborated by facts and circumstances pointing to guilt, the ratio of the rule clearly being that the word of a single witness was not per se sufficient to outweigh the word of an accused who pleaded not guilty.[1] The appellant's objection to the present conviction was that, in effect, he was convicted upon the evidence of a single witness who was entirely uncorroborated. It was true that ex facie of the proceedings two witnesses had been produced against him, but their combined evidence was, at best, only equivalent to that of a single witness. It was, indeed, less reliable, owing to the possibility of error between the two watches, than would have been the evidence of one constable who had transferred himself, by his bicycle or by a short cut, from the point of entrance to the point of exit, and who had been able thus to take the times at both points. Such a case was quite conceivable, and obviously there the evidence of the single constable would not be held sufficient. It was true that two witnesses were not required for every fact in a criminal case. The evidence of a single witness to each fact in a train of circumstances was sufficient.[2] But in the present case there was no such train of circumstances. The one fact threw no light of any kind upon the other and did not corroborate the other, and the accused was only guilty of the offence if each fact was accurate, each being fundamental to the charge. There was a clear distinction between facts which were merely important and those which were fundamental to the charge. Unless the rule of law as to a single witness was the merest formality which could in every case be avoided by putting a second witness into the box to speak to some quite unconnected and irrelevant matter—unless, indeed, the question of the sufficiency of evidence resolved itself into the simple process of counting heads—the rule must be applied here and the conviction quashed. The case of Wright v. Mitchell[3] was quite different, there being there two witnesses to all the facts spoken to, and the only question being whether, in the circumstances, their testimony could be relied on as sufficiently accurate.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff had rightly convicted the accused, the evidence being sufficient. An accused could not be convicted, it was true, on the evidence of one witness; but more than one witness was not required for each fact in the case. Here there were two witnesses, each speaking to a separate fact in the criminal proceeding, and each believed by the Sheriff to be speaking

---

[1] Alison's Criminal Law, vol. ii., p. 551; Dickson on Evidence, (3rd ed.) vol. ii., secs. 1807 et seq.

[2] Alison's Criminal Law, vol. ii., p. 551.

[3] 1910 S. C. (J.) 94, 6 Adam, 287. . . .

July 22, 1914.

Scott v. Jameson.

the truth. If the Sheriff was satisfied as to that, then there was no room for the possibility of error as there was in the case of Wright v. Mitchell.[1] There was no authority for the distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental facts.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—No question is raised in this case as to the quality of the evidence submitted to the Sheriff-substitute. That was the question raised and determined in the case of Wright v. Mitchell,[1] to which we were referred. The sole topic of controversy here is whether the evidence was adequate in law to support the conviction. I am of opinion that it was.

There can be, of course, no doubt that, if the only evidence in support of a charge is the unsupported testimony of one witness, that would not be sufficient in point of law to warrant the conviction. In this case there were two witnesses in support of the charge, and I cannot, for my part, recognise any distinction in law between what counsel have called fundamental facts and important facts. There are here, if one examines the case critically, four important facts—call them fundamental facts if you please—viz., (1) the point of time at which the car entered the stretch of road; (2) the time of exit; (3) the length of the roadway; and (4) the identity of the car. I am of opinion that each of these facts, important as each is, can be proved by one witness, if the tribunal trying the case considers that the evidence in quality is reliable.

I do not say that it would be possible to prove a case of this kind with less evidence than we have here before us. The prosecutor appears to have relied on what I may call the irreducible minimum; but if the Sheriff-substitute was satisfied with the quality of the evidence, I do not think we should disturb the conviction on the ground that it was inadequate. I am, accordingly, for answering the question in the affirmative.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree. I think the Sheriff-substitute has treated the matter quite correctly. The question argued is a purely legal one, viz., whether the evidence adduced was in law sufficient to warrant the conviction? I think it was; and that for the reasons which your lordship has stated. It would be quite another matter to say that the kind of evidence adduced here conforms to an ideal standard to be universally followed, or that it may not be safer for prosecutors, in cases of this nature, to adduce a fuller amount of evidence. That must be a matter for consideration in each case as it arises. But, in the case before us, the Sheriff-substitute thought the proof sufficient, and I consider, with your lordship, that he was right, and that the question should be answered accordingly.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion. If, in order to establish a charge, evidence is only tendered regarding one fact, that fact must be proved by two witnesses. But, if several facts require to be proved and these form a consecutive chain, leading to one conclusion, then it appears to me that each may be proved by one witness. If they do not form a consecutive chain leading to one conclusion, then it may be that each of these facts will require to be proved by two witnesses. I agree with what your Lordships have said regarding the practice in such cases. It does not follow from the decision which we are about to pronounce that any change of practice need necessarily result. One witness may in certain circumstances be sufficient to speak to a fact, but only if the Sheriff is satisfied that his testimony can be regarded as reliable.

[1] 1910 S. C. (J.) 94, 6 Adam, 287.

July 22, 1914.
Scott v. Jameson.
Lord Guthrie.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and refused the appeal.

DALGLEISH, DOBBIE, & Co., S.S.C.—SIR WILLIAM S. HALDANE, W.S., Crown Agent—Agents.

CASES

DECIDED IN

THE COURT OF SESSION, &c., 1913-1914.

CHARLES HENRY SCOTT PLUMMER, Petitioner.—J. A. Christie.
THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE FOR SCOTLAND, Respondents.

No. 1.

Sept. 23, 1913.

Scott Plummer v. Board of Agriculture.

Lease—Small holdings—Compulsory creation of small holdings by order of Land Court—Petition by landowner for appointment of arbiter to award compensation—Competence of petition where order has not fixed fair rent and conditions—Duties of Land Court and Board of Agriculture—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), sec. 7 (9) (11).

In an application by the Board of Agriculture to the Land Court for an order for the compulsory constitution of new holdings upon an estate, the Land Court pronounced an order empowering the applicants to constitute new holdings on certain portions of the estate, and to enter thereon for the purpose of carrying out the necessary works. The order did not fix the fair rent for the new holdings, nor did it determine the terms and conditions on which they were to be created. The owner of the estate having thereafter presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber for the nomination of an arbiter to fix the amount of compensation due to him—

Held (by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, Lord Johnston) that the petition was premature and fell to be dismissed, in respect that the order of the Land Court had not determined the fair rent of the holdings or the terms and conditions thereof, all of which had, under sec. 7 (9) (11) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, to be determined before a petition to appoint an arbiter could be presented.

Observations on the provisions of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, and on the duties of the Land Court and the Board of Agriculture, in regard to the creation of small holdings.

Bill-Chamber. Ld. Johnston.

CHARLES HENRY SCOTT PLUMMER, owner of the estate of Sunderland Hall, including the farm of Lindean, in the county of Selkirk, presented a petition in the Bill Chamber of the Court of Session under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911,* and particularly section 7 (11) thereof, for the nomination of an arbiter to decide the amount of compensation due to him in respect of the compulsory constitution of small holdings upon the farm of Lindean.

The petition stated:—"That on or about 27th January 1913 the Board of Agriculture for Scotland applied to the Scottish Land Court for the approval of a scheme for dividing up the said farm of Lindean into small holdings, in terms of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Acts, 1886-1911. That the petitioner lodged answers and appeared before the said Court and opposed the said scheme. That on 18th April 1913 the said Court pronounced an order whereby, after excepting certain parts of the said farm, they approved of the taking of the remainder of said farm for the purpose of forming small holdings and pronounced certain consequential findings.* That the said order was intimated to the petitioner on 23rd April 1913, and on 10th May 1913 the petitioner's agents intimated to the said Board of Agriculture that he claimed a sum in excess of £300 as compensation in respect of the formation of said small holdings. That the petitioner and the said Board have failed to agree as to the nomination of an arbiter to decide the amount of compensation due to the petitioner."

* The relevant sections of the Act are quoted by Lord Johnston in his opinion.

Sept. 23, 1913.

Scott Plummer v. Board of Agriculture.

Appearance was entered against the petition by the Board of Agriculture for Scotland.

On 23rd September 1913, the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills (Lord Johnston) dismissed the petition as presented, and found the respondents the Board of Agriculture liable in expenses.

OPINION.—It is much to be regretted that the procedure in this, which I believe to be the first case, or at least the first to which public notice has been drawn, of compulsory taking of land for the purpose of constituting new land-holdings of the class contemplated by the Small Landholders Act, 1911, has miscarried, with results which must be serious either to the owner of the land proposed to be taken, or to the Board of Agriculture, and most probably to both.

The responsibility unfortunately rests with the Land Court, to which the execution of the Act is committed, and which in pronouncing an order (of 18th April 1913) authorising the constitution of new holdings on the farm of Lindean belonging to the petitioner in the county of Selkirk in accordance with an approved scheme, under sections 7 et seq. of the Act,

---

* These findings were:—"Therefore find, declare, and determine that the applicants are empowered to constitute new holdings on, and in respect of, the said farm of Lindean other than the portions thereof above expressly excluded, and to exercise this power up to the 28th day of May 1914, or such other date as may be agreed on between the applicants and the landlord, but reserving as to the extension of the said date on cause shown; and further find and declare that the applicants are entitled, as from the date of intimation of this order by the Sheriff-clerk, to make this order effective by entering on the said farm of Lindean other than the portions thereof above expressly excluded, and executing or carrying on all works which may, in their judgment, be required for the erection or adaptation of dwelling-houses, steadings, offices, or other buildings thereon, or for the division, preparation, or adaptation of the land, or for the provision of drainage or water supply, or for similar purposes, with a view to the constitution of new holdings thereon and the registration of new holders in respect thereof, reserving all claims of damage or compensation competent to the respondents or any of them: Appoint the applicants to lodge with the principal clerk within fifteen days after intimation of this order (1) an amended plan showing the number of holdings, and the boundaries and acreage of each holding which they propose should be constituted on the said farm of Lindean other than the portions thereof above expressly excluded, and also (2) a statement specifying such terms and conditions, if any, as they desire shall be made by the Court terms and conditions of the tenure of the said holdings, and allow the respondent, C. H. Scott Plummer, Esquire, to lodge a statement with regard to these matters, if so advised, within ten days thereafter; and with these findings continue the application for further procedure."

has omitted to perform one or more of the essential duties imposed upon it by the Act, and, though apparently urged to take the matter up so as to remedy the defect, has for six months refused or at least delayed to do so.

So far as I am concerned with the Act of 1911 in regard to the present question, it may be described as an engine for the creation of new small holdings, which, subject to a system of registration provided by the Act, shall be held on a statutory tenure in many respects approaching that of crofting holdings in the Highlands and the adjoining counties under the former Crofters Acts. It is not so expressed, but is, I think, tacitly and of necessity contemplated that such new holdings are in the main to be carved out of lands at present let on lease or otherwise devoted to agriculture. And therefore their creation must, at any rate where the compulsory powers of the Act are resorted to, involve a grave interference with estate management, and cannot be effected without the destruction of capital sunk in years past, by the owner or his predecessors, to secure the present beneficial occupation of the land. I desire to say that I am not concerned with any criticism of the object of the Act, and the expectations of its framers. I am only concerned with its provisions for the attainment of its objects, which are both difficult of application—or rather of correlation—and are, I am afraid, likely to be found somewhat insufficient.

Such new holdings may be created by agreement, but provision is also made for their being created compulsorily. The initiative lies with the Board of Agriculture, with whom also is to a large extent the administration. But the executive is with the Land Court, without whose intervention the Board of Agriculture is powerless. Now, where an existing and going farm is to be broken up for the purpose of constituting new holdings on an approved scheme (and this is the general conception of a compulsory constitution under the Act), inevitably the interests of the owner of the land are affected, and very possibly injuriously affected, for it is seldom that an existing system, which has cost money to create, can be replaced by a totally different system also costing money to create without the loss of some of the capital already sunk, and without affecting the value of the original product of that capital. And, moreover, there are special provisions relating to the new holdings when constituted under the Act—viz.: those relating to the vacating of holdings and the resumption of holdings (sections 17-19), imposing heavy obligations on the landowner involving the payment of compensation (in the event of a scheme for constitution of new holdings breaking down after having been put in motion), for works, &c., executed in pursuance of the Act,—which on their face make the change intended to be effected under the Act a very serious thing to the owner of the land. It is therefore not to be supposed that the Act does not make some provision for protection of the owners' interests, though that these provisions are as difficult to work as they are to construe is forcibly illustrated in the present case. The root of the difficulty is in the correlating, in point of order and of time, of what has to be done by the Board of Agriculture, by the Land Court, and by the landowner, in order to give effect to the apparent intention, so far as it goes, of the statute to protect and compensate the last mentioned.

The machinery provided by the Act is this. Under the heading "Powers to facilitate the constitution of new holdings," which are practically all comprised in one section, section 7, with its various subsections, the Act, section 7 (2), imposes on the Commissioner for small holdings the duty to report to his Board the demand for small holdings in any district, the land available to meet the demand, the conditions under which the land is presently cultivated, and the employment which it affords. He is then, section 7 (3), to negotiate with the owners of such land with a view to the adjustment of a scheme, and, section 7 (4), failing agreement, such land may be made available for the registration of new holders compulsorily, as prescribed in the subsequent subsections.

Sept. 23, 1913.

Scott Plummer v. Board of Agriculture.

Ld. Johnston.

There follows a provision of some practical importance, section 7 (7), viz.:—Where, with a view to, or as incidental to, the registration of a new holder or holders in respect of any land, the Board are of opinion that assistance should be provided "for the purpose of dividing, fencing, or otherwise preparing or adapting the land, making occupation roads, or executing other works, such as works for the provision of drainage or water supply, or erecting or adapting a dwelling-house or dwelling-houses or other buildings, or for other similar purpose, the Board may provide such assistance by way of loan or (except as regards dwelling-houses or other buildings) by way of gift, and subject to such conditions as they may prescribe. . . ."

Then section 7 (9) proceeds to provide the compulsory powers. After submitting to the landowner a scheme for constitution of new holdings, if the landowner does not agree with him, the Commissioner is to report to the Board, and the Board may, after notice and hearing parties, intimate to the landowner that it is in the public interest that new holdings should be constituted on his land in accordance with the scheme, and that they propose to apply to the Land Court "to make an order or orders for the constitution of one or more new holdings on the land in accordance with such scheme, to be occupied by new holders, at a fair rent and upon such terms and conditions, not inconsistent with the Landholders Acts, as the Land Court consider just; and thereafter to apply accordingly."

It will be noted that the fair rent and the terms and conditions are essential features of the order. Accordingly section 7 (11) says that the Land Court shall determine "and by order or orders declare" four things —(a) In respect of what land specified in the scheme new holdings may be constituted, and up to what date the power to constitute them compulsorily may be exercised; (b) the fair rent for each new holding; (c) what land embraced in the scheme should be excluded; and (d) whatever else may be necessary for the purpose of making the scheme effective, and of adjusting the rights of parties.

But the order or orders for the constitution of one or more new holdings, while it or they must determine these four things, is and are subject to this proviso, viz.:—That where the Land Court "are of opinion that damage or injury will be done to the letting value of the land to be occupied by a new holder or new holders, or of any farm of which such land forms part, . . . or to any landlord . . . in respect of any depreciation in the value of the estate of which the land forms part, in consequence of and directly attributable to the constitution of the new holding or holdings as proposed, they shall require the Board, in the event of the scheme being proceeded with, to pay compensation to such amount as the Land Court determine," with right to the landowner to demand arbitration, if his claim exceeds £300.

Now this right conferred upon the landowner is severely hedged about, and it is the time-limitations imposed which to a large extent create the difficulty in this case and will do so equally in future cases. Before any claim can arise to the landowner the Court must have pronounced an order under subsection (11) determining the four matters enumerated, for it is made incumbent on him within twenty-one days of receipt of such an order to intimate to the Court and to the Board that his claim exceeds £300, and his demand for arbitration, and it is impossible that he should do so until he knows at least the determination of the Court upon these four matters and all of them. Again he is limited to fourteen days to agree with the Board on an arbiter, and failing that to apply to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for the appointment of one; but his award is only to be binding on the Board in the event of the scheme being proceeded with, that is to say, the Board are to be free to accept or reject the award, whereas the landowner is bound by it. And again the arbiter is limited to three months from his nomination for the issue of his award, failing which the matter reverts to the Land Court. Such drastic limitations of time bear hardly on the landowner in any case, when the complication of elements statutory and otherwise bearing upon his claim of compensation is kept in mind, and make it at least essential that every item of these elements is clearly determined and ascertainable before the order of the Court, which is the starting point of these limitations, is issued.

Lastly, so far as section 7 is concerned, it is provided by subsection (13) that upon an order providing for the constitution of new holdings being issued, the Board "may proceed to make it effective by entering on the land, carrying out works, and otherwise as may be required (due compensation to such amount as may be agreed, or as, in case of dispute, may be determined by the Land Court, being made for surface damage), and may negotiate with one or more duly qualified applicants with a view to their registration as new holders in respect of the land." It will be noted that the power or right of entry arises automatically on the issue of the Court's order, and requires no further intervention of the Land Court.

Now one thing which the Act wholly omits to do, and this complicates the landlord's position when he comes to formulate his claim, is to make any direct provision for what is to happen during the transition from, as is the case here, a single holding fully equipped to a state of parcel holdings, for which new holders are to be found, and which have got to be equipped when these have been found. I say that the Act wholly omits to make any such direct provision, but in self-defence,—inasmuch as the Small Landholders Act of 1911 not only creates an entirely new departure but incorporates by reference, and codifies with amendment but without re-enactment, that is to say codifies by reference, the whole crofter legislation of the last twenty-five years, contained in six Acts of Parliament,—I must disclaim any certainty that no such indirect provision may exist, embedded somewhere in some of the Acts. I can only say that I have not found, and that my attention has not been directed to, any such. And there is another thing which acts, and that seriously, in the same direction, namely the doubt that there must be in the minds of all concerned until the arbiter pronounces his award, and I am inclined to think possibly much longer, as to whether the scheme is to proceed.

The registration of new holders is provided for by section 15. I shall subsequently refer to section 17 which provides for the amendment of the law as to vacant holdings.

Now in these provisions there are, as I think I have already indicated, a great many points which act and react upon one another. They must all pretty well get through the gate abreast. And this I think has been inadequately appreciated by the Land Court. The situation created by the Act is this. The Board apply for a compulsory order. In granting it the Court must inter alia fix a fair rent and fix conditions of let. The Court cannot do this without knowing a great deal more than merely what area is proposed to be affected, and how it is proposed to be divided. They must have the details of a fully prepared scheme, showing what the Board propose to do in the way of preparing and developing the land for new holdings, and particularly in the way of adapting existing buildings, and possibly also what they propose to do under section 7 (7) in the way of assisting new holders. If the Court grant an order, three things immediately follow. 1st. The Board may at once enter on possession to make effective their scheme by carrying out necessary works, &c. 2nd. The landowner is put under very drastic limitations to make and prosecute his claims for compensation. 3rd. The Board, if the proposal is to be worked out in a businesslike way, must at once begin to negotiate with tenants.

It is in the first place impossible that the landowner can proceed to

Sept. 23, 1913.

Scott Plummer v. Board of Agriculture.

Ld. Johnston.

state and prosecute his claim for compensation, even so far as the potential damage to him is realised by the statute, unless he has before him at least all that the Court has had before it, when it came to pronounce its order. In the second place it is, I think, essential that the Board (though the statute contemplates that they will at once on the issue of the Court's order enter on possession), should have before them, before they do so, the arbiter's award of compensation to the landowner. For they can hardly enter on such possession to make their scheme effective until they have determined to proceed with it, and they have locus pœnitentiæ at least until the issue of the award, nay further. And, in the last place, unless it be assumed that the Board enter on their scheme with a number of willing tenants on leash, the Board cannot begin to negotiate with applicants until all the data for determining whether they are to proceed with the scheme are not only before them but before such applicants.

Now in this relation there is one matter which is left indefinite, viz.:—What amounts to proceeding with the scheme, and therewith in what the constitution of a new holding consists; and presumably there is some relation between such constitution and the Board "proceeding" with the scheme. The order of the Court does not constitute the holding. It is merely an order for, which must mean empowering, the constitution. Section 7, subsection (11) (a), clearly shows that it is the Board who are to constitute the holding or holdings, for the time to be allowed them to do so is to be limited. But what amounts to constitution is left indeterminate. The statute jumps over constitution and passes to registration, and it is not clear whether the constitution is the Board's determining to proceed with the scheme or the act of the Board in entering on possession of the land, or an agreement with an applicant (as to which the Act is throughout silent), or the registration of an accepted applicant. This is of importance, for the Act makes no direct provision for the compensation of the landlord for loss of the use of his land while the Board is making up its mind whether it is to proceed with its scheme, is executing works, and is negotiating with tenants. Further, it is not made clear whether the Board, if it constitute one holding, must constitute all unico contextu, or whether it can constitute one or more holdings, and abandon its scheme quoad the rest, and if it does, what redress the landowner has whose compensation is ex hypothesi already fixed on the footing that the whole scheme is to come to maturity. For I cannot see that section 17 would be applicable. These last considerations may not be directly germane to the present question. But they at least give point to the conclusion that everything is to be included in the landowner's claim and the arbiter's award for which the statute provides that the landowner is to be compensated.

The least, however, that the Act contemplates to that end is, I think, that the compensation to the landowner must be settled before the Board can determine whether it will proceed with its scheme; that before the landowner can be called on to claim or the arbiter to award, however hypothetical the situation may be, both must know not merely the four things which by section 7 (11) the Court are called on to include in their order but the whole details of a comprehensive scheme, which cannot be altered after the issue of the Court's order, or at any rate without abandoning and beginning again.

I have no full information about the scheme of the Board and how far it is complete. But I do know that the excuse of the Land Court for stopping short was stated to be that the fair rent cannot be fixed until the Board either settle or do something, I am not sure which or what. I also know that the Board, though they have unfortunately ousted the landowner and taken possession, say that they can do nothing either in the way of developing the holdings or dealing with applicants until they know the fair rent, the conditions, and the amount of compensation. And the landowner justly says that he cannot proceed to arbitration until everything is settled between the Board and the Court. And there the impasse has arisen and has remained now for six months. The Court having visited the estate has laid its hand on the land and has approved a scheme of division, for that is all that its order ostensibly does, has assumed to give authority to the Board to enter, and has gone to other work and makes no further move. The Board by way of avoiding the impasse asks that, as the landowner, impelled by the statutory limitations on him, has presented ob majorem cautelam, on 22nd May 1913, a petition for nomination of an arbiter, on which however in the circumstances no step has yet been taken, I should at once make an appointment, even invito the landowner. I think that that would not clear the ground, even if it was competent, and that it is at present wholly incompetent.

The Land Court must return and complete its duty under the statute, and then it will be time for the landowner to apply for the appointment of an arbiter. When the Land Court pronounces the statutory order, and not till then, will the Board be automatically and legally entitled to enter into possession, and will not require such an order as that on which they have acted, but which the Land Court had no statutory authority to pronounce. A perusal of that portion of the order of 18th April 1913, viz. :—"And further find and declare that the applicants" (i.e., the Board of Agriculture) "are entitled, as from the date of intimation of this order by the Sheriff-clerk, to make this order effective by entering on the said farm of Lindean other than the portions thereof above expressly excluded, and executing or carrying on all works which may, in their judgment, be required for the erection or adaptation of dwelling-houses, steadings, offices, or other buildings thereon, or for the division, preparation, or adaptation of the land, or for the provision of drainage or water supply or for similar purposes, with a view to the constitution of new holdings thereon, and the registration of new holders in respect thereof; reserving all claims of damage or compensation competent to the respondents or any of them," shows how entirely the situation has been misapprehended, while what follows, viz. :—"Appoint the applicants to lodge with the principal clerk within fifteen days after intimation of this order (1) an amended plan showing the number of holdings and the boundaries and acreage of each holding which they propose should be constituted on the said farm of Lindean, other than the portions thereof above expressly excluded; and also (2) a statement specifying such terms and conditions, if any, as they desire shall be made by the Court terms and conditions of the tenure of the said holdings; and allow the respondent C. H. Scott Plummer, Esq., to lodge a statement with regard to these matters, if so advised, within ten days thereafter; and with these findings continue the application for further procedure," shows how inchoate the matter was even on the face of the order.

I have some difficulty as to how best to deal with the petition, whether to continue or to dismiss it. It is premature at present—though looking to the terms of the Land Court's order I think it was justified—and I think it better to dismiss it. There is no knowing how the position may develop meanwhile, and whether or not a similar petition will ultimately be Mr Scott Plummer's proper course. But the situation having been created by one public body in consequence of the action of another public body, I think that the private individual is entitled in the circumstances, and in this the first case in which it has been necessary to consider the compulsory provisions of the Act, to his expenses against the latter. It might have been otherwise if the respondents had not sought to take advantage of the petition in their own interest.

MYLNE & CAMPBELL, W.S.—Sir HENRY COOK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 2.
Oct. 16, 1913.

ADAM MAITLAND, LORD PROVOST OF ABERDEEN, AND OTHERS (Directors of Aberdeen Female Domestic Servants' Benevolent Fund), Petitioners.—J. H. Millar.

Aberdeen Servants' Benevolent Fund.

Charitable and Educational Trust—Administration—Settlement of scheme—Application by ex officio directors for authority to denude and transfer the funds to a charitable association.

Circumstances in which ex officio directors of a charitable society for the benefit of domestic servants in Aberdeen were authorised to denude of the trust, and to transfer the funds and management thereof to the Aberdeen Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor.

1ST DIVISION. ON 13th May 1913 a petition was presented to the Court by Adam Maitland, Lord Provost of Aberdeen, and others, the directors ex officio of the Aberdeen Female Domestic Servants' Benevolent Fund, for a scheme of administration of that fund.

The petition set forth:—"That the said fund was instituted at a meeting held in Aberdeen on 7th October 1853, apparently on the initiative of a lady resident in Aberdeen, who is stated to have paid a handsome donation thereto. The rules adopted at the said meeting . . . provided, inter alia, that the society should be for the benefit of female domestic servants employed in Aberdeen and in that part of the parish of Old Machar lying south of the river Don, while afflicted with sickness and unable to maintain themselves, and who are at the time members of the society; that every member shall pay half-yearly at least one shilling, and to entitle any servant who is a member to prefer a claim on the funds of the society she must have paid thereto at least two consecutive half-yearly payments of not less than one shilling each at the distance of six months from each other; and that any person, male or female, not a domestic servant, may also become a member of the society under the regulations on payment of at least two shillings each year, but without thereby creating any claim of benefit from the funds. The said rules further made provision for the appointment of a considerable number of directors.

"The earlier history of the fund is involved in obscurity, but it appears that at a meeting of the directors held on 20th December 1881, the late Mr William Kendall Burnett, advocate in Aberdeen, who died on 17th July 1912, was appointed treasurer and secretary to the fund, with instructions to revise the rules dealing with the constitution thereof with a view to rendering it more efficient, and to report to the directors as soon as possible. The rules so revised were approved at a meeting of directors held on 28th January 1882, and were printed and circulated in the following month. . . . By the said rules it was provided that, in addition to two directors elected by subscribers, there should be four ex officio directors, viz., the Lord Provost of Aberdeen, the senior Bailie, the Dean of Guild, and the chairman of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor. These six directors were to co-opt four others.

"It is at the instance of the four ex officio directors above named that the present application is presented. . . .

"The number of members of the fund, which in 1882 stood at 23, rose in 1883 to 25. Since that date, however, it has steadily diminished. In 1886 only five members, and in 1889 only three members remained, and from 1893 onwards there has been only one member of the fund, Miss Amelia Crombie. No benefits have been distributed since 1897, and the funds of the society, which in 1894 were augmented by the receipt of two legacies, have continued to accumulate.

"The accounts for the financial year ending 17th January 1913 show that, as at that date, the funds amounted to £436, 14s. 11d.

"With a view to testing the possibility of resuscitating the fund upon its existing basis, the petitioners, in the month of December 1912, caused an advertisement to be inserted thrice in each of the two morning newspapers, and four times in each of the two evening newspapers, circulating in Aberdeen and the adjacent district, calling attention to the conditions and benefits of the fund, and inviting applications for membership. No such application has been received, and in point of fact the advertisement . . . elicited only two inquiries.

"From the experience of the past twenty years, as well as from the absence of any response to their advertisement, the petitioners are satisfied that it is impossible to carry on the fund upon the present footing, and that a continuance of the contributory element will necessarily involve a complete failure of the trust purposes. Any prospect of a revival of the fund upon the old lines appears to be irrevocably closed by the coming into operation of the National Insurance Act, 1911. If, accordingly, your Lordships should be satisfied of the expediency and competency of carrying on the administration of the fund upon a non-contributory basis, the petitioners would humbly crave your Lordships' authority to denude of the trust, and to transfer the trust funds, as well as the duty of administering the same, to the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor in Aberdeen. The said association was founded in the year 1869, and has conducted various branches of charitable work among the poor in the city of Aberdeen. It devotes special attention to the obtaining of accurate information of the state of the poor and the verifying of such information by personal investigation. The work of the association is controlled by a large and representative acting committee, under whose supervision the detailed work is conducted by sectional committees and a body of visitors. The association expends on various charitable objects a yearly income of over £1100, and is possessed of funds exceeding £3900. One of the chief objects of the association is by the gradual consolidation of existing charitable agencies to diminish the expenditure of money and labour attending numerous distinct organisations. The association has already been entrusted with the custody and administration of funds belonging to other charitable organisations, and, in particular, there were transferred to it in the year 1898 the funds of the Aberdeen Sick Man's Friend Society, a benevolent institution dating from 1792. The petitioners believe that they themselves are not a suitable body to administer a trust of this character, and that, if they are to do so with any success, they must be almost entirely guided by such information and advice as the said association or some similar body may be prepared to supply them with. The petitioners have lodged a draft scheme, printed in the appendix hereto, giving effect to the foregoing proposal, and embodying the rules under which they would suggest that the association should henceforth administer the fund, and the association has intimated that it is prepared to accept and execute the trust under the regulations and conditions therein contained.

Oct. 16, 1913.

Aberdeen Servants' Benevolent Fund.

"If, however, it should appear to your Lordships to be incompetent or inexpedient to allow the petitioners to denude of the trust, the petitioners would crave your Lordships' sanction to an alternative scheme of administration, under which they would themselves propose to administer the trust for the future."

The Court having remitted to Lord Kinross, advocate, to report on the petition, he reported in favour of the alternative scheme proposed by the petitioners, stating that it did not appear to him that, in order to invoke the aid of a society like the Aberdeen Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, it was necessary to replace the existing trustees.

The petition was heard before the First Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) on 16th October 1913.

Counsel for the petitioners, in moving the Court to approve of the original scheme proposed by the petitioners (the scheme which involved their denuding of the trust), submitted that the case was distinguishable from that of a trust constituted by the writings of a benefactor where the funds were to be held by ex officio trustees of his selection.[1]

The Court, without delivering opinions, approved of the original scheme proposed by the petitioners.

MACKENZIE & KERMACK, W.S., Agents.

No. 3.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees.

CHARLES CAMPBELL M'LEOD AND OTHERS (Dr John Macleod's Marriage-contract Trustees) AND OTHERS, First, Third, and Fourth Parties.—Moncrieff, K.C.—Black.

CHARLES CAMPBELL M'LEOD AND OTHERS (Dr John Macleod's Testamentary Trustees), Second Parties.—Howden.

THE REV. ROBERT BALDOCK SCOTT AND OTHERS (Mr and Mrs Scott's Marriage-contract Trustees) AND OTHERS, Fifth and Sixth Parties.—Blackburn, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.

Succession—Faculties and Powers—Power of appointment—Validity of exercise—Appointment to persons not objects of power—Consent of objects of power.

A father made provision in his marriage-contract for payment after his death of certain sums to the capital value of £3000 to the children of his marriage, reserving to himself power to apportion these sums among his children. He died survived by sons and daughters. In his will he professed to exercise the reserved power by bequeathing a legacy of £25 to each of his sons, and by directing his trustees to hold a sum of £7000 of the residue of his estate for his daughters in liferent and for their issue in fee. In a special case in which the daughters, as parties, consented to and upheld the validity of this appointment—

Held, following Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees, (1885) 12 R. 1230, that the appointment, although made to persons who were not objects of the power, had been wholly validated by this consent.

Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees doubted per Lord Johnston.

---

[1] M'Lean, (1898) 1 F. 48, distinguished in M'Grouther's Trustees, 1911 S. C. 315.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees.

1st Division.

On 13th July 1912 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court as to the validity of an appointment made by the Rev. John Macleod, D.D., minister of the parish of Govan, in his testamentary settlement, in exercise of certain powers reserved to him in the marriage-contract entered into between him and his wife Alexandrina Macpherson.

By this marriage-contract Dr Macleod conveyed to trustees a policy of assurance upon his own life for £1000, and provided that, after the death of the survivor of himself and his wife, the proceeds thereof should be divided among the children of his marriage, "declaring that if there shall be more than one child of said intended marriage, it shall be lawful to and in the power of the said John Macleod at any time of his life and while unmarried after the death of the said Alexandrina Macpherson, and even on deathbed to divide and proportion as he shall think fit and proper among said children the foresaid principal sum of One thousand pounds or the balance thereof and any additions thereto and interest thereof herein before provided to them and failing of any such division then the said sum of One thousand pounds or the balance thereof and any additions thereto and interest thereof shall belong to and be divided among said children equally and share and share alike." The marriage-contract also contained this provision:—"And for provisions to the children if any of the said intended marriage the said John Macleod binds and obliges himself and his foresaids to pay to such child or children the sum of Two thousand pounds sterling as at the date of his death with interest at the rate foresaid from that date till payment and that in such shares and proportions if more than one child as he shall fix and appoint by any writing under his hand and failing such writing then equally and share and share alike." The provisions in favour of children were declared to be in full satisfaction of all their legal rights.

Dr Macleod died on 4th August 1898, survived by his wife, and by five sons and two daughters. One of these sons, Duncan Archibald Macleod, died on 9th December 1907. Dr Macleod's widow died on 20th May 1910.

Dr Macleod left a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed his whole estate, including any sums with regard to which he might have a power of disposal in virtue of the terms of his marriage-contract, to trustees for certain trust purposes. By the fourth of these purposes he directed his trustees to pay to each of his sons, on majority, the sum of £25; by the fifth purpose he directed them to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his widow in liferent. The sixth purpose was in these terms:—"I direct and appoint my trustees upon the death or second marriage of my said wife, or upon the youngest of my surviving sons attaining majority should such event not take place before the death or second marriage of my said wife, and in the event of there being two or more of my daughters surviving, to hold, retain and invest, in their own names as trustees foresaid, a sum of Seven thousand pounds sterling out of the remainder of my means and estate, and to pay or apply the free annual income arising therefrom to or for behoof of my said daughters in equal proportions for their liferent alimentary use allenarly, and on the death of any or all of my said daughters leaving lawful issue, my trustees shall pay to or for behoof of such issue, in equal proportions, the share of free annual income which would have effeired to their mother had she survived, and on the youngest of said issue attaining majority

Oct. 18, 1918.

Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees.

(until which event vesting shall not take place), my trustees shall pay to the issue then surviving and equally among them the share of the capital of the fund hereinbefore directed to be liferented by their mother and them respectively." In the event of there being any residue remaining after satisfying the provision of £7000 just mentioned, the trustees were directed to divide it equally among his sons.

The settlement contained the following declaration:—"And I hereby declare that the provisions hereinbefore conceived in favour of my sons and daughters are made by me in exercise of the powers of apportionment and division conferred upon me by the foresaid Contract of Marriage in regard to a sum or provision of Two thousand pounds sterling, and the contents or proceeds of a Policy of Assurance for One thousand pounds sterling, effected on my life, both particularly mentioned in said Contract of Marriage, and shall be accepted of by my said sons and daughters in full satisfaction of all claims competent to them or any of them on my decease under said Contract of Marriage in regard to said sum or provision of Two thousand pounds sterling, and the contents or proceeds of said Policy of Assurance for one thousand pounds sterling." The testator further declared that, in the event of any of his children repudiating the provisions in their favour, that child's interest in the marriage-contract funds should be restricted to £25, and he should forfeit all further interest in the testator's estate.

The parties to the case were — (First) Dr Macleod's marriage-contract trustees, (Second) his testamentary trustees, (Third) his four surviving sons, (Fourth) the executor of his deceased son, (Fifth) and (Sixth) the marriage-contract trustees of his two daughters, with the concurrence of the daughters and their husbands respectively.

The questions of law included the following:—"(1) Is the exercise of the power of appointment contained in Dr Macleod's trust-disposition and settlement (a) wholly valid, (b) only partially valid, or (c) wholly invalid as an exercise of the power reserved in the marriage-contract with reference to the policy of assurance and the sum of £2000?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without the Lord President) on 4th July 1913.

Argued for the third and fourth parties;—The appointment was wholly invalid, having been made to grandchildren who were not objects of the powers, and the consent of the daughters was ineffectual to validate the appointment. Where an estate was directed to be divided among a certain class, certain members of that class could not authorise its division among persons who were outside it.[1] The case of Mackie[2] which was cited for the fifth and sixth parties was wrongly decided. The decision that an appointment to persons outside a power might be validated by the consent of a person who was an object of the power stood upon the authority of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Fraser) alone, and the authorities on which his Lordship relied did not support his judgment. As had been pointed out by Lord Dundas in the case of MacGillivray's Trustees v. Watson's Trustees,[3]

[1] Crum Ewing's Trustees v. Bayly's Trustees, 1910 S. C. 484, per Lord Kinnear, at p. 497.

[2] Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees, (1885) 12 R. 1230.

[3] 1911 S. C. 1103.

Lord Fraser's opinion had been acquiesced in in the Inner House, but the present question had not been argued there. The only question which was argued in the Inner House on this branch of Mackie's case [1] was whether such consent must necessarily be in writing. Nor was it possible in the present case to hold that the appointment was partially valid. No doubt if an appointment, valid in itself, was hedged about by invalid conditions, the latter might be held pro non scriptis.[2] But here the appointment itself was invalid, for the reasons already given, and therefore it could not be sustained to any extent.[3]

Argued for the fifth and sixth parties;—It was conceded that the appointment might have been open to attack from one of the beneficiaries whose interest had been cut down from a fee to a liferent, but this appointment was acquiesced in by the daughters, the only beneficiaries whose interest had been so treated. It would have been competent for the testator to restrict the daughters' interest to one of liferent by provisions to that effect inserted in their marriage-contracts, with their consent, during his lifetime.[1] There was no reason why the fact that such consent was not given until after his death should alter its legal effect.

Counsel for the fifth and sixth parties gave formal consent at the bar to the appointment which had been made.

At advising on 18th October 1913,—

Lord Kinnear.—[After narrating the terms of the marriage-contract and of Dr Macleod's trust-disposition and settlement]—Now, it is perfectly clear—and it is not disputed—that it is no objection to the exercise of the power that the testator has thrown the moneys to which it applies into the general estate and disposed of them in terms as if they were part of the general estate. Nor is it any objection that, if the will takes effect, the sons will have little more than what has been called an illusory gift—£25—the greater part of the small estate remaining to be divided going to the daughters in liferent and to their children in fee. So far the execution of the power is admitted to be perfectly regular and valid, but then the question which has occasioned the present dispute arises.

The dispute arises from his settlement of the shares which he gives to his daughters upon them in liferent and their children in fee, because it is obvious that that brings into the distribution persons who are not objects of the power, to wit, the grandchildren. He is bound by his marriage-contract to divide these moneys among his children, and the grandchildren being outside the limits of the power to which he is by contract restricted, it is said that the execution of the power has failed, and that the estate must be divided among the children equally.

Now, I think that might have raised a question of considerable difficulty if it had not been already settled by authority which is binding upon this Court. It is exactly the question which arose for decision in

---

[1] Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees, 12 R. 1230.

[2] Dalziel v. Dalziel's Trustees, (1905) 7 F. 545; Middleton's Trustees v. Middleton, (1906) 8 F. 1037.

[3] Dick's Trustees v. Cameron, 1907 S. C. 1018, was also referred to.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees.

Lord Kinnear.

the case of Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees,[1] where it was held that, under a power to appoint among children, interests might be given to grandchildren, either by way of settlement or otherwise, with the concurrence of their mother, provided that the mother herself was an object of the power. I take that to be quite clearly and distinctly laid down as law in that case. The circumstances were exactly the same as those with which we are concerned, because the testatrix in that case had settled, by marriage-contract, certain heritable and moveable estate for herself in liferent and for her children in fee in such proportions as she might appoint by writing under her hand. She died leaving a trust-disposition and settlement in which she stated her intention to exercise this power of appointment, and directed her trustees to pay a certain legacy to her son and the rest of her estate to her daughter in liferent and the daughter's children in fee. Now, that is exactly the same position as we have to consider. It was objected on behalf of the son that the exercise of the power was invalid, because it brought in persons who were not objects of the power. The Court held, on the ground I have mentioned, that the power was well exercised in so far as it settled a liferent upon the daughter, and the fee upon her children, inasmuch as she consented to that disposition of the fund.

I think that case is binding upon us, and that we are bound to follow it. If it were open to consideration we should have no power to review or to overrule it as the Court is at present constituted, and the only way in which, if it were erroneous, it could be corrected would be by an appeal to the House of Lords, or by decision of a Court of seven Judges. I should not have been averse to take the second of these two courses if the estate with which we are concerned had been a large one, but I should have assented to that proposal only out of deference to certain views which have been expressed in the other Division, in a later case, and also in deference to what I believe to be the view of my learned brother, Lord Johnston. As far as I am concerned I see no reason to doubt that the decision in Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees [1] is based upon a body of authority which justifies it. I think the law has been laid down by the highest authorities, and especially by the authority upon whom we always have looked as the weightiest of all authorities upon the doctrine of powers, Lord St Leonards. And in the series of cases to which I have already referred it is found to be no objection to the exercise of a power that it gives the fee to the grandchildren, who are not objects of the power, provided that that is done with the consent of a parent who is an object of the power, and to whom the liferent is given.

In the present case there can, of course, be no question at all that we have the consent of the daughters, so far as their interest is concerned, and that we must proceed upon that consent, because they have expressed it in the simplest and most effective of all possible ways by appearing in this case and supporting the execution of the power by their father's will as valid. We must take it, therefore, that the thing is done with their approval and consent.

---

[1] 12 R. 1230.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees.

Lord Kinnear.

In those circumstances I should not myself have thought it necessary that the case of Mackie v. Mackie's Trustees[1] should be reconsidered, but if there had been sufficient estate in dispute to justify such a course I should not have been averse to the proposal to send this case to seven Judges. But then the estate is an extremely small one—there is not much over £3000 to be divided, I think, among six children—and I think it would be really oppressive to expose these people to the expense of further litigation and a new hearing because of any difficulty which this Court might have in accepting the case of Mackie.[1] My view is that, whatever our own opinion may be, we are bound by that decision, but so far as I am concerned I see no reason to doubt its soundness.

I should, therefore, propose to your Lordships to answer the first question in the affirmative, in so far as it regards the first alternative of that question: "Is the exercise of the power of appointment contained in Dr Macleod's trust-disposition and settlement wholly valid?" I think we should say that it is.

Lord Johnston.—The late Rev. John Macleod unquestionably intended by his will to exercise a power of appointment among his children of the provision made by him for them in his antenuptial marriage-contract. It is not immaterial to note that these provisions were onerous, the children's legal rights being by a term of the contract satisfied thereby. Dr Macleod exercised his power by a practically illusory appointment to his sons and the appointment substantially of the whole fund to his daughters equally in liferent and their issue in fee. Prima facie, therefore this is, quoad the fee, an appointment in favour of strangers to the power. But it is said that such an appointment, the daughters raising no objection to the settlement upon their children, is valid on the authority of Mackie's case.[1] I have carefully examined that case and the authorities on which it proceeded, and I am satisfied that it is so closely identical with the present that we could not, without repudiating its authority, do otherwise than sustain the appointment here. I agree with your Lordship that we are bound to follow it, or submit the question to a combined Court of both Divisions. It is not without hesitation that I concur in abstaining from the latter course in the present case. But the reasons which your Lordship has stated, and in which I understand that Lord Mackenzie concurs, prevail. At the same time I desire respectfully to associate myself with the doubt of the authority of the decision in Mackie's case,[1] expressed by Lord Dundas in the case of MacGillivray's Trustees.[2] I am not satisfied that the English authorities on which the judgment in Mackie's case[1] proceeded have been examined with sufficient discrimination, and I think that the question is deserving of reconsideration in a more appropriate case than the present.

I therefor concur in disposing of this special case as your Lordship proposes.

Lord Mackenzie.—I agree with Lord Kinnear. I am prepared in this [1] 12 R. 1230. [2] 1911 S. C. 1103.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Macleod's Trustees v. Macleod's Trustees.

case to follow the decision in the case of Mackis,[1] an authority which is directly in point.

THE COURT answered the first branch of the first question in the affirmative.

BELL, BANNERMAN, & FINLAY, W.S.—HORNE & LYELL, W.S.—Agents.

No. 4.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

THE SCOTTISH INSURANCE COMMISSIONERS, Petitioners.—Sol.-Gen. Anderson—A. R. Brown.

REV. DAVID PAUL, LL.D. (Clerk to The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland) AND ANOTHER, Respondents.—Johnston, K.C.—Cowan.

Insurance — National Insurance — Employment — Contract of service — Church—Assistant ministers—Student missionaries—Lay missionaries—Master and servant—National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55), secs. 1 (1) and (2), and First Schedule, Part I. (a).

The National Insurance Act, 1911, enacts, Part I., section 1 (1) and (2), and First Schedule, Part I. (a), that persons employed within the meaning of the Act shall include all persons who are engaged in any "employment in the United Kingdom under any contract of service. . . ."

Held that,—in the Church of Scotland and in the United Free Church of Scotland,—(1) assistant ministers were not employed persons within the meaning of the Act, in respect that they were persons holding an ecclesiastical office, who performed the duties of that office subject to the laws of the Church and not subject to the control and direction of a master under a contract of service; (2) student missionaries were not employed persons, in respect that their services were rendered as an incident in the course of their studies and not as work done under a contract of service; (3) lay missionaries, who held no ecclesiastical status, and were appointed by, and subject to the control of, a minister or a kirk-session or a committee, were employed persons within the meaning of the Act.

1ST DIVISION. ON 30th January 1913 the Scottish Insurance Commissioners, established under the National Insurance Act, 1911, presented a petition, in accordance with the provisions of section 66 (1) (iii.) thereof, for the decision by the Court of a question which had arisen under the Act.

The petition, after quoting the sections of the Act affecting the question,* proceeded as follows:—"A question has arisen as to

[1] 12 R. 1230.

* The National Insurance Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 55), Part I., enacts:—

Sec. 1. "(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, all persons of the age of sixteen and upwards who are employed within the meaning of this Part of this Act shall be, and any such persons who are not so employed but who possess the qualifications hereinafter mentioned may be, insured in manner provided in this Part of this Act, and all persons so insured (in this Act called 'insured persons') shall be entitled in the manner and subject to the conditions provided in this Act to the benefits in respect of health insurance and prevention of sickness conferred by this Part of this Act.

"(2) The persons employed within the meaning of this Part of this Act whether the classes of employment of (a) assistants to ministers of the Church of Scotland, (b) assistants to ministers of the United Free Church of Scotland, (c) lay missionaries of the Church of Scotland, (d) student missionaries of the Church of Scotland, (e) lay missionaries of the United Free Church of Scotland, and (f) student missionaries of the United Free Church of Scotland, are employments within the meaning of Part I. of the Act."

On 9th July 1913 answers were lodged by the Reverend David Paul, LL.D., Clerk to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and the Reverend Archibald Henderson, D.D., Clerk to the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland. A joint minute for the parties was lodged on the same date, in which the material facts relative to the classes of employment referred to in the petition were stated as follows:—

"(a) Employment of Assistants to Ministers of the Church of Scotland.

"Assistants to ministers of the Church of Scotland must be licentiates or probationers—those terms being synonymous—of the Church, no one being eligible unless he has received a licence from a presbytery. This licence is granted by the presbytery within whose bounds a candidate for licence resides, and is conferred only after the presbytery is satisfied that the candidate has attended the prescribed course of study at a university and that he possesses qualifications suitable for the ministry, and also after he has answered the questions appointed by Acts of Assembly 1889, XVII., and 1911, VIII., and subscribed the formula prescribed by Act of Assembly, 1910, XIII. The said licence bears that the presbytery 'license the said to preach the Gospel of Christ and exercise his gifts as a probationer for the holy ministry.' After being licensed the licentiate, if he removes his residence from the bounds of the licensing presbytery, must report himself to the presbytery to which he has changed his residence and must produce to it his certificate of licence and a certificate of conduct, and that presbytery is required to supervise his conduct while within its bounds.

(in this Act referred to as 'employed contributors') shall include all persons of either sex, whether British subjects or not, who are engaged in any of the employments specified in Part I. of the First Schedule to this Act, not being employments specified in Part II. of that Schedule."

Part I. (a) of the First Schedule is in the following terms:—

"(a) Employment in the United Kingdom under any contract of service or apprenticeship, written or oral, whether expressed or implied, and whether the employed person is paid by the employer or some other person, and whether under one or more employers, and whether paid by time or by the piece or partly by time and partly by the piece, or otherwise, or, except in the case of a contract of apprenticeship, without any money payment."

Part II. of the First Schedule contains, inter alia, the following provision:—

"EXCEPTIONS.

"(g) Employment otherwise than by way of manual labour and at a rate of remuneration exceeding in value One hundred and sixty pounds a year, or in cases where such employment involves part-time service only, at a rate of remuneration which in the opinion of the Insurance Commissioners, is equivalent to a rate of remuneration exceeding One hundred and sixty pounds a year for whole-time service."

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

"By virtue of his licence a licentiate is authorised and entitled to discharge all the duties of an ordained minister except that he cannot dispense the sacraments or solemnise marriage and cannot act as a moderator or member of a church court. He holds a status recognised by the Church.

"Assistants to ministers of the Church of Scotland are appointed by the kirk-session, or occasionally by the minister of the parish. Their duties are to assist the minister in the work of the church and parish. That work includes the conduct of religious services, superintendence of the Sunday schools and teaching of Bible classes, visitation of the sick and the poor, and general parochial work. The assistant is not subject to ecclesiastical censure or discipline in any matter at the hands of the minister or kirk-session. As regards the matter and manner of his preaching and conduct of worship, the assistant is subject to the supervision of, and answerable to, the presbytery, and is not under the control of the minister of the charge except that the minister may exclude him from the pulpit, and that he may be dismissed or his engagement may be terminated either by the minister or the kirk-session according as he has been appointed by the one or the other. In other matters the assistant receives his orders or directions from the minister of the church who is entitled to control him in the exercise of his duties. The assistant is, however, subject, like the minister, to the jurisdiction of the presbytery, who are entitled also to control him in regard to the general manner in which he discharges the duties imposed upon him by the minister.

"By Act of Assembly, 1888, XIV., it is required that (in addition to the licentiate reporting himself to the presbytery within whose bounds he comes) the appointment of an assistant must be formally notified by the minister of the charge to the presbytery having jurisdiction over the charge, with a view to the assistant being recognised as such and accounted part of the church agencies within the presbytery. The termination of the assistantship must be similarly notified. If the assistant's licence were temporarily or permanently withdrawn by the presbytery, his appointment as assistant would necessarily be terminated.

"The licentiates who become assistants do so in preparation for the ministry and with the view in every case of becoming ordained ministers. Their appointment is of a temporary nature.

"There are no general regulations of the Church applicable to the appointment of assistants to ministers, the term and conditions of their appointment being settled in the general case by the kirk-session and sometimes by the minister. They are required to devote their whole time to the duties of their office. Their remuneration consists of a fixed salary; and this salary is usually paid out of the congregational funds of the church to which they are attached. In the case of all the assistants to ministers to whom this petition relates their rate of remuneration does not exceed in value £160 a year. . . .

"(b) Employment of Assistants to Ministers of the United Free Church of Scotland.

"Assistants to ministers of the United Free Church must be licentiates, no one being eligible unless he has received a licence from a presbytery. The effect of a licence in the United Free Church is the same quoad that Church as that of a licence in the Church of Scotland, and the operative terms of the licence granted by a presbytery of the United Free Church are as quoted in paragraph (a) supra.

Prior to the granting of a licence the presbytery must be satisfied that the candidate has gone through the required course of study at a university and at a Divinity hall, and also by trials and examinations that the candidate is a suitable person for receiving a licence; and the candidate is required to answer the questions prescribed by and sign the formula laid down in Act II. of the Assembly of the United Free Church of 1900. The clerk of the presbytery furnishes the licentiate with a copy of the licence, and must send the name and address of the licentiate to the clerk of the committee of the General Assembly on the Distribution of Probationers, or in the case of Gaelic-speaking licentiates, to the Committee of the General Assembly on the Highlands and Islands. The licentiate remains under the jurisdiction of the licensing presbytery, so far as regards his character and doctrine, so long as he is resident within its bounds, and on removing to another presbytery he is required to present to it an extract of his licence and a certificate of character from his former presbytery. He then becomes subject to the jurisdiction of the presbytery to which he has removed.

"The assistants are appointed by the minister or kirk-session of the charge. The duties of an assistant, and the terms on which he holds the appointment, are the same as in the case of an assistant in the Church of Scotland; but as regards the manner in which he discharges his clerical duties, he is under the direction and supervision of the minister alone. Their engagement can be terminated by the kirk-session, but in matters of discipline they are subject to the presbytery under whose jurisdiction they are. There is no definite period of engagement; but as a general rule a month's notice of termination of the employment may be given on either side. The appointment is usually made by a formal minute of the session. The appointment of an assistant in some cases is made for a definite period, with reservation of his liberty to preach in a vacancy and to accept a call to a charge if elected.

"There is no obligation on the minister, as in the case of the Church of Scotland, to notify the appointment of an assistant or the termination of the assistantship to the presbytery.

"Assistants to ministers are required to devote their whole time to the duties of their office. Their remuneration consists of a fixed salary. In the case of all assistants to ministers, to whom this petition relates, their remuneration does not exceed in value £160. Their remuneration is paid either by the congregation or by the minister, with, in some cases, grants in aid from the central funds of the Church.

"(c) Employment of Lay Missionaries of the Church of Scotland.

"Lay missionaries in the Church of Scotland are appointed by the minister or by the kirk-session of the parish. Their duties are to assist the minister in the work of the church and parish. Not being licentiates they have no authority to discharge the spiritual duties of the ministry. They cannot preach at the regular services in church, but they may conduct services in mission halls. Their work includes, besides this assistance, the superintendence of Sunday schools, the teaching of Bible classes, the visitation of the sick and poor, and general parochial work. They are not eligible for election as ministers of a parish.

"They receive their instructions from the minister of the parish, who is entitled to control them in the exercise of their duties, with reference to the time, place, and mode of performing these duties. Their appointments are not reported to the presbytery, as is the case with licentiates. They hold their appointments at the will of the minister or kirk-session. The usual arrangement is one month's notice. There are no general regulations of the Church applicable to the appointment of lay missionaries. Each kirk-session follows its own rules. Lay missionaries are required to devote their whole time to the duties of their office, and are paid a fixed salary ranging from £80 to £100 a year. The money to pay lay missionaries is found partly by the congregation and partly by a special fund of the Church raised for the purpose.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

"(d) Employment of Student Missionaries of the Church of Scotland.

"In several parishes student missionaries are employed between the months of May and September, that is, during the course of the University summer vacation. These men are appointed by the minister or kirk-session of the parish, and their duties are controlled in the same way as are those of lay missionaries. Their duties are very seldom so onerous that their whole time is required. The appointments are desired by the young men because opportunity is afforded for study and preparation for the next session's work, while experience is gained in the practical work of the ministry. The remuneration varies from 23s. to 40s. per week, and is equivalent to a rate of remuneration not exceeding £160 a year for whole-time service.

"(e) Employment of Lay Missionaries of the United Free Church of Scotland.

"The Highlands and Islands Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland employ about forty lay missionaries, including catechists, the great majority of whom are Gaelic-speaking. These missionaries are appointed by the Committee usually after a two years' preparatory course of training in the Bible Training Institute, Glasgow. Their duties are the same as are set forth in paragraph (c), supra. Their salaries are in every case under £160.

"(f) Employment of Student Missionaries of the United Free Church of Scotland.

"The Highlands and Islands Committee, by a joint arrangement with the minister and kirk-session of certain congregations, send students for short periods in the summer to assist in the work of the district. The remuneration paid them is of the nature of an honorarium, the appointment running from three to five months, the special object in view being that the students may obtain some experience in the conduct of public services, pastoral visitation, and generally in the practical work of the ministry. They maintain their regular studies during those months, so that their full time is not devoted to those duties. They are allowed from 20s. to 25s. per week, their remuneration being equivalent to a rate of remuneration not exceeding £160 a year for whole-time service. Students frequently make arrangements whereby the duties are divided between two of them, either by each taking several weeks in turn, or in some cases living together and sharing the work and the honorarium allowed."

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) on 15th October 1913.

Argued for the petitioners;—(1) The essentials of employment were power of appointment, power of dismissal, and power of control, and with regard to assistant ministers, all these powers were exercised by the kirk-session or the minister. Further, such assistant ministers had to give their whole time to their duties, and were paid, out of funds controlled by the kirk-session, fixed salaries of less than £160 a year. Accordingly, there was present in their case all the essentials of a contract of service that were necessary to make insurance obligatory for them. The distinction between a contract of service and a contract for services was in every case a question of fact, and the facts here entirely supported the view that the contract entered into by assistant ministers was a contract of service.[1] The decisions with regard to the contracts on which curates of the Church of England and ministers of the United Methodist Church were employed did not apply here, as, owing to the nature of the duties they performed and the tenure of their offices, their contracts differed entirely from the contracts now in question. (2) Lay missionaries should clearly be held to be employed under a contract of service, because they held no ecclesiastical office, were not professional men, and were employed subject to the control of the minister, and subject to a month's notice. (3) Student missionaries were in the same position as lay missionaries except that their period of employment was limited. While it lasted, however, their employment was under a contract of service.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) In the case of assistant ministers no powers of appointment, or of dismissal, or of control, could be exercised by a minister or a kirk-session independently of the licence of the presbytery. When the presbytery granted a licence the licentiate was not the servant of any particular minister, but was licensed to exercise his gifts professionally, and his employment was merely to give his services in accordance with that licence.[2] In so doing he was not acting under a contract of service,[3] but under an ecclesiastical commission to assist a minister in the discharge of his duties. The method in which he performed that charge was not under the control of the minister or kirk-session who appointed him, but under the control of the presbytery. (2) The only distinction in the case of lay missionaries was that they did not hold any ecclesiastical office. They had, however, a recognised status in which, like assistant ministers, they were not under a contract of service, but merely gave services. (3) Student missionaries also had a recognised status, and were in the same position as assistant ministers. They acted under no contract upon which they could sue for an honorarium, and further, their employment was only casual.

At advising on 18th October 1913,—

Lord Kinnear.—This petition raises a question between the Scottish

[1] In re National Insurance Act, 1911, Church of England Curates, [1912] 2 Ch. 563, Parker, J., at p. 568; Re Employment of Ministers of the United Methodist Church, (1912) 28 T. L. R. 539; Simmons v. Heath Laundry, [1910] 1 K. B. 543, Fletcher Moulton, L.J., at pp. 549-50; Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, 1913 S. C. 751, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 756 (and Hillyer v. Governors of St Bartholomew's Hospital, [1909] 2 K. B. 820, therein referred to); Yewens v. Noakes, (1880) 6 Q. B. D. 530.

[2] Simmons v. Heath Laundry Co., [1910] 1 K. B. 543, Buckley, L.J., at p. 553.

[3] In re National Insurance Act, 1911, Church of England Curates, [1912] 2 Ch. 563; Re Employment of Ministers of the United Methodist Church, 28 L. T. R. 539.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

Lord Kinnear.

Insurance Commissioners and the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church as to the position of certain classes of persons under the provisions of the Insurance Act. The petition is presented by the Insurance Commissioners, who must, of course, maintain that the persons whom they have specified in their application do fall within the provisions of the statute; but it has been explained to us that the position which the Commissioners desire to assume in this case is not by any means that of litigants pressing a claim against recalcitrant debtors, but is merely that of persons who, having a public duty to discharge, come to this Court for advice, as they are entitled to do under the provisions of the Act of Parliament. That being the professed intention of the Commissioners, I only add that I think the case they have raised was one which they were clearly entitled to raise, and that it was argued with great fairness and moderation on both sides. Although I think the question was quite a right one to raise, I cannot say that, as regards the most important of the three classes to which it relates, I myself have seen any sufficient reason to suppose that they are within the Act.

The statement is that a question has arisen as to the employment of assistant ministers of the Church of Scotland and of the United Free Church of Scotland, of lay missionaries of these two Churches, and of student missionaries of these two Churches—the question whether the employments of these ecclesiastical persons respectively are or are not within the Insurance Act.

I begin by saying that I see no difference in relation to this question between the position of the Established Church and that of the United Free Church. The status of the classes of persons in question seems to me to depend upon the same considerations in both Churches, and I do not think that from either side of the bar it was suggested that any sound distinction could be taken between them.

The question, therefore, is,—to begin with the first of the three classes of persons,—whether assistants to ministers of these two Churches are within the Act or not; and that depends upon whether they satisfy the conditions of Part I. of the First Schedule to the Act, by which it is provided that employment in the United Kingdom, under any contract of service or apprenticeship, whether the employed person is paid by the employer or someone else, and whether under one or more employers, shall be one of the cases included in the operative part of the Act, which refers to all persons who are to be brought within its operations as persons who are engaged in any of the employments specified in the Schedule, and in particular in the part of the Schedule I have read.

Now that raises the question whether assistants to ministers of these two Churches are employed under a contract of service or not. That, I think, must be determined with reference to the ordinary and popular use of the term "servant." As that word is used in the ordinary affairs of life it means the kind of relationship which subsists between a master and a domestic servant. It is certainly not to be read in the metaphorical sense in which it may be said that public officers and Ministers of State are servants of the Crown or servants of the country. Now, what constitutes a contract of service, if the word is used in the ordinary and popular sense, is a question which has been frequently discussed in the Courts both of this country and of England, and I apprehend that the general rule is quite clearly established. It has been chiefly discussed in cases where it was indispensable to determine whether particular persons were servants of those by whom they were employed or not, in order to decide whether an employer was liable for the acts or defaults of a person in his employment or not; and the general rule is stated very clearly by a distinguished writer, Sir Frederick Pollock, when he says [1]:—"The relation of master and servant exists only between persons of whom one has the order and control of the work done by the other." In the series of cases to which the learned author refers in support of that definition I think it will be found that the true force and meaning of the words "order and control of the work" is just what is said by Bramwell, L.J., in one of the cases (Yewens v. Noakes [2]):—"A servant is a person subject to the command of his master as to the manner in which he shall do his work." In a contract by which one undertakes to produce a given result, but so that in the actual execution of the work he is not under the direction of the person for whom it is done, but may use his own discretion in things which are not specifically fixed by the contract itself, the relation of master and servant does not exist. The employer, in cases of that kind, is not liable for the acts and defaults of the person employed, just because, although he may take benefit from the work and pay for it, he is not in the position of an employer of a servant, entitled to interfere in the direction and control of his work.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

Lord Kinnear.

If that is the meaning of a contract of service, we have to see whether there is any such contract between the assistant ministers in question and the kirk-session or anybody else, and I confess to thinking very clearly that there is not. I think the position of an assistant minister in these Churches is not that of a person who undertakes work defined by contract but of a person who holds an ecclesiastical office, and who performs the duties of that office subject to the laws of the Church to which he belongs and not subject to the control and direction of any particular master. We are told that these gentlemen are probationers, and we know that a probationer, in the ordinary sense of the word, is a person so placed that he may give proof of his qualifications for a certain status or place. The probationers who are appointed to the position of assistant ministers are students of divinity who have obtained a licence to preach from the presbytery, and that is a licence which is only given to them on the production of certificates from professors of theology in the universities of their good morals and qualifications, and upon their showing that they have gone through a certain course of theological study, and thereafter upon their passing certain trials to the satisfaction of the presbytery. When these things are done, then the presbytery issues its licence. Now, we are told in this case what the terms of the licence are. The licence bears that the presbytery licenses the person named to preach the Gospel of Christ and to exercise his gifts as a probationer for the holy ministry. When a person so licensed is appointed to be assistant to a minister, I think that his authority to perform the duties that belong to that office does not arise from any contract between himself and the minister, or himself and the kirk-session or anybody else, but arises from the licence given to him by the presbytery to exercise his gifts. He is, therefore, in my opinion a person who is in no sense performing duties fixed and defined by a contract of service.

[1] The Law of Torts, 8th ed., p. 79. [2] 6 Q. B. D. 530, at p. 532.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

Lord Kinnear.

I should have come to that conclusion, I confess, without much hesitation apart altogether from authority. But it is very satisfactory to find that a question which, if not exactly the same as the present, is at all events substantially the same, has been decided in the Chancery Division of the Court in England by a very eminent Judge. I refer to the case of the Church of England curates—In re National Insurance Act.[1] The question that was raised there was whether curates of the Church of England were or were not within the terms of the Act as being persons employed in the sense of the statute. The learned Judge, who was Mr Justice Parker (now Lord Parker), says[2]:—"It appears quite clear on the construction of the Act that, in order to make insurance obligatory under Part I., there must be something in the nature of a contract of service, and in the particular case before me, unless I can say that there exists between a curate and someone else some contract which can properly be called a contract of service, the curate can in no sense be a person on whom insurance is obligatory, though he may possibly come in as a voluntary contributor. I have come to the conclusion that the position of a curate is the position of a person who holds an ecclesiastical office, and not the position of a person whose duties and rights are defined by contract at all." And then he goes on to say that there is no pretence in reality, in his opinion, for arguing that the relation between a curate and his vicar, or between a curate and the bishop, is the relation of employer and servant. I do not think it necessary to read or follow out the argument in all its details upon that particular question. Although the relation between an assistant minister and the parish minister more or less resembles that between a vicar and his curate, there are many points of detail in which they differ. But I think that in substance the reasoning of the learned Judge in that case applies directly to the case we have to consider. And so far as these gentlemen are concerned, therefore, I have come to the opinion that they are not within the obligatory provisions of the statute.

I only add that I think the learned counsel who maintained the contrary had some difficulty in explaining exactly who was to be held to be the employer if assistant ministers were servants employed in terms of the Act at all. Whether it was the minister or whether it was the kirk-session, I think, seemed to him to be a question of considerable difficulty; but ultimately, as I understood the argument, the position assumed was that the kirk-session was the master and the assistant minister the employee. I think that position is completely excluded by the statement of facts contained in the admissions before us, from which I infer that the kirk-session has no power at all to control or direct the assistant minister either in his preaching of the Gospel or in his visitation of the sick and poor or in his general parochial work. These are duties which he has undertaken in accepting the charge, and his authority for performing them is that of a licentiate of the Church, derived from the presbytery and not derived from a contract either with the kirk-session or with the minister. It is manifest that the kirk-session can have no pretention to control a minister in the exercise of his religious office, and if he is, in some sense, subject to the control or superintendence of the minister of the parish, it is by reason of the duty which a junior owes to a superior clergyman, and not by force of the contractual obligations of a servant to a master.

[1] [1912] 2 Ch. 563. [2] Ibid, at p. 568.

The other classes of persons with regard to whom the question has arisen are in a somewhat different position, and I think it may be convenient to deal with the third class first, because that resembles the first more nearly than the second. The third class is described as being that of student missionaries who are employed between the months of May and September—that is, of course, during the university summer vacation. The appointments are desired by young men who are studying for the Church, because they get opportunity for study and preparation, and also for gaining experience in the practical work of the ministry. It is said in the statement with reference to the United Free Church student missionaries that the special object in view is that students may obtain experience in the conduct of public service, pastoral visitation, and, generally, in the practical work of the ministry. They maintain their regular studies during the months in which they are acting as student missionaries, and must return to the ordinary course of theological study when the university opens again, which they can do under the supervision of the presbytery. Now, I think there is a distinction between students and persons who are licensed to preach. There is a very obvious ecclesiastical distinction, but I do not think it is enough to differentiate the one class from the other with reference to this particular question. As I understand the statement, the student missionaries are really engaged in this work as work incidental to their studies and probation for the office of the ministry, and I think they are no more subjects of a contract of service between them and any other person than the assistant ministers are.

The remaining class is that of lay missionaries, and I have come to a different conclusion so far as regards these persons. Lay missionaries, we are told, are appointed by the minister or by the kirk-session. Not being licentiates, they have no authority to discharge the spiritual duties of the ministry. Their work includes assistance in regular services or in services in mission halls, the superintendence of Sunday schools, the teaching of Bible classes, and general parochial work. It is added that they receive their instructions from the minister, who is entitled to control them in the exercise of their duties with reference to the time, place, and mode of performing these duties. Their appointments do not come before the presbytery as those of licentiates must do, and they hold their appointments at the will either of the minister or the kirk-session. Now, that appears to me to describe not the status of an ecclesiastical person but the position of a person who, under a contract, undertakes to do certain work for remuneration, and who is under the control and direction of the person by whom he is employed. It appears to me, therefore, that these gentlemen do fall within the definition of the statute. Whether in any particular case they are to be held as in the employment of the minister or in the employment of the kirk-session is a question which we, I think, are not in a position to answer. If they are employed under contract, then every contract must depend upon its own terms; but whether the kirk-session or the minister is to be regarded as employer, I think there is enough before us to show that there is a contract of employment, and that is sufficient for the disposal of the only question which it is possible for this Court to determine. The application of the general doctrine to particular cases will remain for the consideration of the Insurance Commissioners.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

Lord Kinnear.

LORD JOHNSTON,—The question submitted to the Court by the Scottish Insurance Commissioners is whether the employment as (a) assistant minister, (b) lay missionary, and (c) student missionary in the Established and United Free Churches of Scotland respectively is employment in the sense of Part I. of the National Insurance Act.

There are distinctions between those classes, but none between the Churches. I take therefore the case of the assistant ministers first. The statute (First Schedule, I. (a)) says merely that the employment must be under a contract of service. A contract of service assumes an employer and a servant. It assumes the power of appointment and dismissal in the employer, the right of control over the servant in the employer, and the duty or obligation of service to the employer in the servant. I state it thus generally, because the fact that the employer's powers of appointment and dismissal and his right of control may be exercised by delegation does not affect the question.

So regarding the contract of service, the employment of an assistant minister does not appear to me to fall under the category of employment under such contract in the sense of the Act. In the first place, the assistant must be a probationer for the ministry, and a probationer for the ministry must be a licentiate. Shortly, a probationer is a candidate for the ministry, licensed to preach and exercise his gifts but not yet ordained to a charge. He receives his licence from the presbytery. So far back as 1694 the General Assembly enacted "That when such persons are first licensed to be probationers, they shall oblige themselves to preach only within the bounds, or by the directions of that presbytery which did licence them." Subject to provision for transfer from presbytery to presbytery, this still holds, and to the jurisdiction of the presbytery of the bounds the probationer is subject as much as the minister, and therefore the presbytery have general control over him in the discharge of his duties and may withdraw his licence. If his licence is withdrawn by the presbytery, his appointment as assistant necessarily falls. Accordingly, it is admitted that "he holds a status recognised by the Church." Allowing for the difference between the ecclesiastical system of the Established Church of England and that of both branches of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, there is very substantial similarity between the assistant minister in Scotland and the curate in England, and the judgment of Parker, J., in In re Employment of Church of England Curates[1] appears to apply, mutatis mutandis, to the case under consideration. In the case of the assistant minister there is no one who occupies the position of employer in the sense of a contract of service. The presbytery does not appoint; even though its licence is necessary, it is a general licence and not a licence ad hoc. The kirk-session generally appoints; sometimes the minister. The kirk-session has no control over the discharge of duties. That control is divided between the presbytery and the minister. The power of terminating the appointment is with the minister or kirk-session according as the appointment has been made by the minister or kirk-session, yet the appointment may be terminated by the act of the presbytery in withdrawing the licence. In fact, the contract in which the assistant minister is engaged is, as in the Royal Infirmary case,[2] more a contract for services than a contract of service. Accordingly, I agree with your Lordship that assistant ministers are not employed persons in the sense of Part I. of the Act.

The lay missionaries are in a different position. They enjoy no ecclesiastical status. They are not licentiates, and have no relation to the presbytery. They are entirely under the control of the minister of the parish, and accordingly they must, I think, be held to be employed persons in the sense of the Act.

The student missionaries, on the other hand, who merely receive vacation appointments, cannot properly be said to be employed at all. They are appointed, in the course of their university career, for their own benefit rather than for that of the parish, that they may have some practical experience of parish work as part of their education. They are, as it were, given the opportunity of seeing what I may call clinical parochial work. And their position is therefore clearly distinguished from that of the lay missionaries, whose employment is regular and permanent and a means of livelihood. They are therefore not employed persons in the sense of Part I. of the Act.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons which have been already explained. As regards the assistants, I think insurance is not obligatory because they are under no contract of service. The joint minute which has been adjusted by the parties defines, so far as possible, the relation of the assistant to the minister and kirk-session. I think that the fact that the definition is left in very general terms shows how much liberty there must necessarily be to the assistant in the execution of his duties. To a certain extent there may be control as regards the objects of the work; but, as it appears to me, there is no definite control as regards the method in which the work is to be done. The case of the assistant is really the case of one who is discharging the duties of an office, and whatever authority is exercised over him is in virtue of an ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and is not in virtue of rights which arise out of a contract of service. That, I think, is sufficient to show that the case of the assistants is outside the scope of the Act.

---

[1] [1912] 2 Ch. 563.

[2] 1913 S. C. 751.

Oct. 18, 1913.

Scottish Insurance Commissioners v. Church of Scotland.

Lord Mackenzie.

As regards the student missionaries, there, I think, the contract may be described as one for services. The students take up this work for the purpose of better fitting them, when their education is completed, for discharging the duties appertaining to an office in the Church.

As regards lay missionaries, I agree that their position is different, but I desire distinctly for myself to say that my opinion in regard to lay missionaries is confined to those to whom the adjusted statement of facts is applicable, because it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that there may be lay missionaries to whom these statements are not applicable, and who, therefore, would not come within the scope of the Act.

LORD KINNEAR.—I should like to add that I quite agree with what Lord Mackenzie has last said; but I conceive that our answer, which may be framed simply in terms of the concluding question, must necessarily, in all cases, be applicable to the persons who are described in the minute of admissions. What we answer is that the classes of employment specified under the letters (a) (b) (d) and (f) are not employments within the meaning of the Act, but that the classes of employment described under the letters (c) and (e) are within the Act.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor deciding that the employment of assistants to ministers, and of student missionaries, in the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church of Scotland (designated in the petition by the letters (a) (b) (d) and (f)), was not employment within the meaning of Part I. of the National Insurance Act, 1911, and that the employment of lay missionaries in these Churches (designated in the petition by the letters (c) and (e)) was employment within the meaning of Part I. of the Act.

JAMES WATT, W.S.—MENZIES & THOMSON, W.S.—JOHN COWAN, W.S.—Agents.

No. 5.

Oct. 21, 1913.

Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited.

JAMES DEMPSEY, Appellant.—Chisholm, K.C.—A. A. Fraser.
CALDWELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, Respondents.—Wilton.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (1) (b) and (16)—Incapacity—Cessation of incapacity—Possibility of supervening incapacity—Suspensory order—Competency.

A workman, who had suffered injuries which necessitated the amputation of portions of three fingers of the right hand, after recovering from the operation obtained work at higher wages in the district where he had been employed, and where, owing to the construction of public works, there was a large demand for labour. In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator, while finding that the workman's injuries were permanent, found also that he was no longer incapacitated owing to the accident from earning his former wages, and ended the compensation that was being paid to him.

In an appeal at the instance of the workman the Court hoc statu remitted the case to the arbitrator to consider and decide whether the ending of the payment of compensation should be permanent or temporary.

Opinion (per the Lord President, dub. Lord Johnston) that a suspensory order was the proper judgment for the arbitrator to pronounce, looking to the possible adverse effect of a change in the condition of the labour market on the future wage-earning capacity of a permanently damaged workman.

Rosie v. Mackay, 1910 S. C. 714, and Taylor v. London and North-Western Railway Company, [1912] A. C. 242, considered, and the former case held overruled by the latter.

Oct. 21, 1913.

Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited.

1st Division. Sheriff of Fife and Kinross.

In an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, for warrant to record a memorandum of agreement with reference to compensation payable to James Dempsey by Caldwell & Company, Limited, papermakers, Inverkeithing, the Sheriff-substitute (Umpherston) refused the application and ended the compensation, and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"This is an arbitration in which the claimant, who is eighteen years of age, claimed compensation from the respondents for injuries sustained by him while in their employment on 21st August 1912.

"The claimant's right hand was severely crushed and burned between the hot steel rollers of a papermaking machine. Parts of the third and fourth fingers and the end of the second finger were amputated. The injuries are permanent.

"The claimant's average weekly earnings prior to the accident were 14s. per week.

"The claimant was paid 14s. per week by the respondents from the date of the accident to 23rd November 1912. On 14th December the claimant was offered light work which he was willing to try, but did not in fact try, on account of a dispute about signing receipts for compensation, the claimant thinking that the respondents wanted him to sign off, while the respondents say they only wanted him to sign receipts for the money he had received up to 23rd November, the claimant not having given any receipts for such money.

"On 24th December 1912 the claimant applied for a warrant to record a memorandum of agreement, under which it was alleged the respondents agreed to pay him 14s. a week during incapacity. On 4th April 1913 a minute of objections was lodged by the respondents in which they disputed the genuineness of said agreement, but admitted liability for the accident to claimant which happened on 21st August 1912. They narrated the said offer of work and claimant's earnings since 14th January 1913, and asked me to terminate the claimant's right to compensation as at 23rd November 1912, or at such other date as I might determine.

"After evidence was led the respondents' agent, without prejudice to his contention that claimant's right to compensation ceased on 23rd November 1912, consented to an award of compensation at the rate of 10s. per week from 23rd November 1912 to 14th January 1913.

"On 14th January 1913 the claimant obtained employment with the contractors for Rosyth Naval Base as a drill carrier, being paid at the rate of 4d. per hour. Between said date and 28th January 1913 he earned the sum of £1, 4s. 10d. On three days he did not work full time, and on four days he did not work at all, but his absence from work was not due to his injuries or to any stoppage of the works.

"From 5th February 1913 to 20th March 1913 the claimant was employed by Messrs William Arrol & Company, North Queensferry. His earnings for this period amounted to £6.

"On 23rd March the claimant was employed by the Rosyth Naval

Oct. 21, 1913.

Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited.

Base contractors. His work was to stand on the top of a monolith and give the signal to a crane driver when to raise and lower the crane. About midnight on 29th April 1913 the claimant was injured in the employment of Messrs Easton, Gibb, & Son, and for the injuries he thus sustained claimant received compensation at the rate of 13s. per week, being half his average weekly wages since 23rd March.

"Claimant has since been employed at similar work at the rate of 4s. 2d. per day.

"Owing to the construction of the Naval Base and the Dunfermline main sewer, and other works, there is at present a large demand for labour, including boy labour, in the district. The demand for labour in Inverkeithing and district is likely to remain good for many years.

"In these circumstances I found (1) that at said 14th January 1913 the claimant was no longer incapacitated owing to the accident from earning his former wages, and that incapacity from said cause has not recurred. (2) That claimant is no longer incapacitated from said cause from earning his former wages. (3) That the claimant has failed to prove an agreement to pay compensation in the terms contained in his application. I therefore refused the application to record the memorandum of agreement, but found the respondents liable to the claimant in compensation at the rate of 10s. per week from 23rd November 1912 to 14th January 1913, and I ended his right to compensation at 14th January 1913."

The question of law on which the claimant desired the decision of the Court was:—"Was I entitled, in the circumstances above stated, to end the claimant's right to compensation?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 18th and 21st October 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—Owing to the physical defect in his right hand, which had resulted from his accident, the appellant's capacity for manual labour could not be regarded as unaffected, and it was a question of law how far his wage-earning capacity should be determined by the extent to which he had been able to get work. The arbitrator apparently considered that the fact that he had obtained employment at higher wages than before the accident was proof per se that he was physically fit, and that his capacity was unimpaired, but he had omitted to notice that wage-earning capacity must be judged of not merely by the physical condition of the workman, but also by the state of the labour market at the time. He had not considered the possibility of the man being unable to find employment when the extra demand for labour in the district had come to an end, and he had not realised that he was not, in making his award, restricted to continuing or ending the compensation, but that it was open to him to pronounce a suspensory order. The case, accordingly, should be sent back to him for consideration of these questions, because the mere fact that the appellant had been able to earn temporarily, and in a hazardous occupation, more than he was earning before his accident did not necessarily exclude all claim for compensation for permanent incapacity, though it might for a time warrant a suspension of payment thereof.[1] The arbitrator should accordingly be directed to pronounce an order having such temporary effect. In any event the payment should not have been ended till 4th April 1913, the date of the respondents' application for review.

[1] Freeland v. Macfarlane, Lang, & Co., (1900) 2 F. 832; Taylor v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1912] A. C. 242; Weir v. North British Railway Co., 1912 S. C. 1073.

Argued for the respondents;—There being no recorded memorandum of agreement, payment of compensation had been competently terminated at a date fixed, in his discretion, by the arbitrator.[1] No motion had been made before the arbitrator for a suspensory order, but from the facts stated it was clear that he had had in view all considerations affecting the question of present and future earning capacity. If in the view of the Court the case left that point in doubt, the respondents did not seek to oppose its being sent back to the arbitrator with directions to pronounce a suspensory order. The case of Freland v. Macfarlane, Lang, & Company[2] should be regarded as overruled, having been decided prior to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The question of the appellant's earning capacity was one of fact only, upon which the arbitrator was final,[3] and it could not be determined upon considerations of prejudice so remote as those apprehended by the appellant.[4]

Lord President.—The only question which we are asked here to consider and decide is whether or no the arbitrator in a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act ought or ought not to have pronounced a finding by which he permanently terminated the payment of compensation to a workman for injuries sustained by him in the course of his employment. There were two subsidiary questions mentioned to us by Mr Chisholm for the appellant, but, quite properly, not pressed upon our attention.

It is conceded that, if the finding of the arbitrator stands, then it will be impossible in the future for the workman to revive his claim, even although a material change of circumstances takes place.

The circumstances of the case are these:—The accident which befel the workman occurred on the 21st August 1912. His right hand was severely injured; parts of three of his fingers had to be amputated, and the finding of the arbitrator is that the injuries are permanent. He is a labouring man, therefore, with a permanently maimed right hand. The employers admitted liability to pay compensation, and did pay compensation at the full rate down to 23rd November 1912, and they consented to make a payment at a reduced rate down to 14th January 1913, but they maintained that the workman's incapacity for work had ceased at 23rd November 1912, and craved the arbitrator to make a finding permanently terminating his right to compensation. The arbitrator having considered the claim thus urged, found that at 14th January 1913 "the claimant was no longer incapacitated owing to the accident from earning his former wages, and that incapacity from said cause has not recurred. That claimant is no longer incapacitated from said cause from earning his former

[1] Nelson v. Summerlee Iron Co., Limited, 1910 S. C. 360; Southhook Fireclay Co., Limited, v. Laughland, 1908 S. C. 831; Malcolm v. Bowhill Coal Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 426.

[2] 2 F. 832.

[3] Anderson v. Darngavil Coal Co., 1910 S. C. 456; Cunningham v. M'Naughton & Sinclair, 1910 S. C. 980.

[4] Taylor v. London and North-Western Railway Co., [1912] A. C. 242; Ball v. William Hunt & Sons, Limited, [1912] A. C. 496.

Oct. 21, 1913.

Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

wages." And accordingly he says,—"I ended his right to compensation at 14th January 1913."

Now it is certain that, during the months of February and March 1913 and I think subsequently, the appellant was able to engage in employment for which he was quite fit, and to earn a substantial wage, a wage, indeed, which I observe was greater than the wage he was earning prior to the date of the accident. That, it is explained by the arbitrator, was due to the fact that there is a large demand for labour of the kind for which he was fit in the district where he lived and worked, and the arbitrator adds—not a finding in fact, but an expression of anticipation—that these good times will continue for many years.

In these circumstances it is conceded that the arbitrator did right to terminate the payment of compensation; but it is urged that, although payment of compensation was quite properly discontinued, the arbitrator ought not to have gone on to find, as he did, that the right to compensation ended at 14th January 1913; that he ought not, in short, to have closed the door against the workman's application for a reconsideration of his case and a reviving of his claim in the event of a change of circumstances taking place. He was then a damaged man, permanently injured in his right hand, and would, of course, be compelled to seek for employment in a narrower and more circumscribed area than was formerly open to him, and inside that circumscribed area he would be handicapped, more or less severely, by competitors for similar work who were absolutely sound in wind and limb. Naturally employers prefer, unless the demand for labour is great and the supply limited, to employ men who are physically intact rather than men who are physically damaged. And in judging of wage-earning capacity—that is really the inquiry to be prosecuted—in judging of wage-earning capacity or incapacity, physical fitness to work is not of itself decisive, nor are the conditions of the labour market to be taken in isolation. Both must be had in view in judging of the wage-earning capacity of the workman.

In saying so I am announcing no novel doctrine for, after some judicial fluctuation both in opinion and in decision, it was finally decided in the House of Lords in two cases—one of them, I think, referred to in the debate: Duris v. Wilsons & Clyde Coal Company, Limited,[1] and Ball v. Hunt & Sons,[2] that wage-earning capacity must be judged of not merely by the physical condition of the man but also by the condition of the labour market at the time. In short, when the labour market is buoyant, the injured man may be able to find full employment at full wages; but, on the other hand, when the labour market becomes stagnant, the injured man, in consequence of the injuries sustained in the course of his employment, might find his labour absolutely unsaleable or saleable only at a reduced figure; and accordingly these two elements must be taken into consideration.

When I turn to the stated case here, I cannot find any indication that the arbitrator considered the possibility of there being a change of circumstances, or considered the possibility of this damaged man being, under different economic conditions, either unable to earn his living at all or else compelled to accept a diminished wage for his work. Nor can I find any indication in the stated case that the arbitrator considered and had present to his mind any other than the two courses which he indicates were open to him—either to continue the payment or else to terminate absolutely, as he did, the workman's right to compensation.

---

[1] 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 74.

[2] [1912] A. C. 496, and footnote 1912 S. C. (H. L.), at p. 77.

Now, in my opinion, there is a via media, and that via media is very clearly indicated in the opinion delivered by Lord Low in the seven Judges case of Rosie v. Mackay,[1] where his Lordship said that, in order to leave questions such as this open in the event of a change of circumstances taking place, it is a competent course to sist procedure or to continue the case with leave to either party to renew the application in the event of a change of circumstances occurring, with, of course, a finding that the injury had taken place, but that weekly payments must, in the meantime, be discontinued. With that opinion Lord Skerrington agreed. It may be said—and it is true—that Lord Low and Lord Skerrington were in a minority in that case; but there was, subsequently, a decision pronounced in the House of Lords in Taylor v. London and North Western Railway Company[2]—to which we were referred in the debate—in which all the noble and learned Lords who took part in the judgment clearly indicated that a suspensory order—such as Lord Low and Lord Skerrington suggested in Rosie v. Mackay[1]—was a proper course of procedure to adopt in circumstances such as the present.

It has been said that the case of Rosie v. Mackay[1] was not cited to their Lordships in the House of Lords in Taylor v. London and North Western Railway Company,[2] and that we are not entitled to assume that they deliberately overruled that case, and that the law may still be regarded as in doubt. I cannot think so. It may be, and no doubt is the fact, that Rosie v. Mackay[1] was not cited in the House of Lords; but I cannot read their Lordships' judgments otherwise than as coming in direct conflict with the opinions of the majority in the case of Rosie v. Mackay[1]; and, wittingly or unwittingly, I think their Lordships adopted the reasoning of Lord Low and Lord Skerrington in that case. When I examine Lord Low's opinion, I find, I must say, no ground upon which it can be assailed. It would, indeed, be a sorry thing if our forms of process were not adequate to enable us to continue consideration of a case where a change of circumstances might occur which might alter the whole situation. The penny-a-week device (or subterfuge as my brother Lord Johnston has not inaptly called it) has been resorted to in England; it may also have been resorted to in Scotland. But, in my opinion, that device was not only unnecessary, but was erroneous. If no compensation ought to be paid, then no order for a payment should be made however small that payment may be, and if there are forms of process which enable us to suspend judgment until it is seen whether a change of circumstances takes place or no, then I think that is the proper course to follow.

The course which I suggest to your Lordships that we should take in [1] 1910 S. C. 714. [2] [1912] A. C. 242.

Oct. 21, 1913.

Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited.

Ld. President

this case is substantially the same as was taken by the Second Division in the case of Weir v. North British Railway Company.[1] I propose to your Lordships that we should remit to the learned arbitrator to reconsider his opinion, having in view the fact, as he himself has found, that permanent injury has been suffered by this man in consequence of the accident which befell him, and to consider whether or no, in view of that finding, he should pronounce a suspensory order, as I have called it, or, if he thinks proper, repeat the finding which he has already given.

Speaking for myself, and for myself alone, I cannot doubt, in the first place, that a suspensory order is a competent form of process, and that, in the next place, it is the proper judgment to pronounce in this case where no one can, at the present moment, foretell what the condition of the labour market may be in the near future. If the learned arbitrator's anticipations are fulfilled, no doubt some time may elapse before reconsideration of his judgment would be called for. But, on the other hand, stagnation may come, and will come, sooner or later. When that period arrives, then, it seems to me, it is not open to doubt that a labouring man with a permanently damaged right hand will find himself confronted with this situation—either he will be unable, in competition with sound men, to obtain employment, or else he will be compelled to accept employment at a reduced rate of remuneration.

It is only right that I should add that counsel for the respondents in this case, very frankly and very properly, announced to us his willingness that the course which I now propose to your Lordships should be adopted.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I have had much greater difficulty than, I think, your Lordships have had in disposing of this case, and I regret that I cannot, as at present advised, accept without a certain hesitation the views which have been expressed by your Lordship in the chair as to the effect, in a case of this sort, of changes occurring in the labour market at a period distant I do not know how far.

There has certainly, up to this point, been a difference of practice in workmen's compensation cases, where there is recovery but the permanency of recovery is disputed, between the Courts of England and Scotland. That is now, I fully admit, brought to an end by the dicta of their Lordships in the House of Lords in the case of Taylor.[2] But we are placed in this unfortunate position, that the practice, as it arose and exists in England, has never been explained with any detailed reasons as to how it was adopted, and within what limits it applies. On the other hand, in the case of Clelland,[3] a very reasoned opinion was given by Lord President Dunedin, founding the practice which has, since that date, ruled in Scotland. That opinion was repeated in the case of Rosie,[4] and adopted by the majority of the Court; for I am bound to say that—although in my opinion the case should not have been sent to seven Judges, because I

[1] 1912 S. C. 1073.
[2] [1912] A. C. 242.
[3] 7 F. 975.
[4] 1910 S. C. 714.

did not think it raised the question which it was supposed to raise—I did not in any way dissent from the views expressed by Lord Dunedin.

In the case of Taylor,[1] again, we get no explanation of the reasons for subverting our practice, and, as I conceive, some explanation of the reasons is required in order that we may understand, not merely that we must adopt a different practice, but the limit and scope of the practice which we must now adopt. We must now accept that it is competent to suspend the payment of compensation, and not merely either to continue, to vary, or to end it. But it is evident that discrimination in application is required, and did we know the reasons against our practice, as we know the reasons for it, we would the better know how to make that discrimination. I accept therefore that, while it is open to the Sheriff-substitute here to end the compensation, it is also open to him to suspend it. Reading his statement of the case, I should have been inclined to gather that he had, with full intention, ended it; but I agree with your Lordship that it is desirable that there should be no dubiety about the Sheriff-substitute's meaning, and therefore that such a remit should be made as your Lordship proposes.

But I desire, at the same time, to reserve entirely my opinion as to the effect which will have to be given to the dicta of their Lordships in Taylor's case,[1] and they must now have the effect of more than mere dicta, having regard to the statement made by the late Lord Chancellor in the course of the argument in the case of Hargreaves.[2]

Where I have difficulty in following your Lordship is that I am by no means clear that, given a case such as we have here,—a case where the injury is a definite injury which has developed a permanent result, and which has no ulterior potentialities about it, as many injuries have, possibilities of recrudescence, possibilities of subsequent effects which do not at present appear; where it is a definite injury which has run its course and done its worst, and where, notwithstanding, the injured man is in the position of earning as good wages as he has earned before,—we are to suspend his claim in order that he may have the opportunity to come back upon his employer at some future time, not because he is again suffering actively from the consequences of his injury, but because, from economic circumstances, there may not be so much work as there is just now, and therefore not so much opportunity for a man who has once been injured getting work. It seems to me that the result of your Lordship's view will be that in every case in which a man has received an injury of the permanent class to which I have referred, you must suspend, and cannot possibly end, his compensation, whatever his present wage-earning capacity may be. Now, I do not think that that was the intention of the statute at all; and, in consequence, I desire to dissociate myself, as at present advised—for we have not had the matter fully argued yet—from the views which your Lordship has expressed. Had there not been room for discrimination I do not think that Hargreaves's case[3] could have resulted as it did. I do not desire to add more at present, because I feel satisfied

[1] [1912] A. C. 242. [2] 1912 S. C. (H. L.), at p. 72.
[3] 1912 S. C. (H. L.) 70.

Oct. 21, 1913.

Dempsey v. Caldwell & Co., Limited.

that subsequently the question will have to be further argued, either in this or in some other case.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In view of the findings of fact in this case, and of the judgment in the House of Lords in the case of Taylor v. London and North Western Railway Company,[1] I am of opinion that the case should be remitted back to the Sheriff-substitute in the terms proposed.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Hoc statu recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator appealed against, and remit to him in view of the finding that the claimant had sustained permanent injuries to his right hand to consider and decide whether the ending of the payment of compensation should be permanent or temporary."

STERLING CRAIG, S.S.C.—DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—Agents.

No. 6.

Oct. 24, 1913.

DENIS SCULLION, Pursuer (Appellant).—Munro, K.C.—Fenton.
CADZOW COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Horne K.C.—Strain.

Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 8 (1) (2), and Third Schedule—Industrial disease—Process of "mining"—Surface labour.

Held that a man employed at the pithead of a colliery as a surface labourer was not employed in the process of "mining" in the sense in which that expression is used in relation to industrial diseases in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* between Denis Scullion and the Cadzow Coal Company, Limited, the

[1] [1912] A. C. 242.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts:—Sec. 8. "(1) Where (i) the certifying surgeon appointed under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, for the district in which a workman is employed, certifies that the workman is suffering from a disease mentioned in the Third Schedule to this Act, and is thereby disabled from earning full wages at the work at which he was employed . . . and the disease is due to the nature of any employment in which the workman was employed at any time within the twelve months previous to the date of the disablement, . . . he or his dependants shall be entitled to compensation under this Act as if the disease . . . were a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of that employment . . .

"(2) If the workman at or immediately before the date of the disablement . . . was employed in any process mentioned in the second column of the Third Schedule to this Act, and the disease contracted is the disease in the first column of that schedule set opposite the description of the process, the disease, except where the certifying surgeon certifies that in his opinion the disease was not due to the nature of the employment, shall be deemed to have been due to the nature of that employment, unless the employer proves the contrary."

By Order in Council, dated 22nd May 1907, the lists of processes and diseases contained in the Third Schedule to the Act was extended to include, inter alia:—

Description of Disease or Injury.	Description of Process.
Nystagmus.	Mining.

Oct. 24, 1913.

Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.

Sheriff-substitute at Hamilton (Shennan) refused to award compensation, and, at the request of the workman, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth :—

"(1) The appellant worked as a miner in the respondents' employment at Cadzow Colliery, Hamilton, from October 1911 to 1st May 1912, when his right eye was injured by a spark from a pick and he became totally incapacitated for work. The respondents paid the appellant compensation down to 4th January 1913, when payment was stopped on the ground that the appellant was then fit to resume work. No claim is made in the present arbitration in respect of this accident. (2) On payment of compensation being stopped the appellant obtained work as a surface labourer at the respondents' pithead and wrought there on 7th and 8th January 1913, but he had to give up work on account of pain in his forehead and dizziness. (3) On 23rd January 1913 the appellant obtained a certificate from the certifying surgeon that he was suffering from nystagmus, and was thereby disabled from earning full wages, and that the disablement commenced on 9th January 1913. The respondents appealed to one of the medical referees under the Act, but their appeal was dismissed on 8th February 1913. (4) During the twelve months previous to the date of the appellant's disablement (9th January 1913) he worked with the respondents as a miner below ground from 9th January 1912 to 1st May 1912, and as a surface labourer on 8th and 9th January 1913. During the period intervening between those periods of employment he was off work owing to the accident of 1st May 1912. (5) It is not proved that the appellant suffered from nystagmus either between 9th January 1912 and 1st May 1912 or at any previous period. (6) The Cadzow pit in which the appellant was employed is a safety lamp pit. (7) The appellant has not proved that the nystagmus from which he suffers was due to the nature of his employment during the twelve months previous to the date of his disablement. (8) The respondents have not proved that the appellant's nystagmus was not due to the nature of his employment during the twelve months preceding the date of disablement. (9) Nystagmus is a disease of insidious growth. A man with incipient nystagmus may work for long undergrouud without being aware that he is suffering from it. Miners' nystagmus is caused by working in bad illumination. It occurs almost invariably in miners who work in safety lamp pits, being frequently called the 'Glennie blink' from the name of a safety lamp in common use. Nystagmus is not in fact associated with, or found to be caused by, surface labouring work. (10) The certifying surgeon in the present case did not certify that the disease was not due to the nature of the appellant's employment.

"On the above facts I held that the question of liability depended on the onus of proof; that the appellant was not at or immediately before the date of disablement employed in mining in the sense in which mining is used to denote the process to which nystagmus is related; and that therefore the onus lay on him to prove that his nystagmus was due to the nature of his employment with the respondents between 9th January 1912 and 9th January 1913. As he had failed to discharge this onus I refused his claim for compensation. If I had held that the onus lay on the respondents to prove that the appellant's nystagmus was not due to such employment, I should have awarded the appellant compensation of 7s. per week in respect of partial incapacity.

Oct. 24, 1913.

Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.

"I held that 'mining' as related to nystagmus means miner's work underground, and does not include all work on, in, or about a mine, and in particular does not include the surface labouring work at which the appellant was employed on 8th and 9th January 1913. Accordingly, in my opinion, the appellant had not the advantage of the presumption established by section 8, subsection 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) On the facts above stated was the onus on the appellant to prove that the nystagmus from which he suffered was due to the nature of his employment with the respondents? or (2) Was the onus on the respondents to prove that the appellant's nystagmus was not due to the nature of his employment with them? (3) Ought the Sheriff-substitute to have awarded compensation to the appellant?"

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie) on 21st October 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—It was not necessary for the appellant to prove that the disease from which he suffered was due to the nature of his employment, because the fact that at the date of his disablement he was engaged in the process of mining raised per se a statutory presumption that it was so due,[1] a presumption which had not been rebutted by the respondents. It was argued by the respondents that he was not engaged in "mining," and accordingly had not the benefit of the presumption, because he was employed solely upon the surface; but "mines" were not necessarily limited to underground workings,[2] and for the purposes of the Third Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the word "mining" had a meaning corresponding to the definition of "mine" contained in the Coal Mines Act, 1911,[3] and included any "process ancillary to the getting, dressing or preparation for sale of minerals," a definition wide enough to include not only work performed underground but also such ancillary work as was done by surface labourers at the pithead. Wherever the Legislature intended, in statutes dealing with mines, to draw a distinction between underground and surface work it did so expressly. Moreover, the view that mining was limited to underground employment was quite inconsistent with the Third Schedule and the subsequent additions to it. The diseases specified in relation to mining were in several instances diseases incidental to employment above ground, and this clearly showed that the description of the process used in the Schedule, viz., "mining," was a general one intended to apply to and include the processes above ground which gave rise to the specified diseases.[4] The onus accordingly was on the respondents, and not, as the arbitrator thought, on the appellant, and that onus could only be discharged by their obtaining the certificate of a certifying surgeon that the disease was not due to the employment, or by their bringing positive proof to that effect,[5] and they had done neither. Even, how-

[1] Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 8 (1), (2), Third Schedule.

[2] Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, (1888) 15 R. (H. L.) 94, Lord Watson, at p. 101.

[3] 1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 50, sec. 122.

[4] Adshead Elliot, Workmen's Compensation Act, 6th ed. 530, 531; Lawes, Compensation for Industrial Diseases, 257, 278, 283, and 137.

[5] Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 8 (2); M'Ginn v. Udston Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 668.

ever, if the onus were on the appellant to prove that the nystagmus was due to the nature of his employment within the twelve months previous to the date of his disablement, he had, on the facts found proved, discharged the onus, and the arbitrator's decision to the contrary, being unsupported by evidence and, further, depending upon considerations of law, was open to review and should be recalled.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—In the case of the appellant there was no presumption that the disease was due to the nature of his employment, because at the date of his disablement he was not engaged in the process of mining. The only persons who could properly be said to be engaged in that process were those who were winning the minerals or bringing them up to the surface, and if the appellant were engaged in mining so also must all those persons be who were employed in connection with the mine as clerks or otherwise. The expression "Employment on, or in, or about a mine," which occurred in sec. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, showed clearly that, where the Legislature intended to include not only the work of the miner proper but also the work of the numerous classes of persons who were merely ancillary to him, it did so in express terms. Further, miners' nystagmus, and the other mining diseases, were characteristic of mining work below ground, and it was clearly the object of these provisions of the Act to give protection to those classes of workmen only who were exposed to special risks. The appellant, accordingly, was not engaged in mining at the date of his disablement and there was therefore no presumption in his favour, and if he was to succeed he had to establish that the disease was due to the nature of his employment within the previous twelve months. This he had entirely failed to do. The mere fact that he was suffering from nystagmus was per se insufficient, because there were other types of nystagmus besides miners' nystagmus,[2] and the appellant had shown no symptoms of the disease for eight months after he had been working below ground. On the facts of the case, which did not exclude the existence of alternative causes, constitutional or other, to which the disease might be attributed, the arbitrator's conclusion could not be held to be unwarranted, and the Court were not entitled to interfere with his decision.

At advising on 24th October 1913,—

Lord President.—We are asked here to consider and decide whether a man at work on the surface of the ground above a coal mine was engaged in the process of mining. I am of opinion that he was not. The circumstances under which the question arises were as follows: On the 8th and 9th January 1913, the appellant was engaged at the pithead of Cadzow Colliery, near Hamilton, as a surface labourer. On 9th January 1913 he was attacked by a severe pain in the head and dizziness, and was compelled to cease work. Subsequently, in the month of January, he obtained from the certifying surgeon a certificate to the effect (first), that he was suffering from nystagmus; (second), that in consequence he was disabled

[1] Vaughan v. Nicoll, (1906) 8 F. 464, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 466. M'Ginn v. Udston Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 668, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 674, was also referred to.

[2] M'Ginn v. Udston Coal Co., Limited, 1912 S. C. 668, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 675; Luson & Hyde, Diseases of Workmen, 91-93.

Oct. 24, 1913.

Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

from earning full wages; and (third), that the date of the commencement of his disablement was 9th January 1913. An attempt to challenge the surgeon's certificate was unsuccessful, and accordingly this appellant, armed with a certificate in the terms which I have mentioned, was in a position to say, subject to certain conditions, that the disease which he had contracted must be deemed to have been due to the nature of the employment in which he was engaged, provided that employment was the process of mining, for the 8th section and second subsection of the statute of 1906 provides: "If the workman at or immediately before the date of the disablement or suspension was employed in any process mentioned in the second column of the Third Schedule to this Act, and the disease contracted is the disease in the first column of that Schedule set opposite the description of the process, the disease, except where the certifying surgeon certifies that in his opinion the disease was not due to the nature of the employment, shall be deemed to have been due to the nature of that employment, unless the employer proves the contrary."

Now, at the date of the disablement this man was, as I have said, engaged at work on the surface of the mine and was not engaged, in my opinion, in the process of mining. It is acknowledged that there is no statutory definition of the "process of mining," that the expression is not used in any technical or artificial or secondary sense, but is to be construed according to the plain ordinary signification of the words. What then is, in plain ordinary language, the meaning of the expression "the process of mining"? I think there can be no doubt the meaning of that expression is the obtaining of mineral from an excavation in the earth, which necessarily implies two things—(first) the actual cutting or hewing of the mineral, and (second) its removal to the surface. In no part of that operation was the appellant engaged. Indeed, it was stated in argument that, in order to entitle him to succeed in his appeal, it would be necessary for him to show that "the process of mining" was equivalent to and interchangeable with the expression "employment on, or in, or about a mine." Now, the latter expression is familiar in this chapter of law. It is to be found in the 7th section and 1st subsection of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, and has been frequently the subject of judicial construction. And I cannot doubt that, if the Legislature had intended that the expression "the process of mining" should be equivalent to the expression "employment on, or in, or about a mine," the latter expression would have been used, being, as I have said, perfectly familiar in this branch and chapter of law. That it was not so used is clearly decisive, in my mind, of the meaning of the Legislature, and demonstrates that it was intended, in using the expression "the process of mining," to signify something entirely different.

That is exactly what one would naturally have expected, because it would be strange indeed if a statutory presumption were to be set up that a man who had contracted a certain disease should be deemed to have contracted it because of the nature of the employment in which he was engaged at the time, if that disease was one which was neither necessarily nor naturally connected with the particular work in which the man was engaged.

Oct. 24, 1913.

Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

Such is the case before us here, because the arbitrator has found, as a matter of fact, that "nystagmus is not in fact associated with or found to be caused by surface labouring work," and if that is so, then inasmuch as this man was not engaged in the "process of mining" at the date of his disablement, I am of opinion, agreeing with the arbitrator, that he is not entitled to have the advantage of the presumption.

Another topic was raised but was only faintly argued to us. It appears that for a period of a little over eight months prior to the date of his disablement the appellant was not engaged in any work at all. He was suffering from the effects of an accident which befell him on 1st May 1912. But for some time prior to that date, he had been engaged as an ordinary miner working underground at the same colliery, all within a period of twelve months prior to the date of his disablement, and it is contended that, if he be not entitled to the benefit of the statutory presumption, nevertheless he may show by evidence that de facto the disease which he contracted on 9th January 1913 was due to the nature of the employment in which he had been engaged prior to the date of his accident on 1st May 1912.

That is no doubt so, but the appellant, having the opportunity, attempted to show that his disease was due to the nature of the prior employment, and, in the opinion of the arbitrator, failed. That is a pure question of fact upon which the arbitrator is final Judge. It was no doubt argued to us that, if there were no facts upon which the arbitrator could come to the conclusion he has reached, it would be within our power to disturb his finding. That may be so, but I am very clearly of opinion that the arbitrator here had evidence before him upon which he was entitled to form the conclusions he did. And even if I thought—which I certainly do not—that he had come to a wrong conclusion, I am clearly of opinion that we could not disturb it.

I propose to your Lordships, therefore, that we should answer the first question put to us in the affirmative, the second question in the negative, and the third question in the negative.

Lord Johnston.—The claimant has obtained a certificate that he was, at 9th January 1913, suffering from an industrial disease, viz., nystagmus. He has therefore cleared his way to a claim as if he had met with a physical accident. But before he can make good his right to compensation he must establish that the disease is due to the nature of the employment in which he was engaged within the twelve months previous to the said date. In proceeding to establish that fact he has, under section 8 (2) of the Act of 1906, the benefit of a presumption that the disease "shall be deemed to have been due to the nature of that employment, unless the employer proves the contrary." But the benefit of the presumption depends upon the condition that the workman was at or immediately before the date fixed by the certificate employed in the industrial process to which in the schedule the disease is appropriated. That industrial process is, in the case of the disease nystagmus, the process of mining.

Now the claimant was unquestionably engaged in the work of mining from October 1911 to 1st May 1912. But that period of employment

Oct. 24, 1913.

Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.

Ld. Johnston.

ceased more than seven months before the certified date, and cannot be regarded as having been at or immediately before the certified date. Again, he was engaged at the pithead for two days immediately previous to the certified date, in surface work, viz., as we are informed, hauling hutches to the scree. I do not think that it would be safe in this case to determine precisely and exhaustively what is included in the term "mining" as used in the statutory Schedule. That it involves underground work I think is sufficiently clear. But whether it is limited to the work of getting the coal, and does not also include the drawing and other incidental work which is involved in bringing the coal got to the surface, may be a question. It is enough for this case that it does not include the class of surface labour at which the claimant was employed for two days prior to the certified date. The claimant has not therefore the benefit of the presumption of section 8 (2). The onus of establishing that the disease from which he suffers was due to the nature of his employment in the service of the respondents during the earlier part of the twelve months preceding the certified date lies with him and, in the opinion of the Sheriff, he has not on the facts discharged that onus. The Sheriff has therefore come to the only logical conclusion, and I therefore agree with your Lordship in answering the questions in the manner your Lordship proposes.

At first sight the case is one of hardship. But it must be remembered that the inclusion of industrial disease as an equivalent of physical accident, by the Act of 1906, is accompanied by a provision which may often bear with great hardship on the employer, in respect that though an industrial disease may have its origin in previous years and be of insidious growth, once it is developed to the point of certification, the whole responsibility for compensation is cast upon the shoulders of the employer or employers of the last twelve months. Such employer or employers are therefore justified in requiring that the onus of proof be clearly discharged by the claimant.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion. In order to have the benefit of the presumption established by the statute, the nystagmus from which the workman was suffering must have been contracted in the process of mining, and he must have been engaged in the process of mining at or immediately before the date of disablement caused by the nystagmus. Therefore the question in the case is, In what sense is the term "mining" used in the Schedule to the Act? In my opinion "mining" so used is to be construed in its ordinary acceptation. It is impossible to say that a man engaged as a surface labourer can be described as engaged in the process of mining.

That view is confirmed when one considers the description of the diseases which are described in the original Schedule to the Act, and those contained in the order which extends the Schedule. These diseases, in so far as they apply to miners, are those which affect members of the organisation underground, and are not such as affect those who are employed on the surface. In the present case we have a distinct finding by the arbitrator that "nystagmus is not in fact associated with, or found to be caused by, surface labouring work."

It follows that the workman in question can take no benefit from the presumption established by statute, and, unless he has proved that the disease is due to the nature of his employment, he cannot succeed. That, of course, is a pure question of fact and one for the arbitrator to decide, and we cannot, according to all the principles laid down in previous cases, interfere with what the arbitrator has done unless we find there is no evidence upon which his conclusion can be based. I am unable to take that view upon the facts as stated in the present appeal, and, accordingly, I am of opinion that the conclusion reached by the learned Sheriff-substitute is correct.

Oct. 24, 1913.
Scullion v. Cadzow Coal Co., Limited.
Lord Mackenzie.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the affirmative, and the second and third questions in the negative.

SIMPSON & MARWICK, W.S.—W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 7.

MRS CATHERINE GAUNT, Pursuer (Appellant).—Johnston, K.C.—M. P. Fraser.
MALCOLM M'INTYRE, Defender (Respondent).—Munro, K.C.—Lippe.

Oct. 30, 1913.
Gaunt v. M'Intyre.

Reparation — Negligence — Property — Defective condition of premises — Lighting of common stair — Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. celxxiii.), sec. 361.

The Glasgow Police Act, 1866, sec. 361, enacts that the owner of heritable property having an access by a common stair shall provide and maintain suitable gas fittings in the stair to the satisfaction of the inspector of lighting, placed as the inspector may direct, and that the magistrates shall cause them to be supplied with gas and lighted during the same hours as the public street lamps, and shall recover the cost from the owner.

In an action of damages for personal injuries, brought against the proprietor of a tenement in Glasgow, the pursuer averred that she received the injuries through falling on the common stair while on her way after dark to visit the tenant of one of the houses in the tenement. The fault on the part of the defender which she alleged was that the stair was not sufficiently lighted.

Held that, as the duty of the defender consisted in lighting the stair to the satisfaction of the inspector of lighting, and as it was not averred that he had failed in that duty, the action was irrelevant.

Observed (per Lord Salvesen) that there is no duty at common law on the part of the proprietor of a tenement to light a common stair.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN March 1913 Mrs Catherine Gaunt with the consent of her husband brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Malcolm M'Intyre, the owner of the property No. 456 Gairbraid Street, Maryhill, Glasgow, concluding for damages for personal injury.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 3) "The said property 456 Gairbraid Street, Maryhill, the property of the defender, is four storeys in height. The ground floor is occupied by shops and the upper flats are occupied as dwelling-houses. To get to the dwelling-houses there is first the entrance by the common close forming 456 Gairbraid Street; then by three flights of stairs to the various landings; the first stair leading to the first landing, upon which landing there are entrances to three dwelling-houses; the second flight of stairs leading to the second landing, upon which landing there are also entrances to three dwelling-

Oct. 30, 1913.

Gaunt v. M'Intyre.

houses; and the third flight of stairs leading to the top landing, upon which landing there are also entrances to three dwelling-houses." (Cond. 4) "These stairs leading to the various landings are lighted after dark by one gas jet of light upon each landing, but such gas jets are situated in an obscure corner, recess, or angle of the stair landing and never gave a proper light. At the time of the accident aftermentioned the gas burners in the jets were so worn and done that they gave no light, or at least such an obscure faint light as failed to shew the true position and nature of the stairs to be ascended or descended, or to guide a person having necessity or business to ascend or descend the said stairs with safety. The said jets, gas-pipes and burners are the property of the defender, who is bound to maintain and renew them from time to time as may be required. It was the duty of the defender to see that the said pipes and burners were sufficient, and were in a proper state to give reasonable and sufficient light to enable members of the public requiring to ascend or descend said stair to do so in safety. The defender failed in this duty as stated. The section of the Act mentioned in answer is referred to." (Cond. 5) "On the 3rd day of January last 1913, between 10 and 11 o'clock at night, the pursuer, who stays at 484 Gairbraid Street, a few doors west of the tenement belonging to the defender at 456 Gairbraid Street, went to visit an old friend of hers, a Mrs Brookmire, wife of and residing with Robert Brookmire, who resides in a house on the top flat of the tenement 456 Gairbraid Street, and is a tenant of the defenders in the said property. For this purpose, and with this object in view, pursuer entered by the common close, and ascended the stairs, reaching the top flat in safety." (Cond. 6) "After knocking at Mrs Brookmire's door and satisfying herself that Mrs Brookmire was not at home she returned to descend the stairs. The stairs were very dark, but she descended the top stair safely. When descending the second stair to reach the first landing from the street floor, she tripped and fell down three steps on to the first landing, sustaining a severe shock to her sytem, fracturing the bones of her ankle and leg, and sustaining other injuries to her person." (Cond. 7) "The second stair where she slipped and fell consists of thirteen steps, each about 4 feet in length between perpendicular walls, with a breadth (excepting the three lowermost steps) of about one foot. The three lowermost steps where the accident occurred are known as wheeling steps, having a breadth on the one side of 12 inches or thereby, and tapering to about 4 or 5 inches on the right-hand side coming down. The light of the said stair was so obscure, and the burner in the jet, which was intended to light said stair at this place, was so old and defective and gave so little light, that it was quite impossible to see clearly the state of the steps of the stair which the pursuer was descending." (Cond. 8) "The wall into which the stair was built on the left-hand side formed the gable of the property and descended all the way to the first landing, while the wall on the opposite or right-hand side, when approaching the first landing, only descended a part of the length of the stair, leaving the lowermost two wheeling steps of that stair, unprotected either by the wall or by any railing or other protection of any kind whatever." (Cond 9.) "When the pursuer was descending the said stair she found her way down cautiously, guiding herself down by the wall on her right hand, so far as it went, but the wall ceased before she was at the bottom of the stair approaching the first landing. She put her foot down the next step, being the first wheeling step, in the belief that it was of the same breadth as the other broad steps she had descended, when the heel of her boot caught the narrow end of the step and she tripped and was thrown on to the landing, sustaining the damages above set forth." [In Cond. 10 the pursuer described the nature of the injuries she received through this fall.] (Cond. 11) "The said stair, at the place where pursuer tripped and fell, was of a very dangerous design and construction. The three wheeling steps, which were the only kind of that description in the property, tapering as they did towards the right-hand side in descending the stair, were dangerous to persons having reason to ascend or descend them, and such steps were not protected by handrailings or banisters of any kind, and were unlighted, or so obscurely lighted as to be a danger specially to strangers in the dark, which the pursuer was. The defender was in fault in not having the said wheeling steps protected by railings or banisters, and he or his factors were also in fault in not having such dangerous stairs and steps properly lighted, and the gas jets and burners renewed from time to time, so that the said stairs and landing would have been properly lighted. The peculiar design and construction of the stairs, the fact that no railings or banisters were provided, and the defective light on the stair and landing, for all which the defender is responsible, were, or one or other of them was, the cause of the pursuer's accident. In reference to the statement in answer, the only occasions on which the pursuer had previously visited the property were during the daytime." (Cond. 12) "Before the accident to the pursuer occurred, the defender's factors, for whom the defender is responsible, were repeatedly warned of the obscurity of and defectiveness of the light on the stair landing, and they promised, but failed, to have it looked into and put right. Since the accident to the pursuer the lights on the stair landings have been put right." During the hearing before the Second Division the pursuer lodged a minute of amendment, and was allowed to amend the record by adding the following words in Cond. 12:—"In particular Mrs Ann M'Leod or M'Millan and Mrs Jessie Forsyth or Lawson, both tenants of the defender and residing on the landing at which the accident occurred, and Elizabeth Lawson, the daughter of the last-named tenant, on several occasions during the six months preceding 3rd January 1913, the date of the accident, complained to a clerk in the employment of the defender's said house factors, Messrs Graham, Primrose, & Todd, of the defective nature of the stair lighting at the place where said accident occurred, and also warned him that if such defect were not remedied an accident would take place. The name of the clerk referred to is unknown to the said Mrs M'Millan, Mrs Lawson, and Elizabeth Lawson. He was, at the time when such complaints were made and warning given, collecting rents in said property on behalf of the defender and acting as the representative and on behalf of the defender. Said clerk was in the habit of collecting such rents at the end of each month and said complaints were made regularly on each call. On or about the month of December 1912 the said Elizabeth Lawson was sent by her mother to report to the said factors that a friend of theirs had fallen on the said stair at the same place as the pursuer as a result of the defective lighting, and to request that such defect should be remedied. No attention was paid to these complaints or warnings until after the accident condescended upon."

The defender lodged defences in which he averred, inter alia;—

Oct. 30, 1913.

Gaunt v. M'Intyre.

(Ans. 4) "Denied. The duty of lighting the stair in question is not upon the defender, but upon the Corporation of Glasgow, in terms of section 361 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866."* In Ans. 11 it was averred that the stair was well known to the pursuer, who had repeatedly gone to visit Mrs Brookmire.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer has no title to sue. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action.

On 9th June 1913 the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the second plea in law for the defender, and dismissing the action.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 29th and 30th October 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The respondent, as proprietor of the tenement, was bound to keep the stair reasonably safe for the tenants and those who might have occasion to visit the tenants' houses.[1] As, through his failure to light the stair properly, he had not discharged this duty, he was liable in damages. He was liable on two grounds. In the first place, the common stair constituted an invitation to the public to make use of it.[2] In Milne v. Smith[3] Lord Eldon likened such stairs to common highways. In the second place, the defect here was of the nature of a trap; there was enough light to induce persons to believe that they might safely use the stair, but not enough light to ensure safety. The present case was not within the rule of Cameron v. Young[4] as (a) the defender had invited the public to use the stair,[2] and (b) the defender had the control of the stair.[5] The cases that had apparently influenced the Sheriff-substitute were distinguishable. In Driscoll v. Commissioners of Burgh of Partick[6] the gas on the stair had not been lighted, and the pursuer was tenant of one of the houses and might have lighted the gas herself, but took the risk of going down in the dark. Here the case was that the light was treacherous. In Fleming v. Eadie & Son[7] the premises were under reconstruction. In Gautret v. Egerton[8] the plaintiff was merely a licensee, whereas the pursuer here was entitled to be on the stair,

---

* The Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), enacts:—Sec. 361. "The proprietor or proprietors of every land or heritage having an access by a common stair shall provide and maintain suitable gas pipes and brackets, lamps and burners, in such common stair to the satisfaction of the inspector of lighting . . . and placed as the said inspector . . . may direct . . . and the magistrates and council shall cause them to be supplied with gas and lighted during the same hours as the public street lamps, and for each burner the proprietor or proprietors shall pay to the magistrates and council such sum not exceeding ten shillings per annum as the magistrates and council may from time to time direct, and the said sum shall be recoverable by the proprietor from the occupiers in proportion to their respective rents, and be deemed to be a debt recoverable as and in the same way as rent."

[1] M'Martin v. Hannay, (1872) 10 Macph. 411; Miller v. Hancock, [1893] 2 Q. B. 177.

[2] Kennedy v. Shotts Iron Co., Limited, 1913 S. C. 1143, at p. 1154.

[3] (1814) 2 Dow, 390, at p. 396; Beven on Negligence, (3rd ed.) vol. i. p. 449.

[4] 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7.

[5] Mellon v. Henderson, 1913 S. C. 1207.

[6] (1900) 2 F. 368.

[7] (1898) 25 R. 500.

[8] (1867) L. R., 2 C. P. 371.

and could not have been interdicted from being on it. Davidson v. Sprengel[1] was decided on the ground of personal bar. The Glasgow Police Act might raise a difficulty at a later stage of the case, but could not exclude the appellant's claim at the present stage. In any event the respondent under the Act was bound to supply the gas-fittings, and those on this stair were defective.

Argued for the respondent;—[Counsel were called on to reply only with regard to the lighting of the stair]—There was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the respondent. At common law he was not bound to light the stair. His only duty was statutory, viz., to provide and maintain lights to the satisfaction of the inspector of lighting. As there were no averments to the contrary, it must be assumed that he had fulfilled this duty and, if so, he was not in fault. Even if there was a defect in the lighting, the respondent could not be made liable unless he had the control of the stair; but when the houses were let the respondent parted with the control of the stair, for it was not thereafter within his power to exclude the public from it.[2] The respondent would not be liable to a tenant[3] for injuries through a defect in the stair; much less could he be made liable to a visitor to a tenant. The appellant was a mere licensee who must take the premises as they were,[4] and to whom the respondent would be liable only if there were, what was not here averred, a danger of the nature of a trap. The appellant was in a dilemma. If the stair was dangerous she must have ascertained this on her previous visits to Mrs Brookmire, and must be held to have known and taken the risk of any dangerous defect in the stair[5]; if the stair was not dangerous, then cadit quæstio.

Lord Dundas.—This is an action of damages for personal injury. It appears that the pursuer met with an accident in a common stair in the property of the defender while coming down from an upper storey of the tenement, where she had gone to visit one of the tenants. The question we have to decide is whether the pursuer has stated a relevant case against the defender. The Sheriff-substitute has held that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and I have come to the conclusion that he is right.

There was not at our bar any serious argument to the effect that the stair was defective in structure. It was conceded, and I think rightly, that "wheeling steps" are not uncommon, and are not in themselves a source of danger. Similarly, the absence of a handrail, as a structural defect, was not in itself made much of at the bar. The kind of case that was made for the pursuer in argument was that the fault lay in some deficiency in the lighting, having regard to the surrounding circumstances which I have mentioned. When I consider the pursuer's averments carefully, as one is bound to do, I do not find them satisfactory. Even at

---

[1] 1909 S. C. 566.

[2] Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A. C. 428, per Lord Atkinson, at p. 433.

[3] Davidson v. Sprengel, 1909 S. C. 566, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 570.

[4] Gautret v. Egerton, L. R., 2 C. P. 371.

[5] Fleming v. Eadie & Son, 25 R. 500; Driscoll v. Commissioners of Burgh of Partick, 2 F. 368.

Oct. 30, 1913.

Gaunt v. M'Intyre.

Lord Dundas.

the end of the excellent argument we have heard I do not quite know what is the precise defect attributed to the lighting. The first part of condescendence 4 rather points to this, that the light was from the beginning insufficient, either because the lights were badly placed, or because the burners were defective. That, however, is met by section 361 of the Glasgow Police Act, alluded to on record, because it is provided by that section that the lighting appliances have to be provided and maintained, and the lights placed, to the satisfaction of the inspector of lighting of the Corporation of Glasgow. Then, again, so far as complaint is intended to be made about some emerging defect, we are told that the burners were "worn and done," and "gave no light, or at least" only "an obscure faint light." But there is no explanation at all of the kind of wearing-out that is meant, or why there was less light than there should have been; and none of the details are given which one would have liked to know. One notices that the last words of condescendence 12 inform us that "Since the accident to the pursuer the lights on the stair landings have been put right." But there again a mysterious silence is maintained as to how they were "put right." One cannot help thinking that, if the pursuer knew exactly what the case was that she wanted to present, she would in her allegation of fault have set forth something of what required to be done, and was done, to put these things right which were wrong before. But nothing of that sort is said.

Apart, however, from the mere matter of the form of averment, when we come to consider the question of fault which lies at the root of the action, we must ask, What is the duty of the landlord here? because it must depend upon that whether there is fault on his part or not. I do not think it can be said to be any duty of this landlord to keep a full light always there during the hours of darkness,—a light up to the standard, perhaps, desired by his tenants, or something of that sort,—when one recollects that he is, by the terms of the section of the Police Act to which I have referred, bound to maintain the lighting of the stair to the satisfaction of the Corporation. That is the standard of his duty. He is bound to keep this stair lighted to the satisfaction of the Corporation's inspector. Now, the inspector or his men, one must assume, were about this stair continually, and were about the stair no doubt upon the very night in question. The presumption surely is that the lighting as it existed was in conformity, and not in disconformity, with the legal requirement; and there is nothing said or suggested to the contrary here. That seems to dispose of the question of the landlord's duty, and his alleged violation of it or fault.

It appears to me that a person in the position of the pursuer, going into a stair of this kind, must take it as she finds it, and goes there subject to the risk of the condition of the stair; unless, of course, a case could be averred of something of the nature of an invitation into a "trap," as it is sometimes called in the cases. Here I do not think there is any suggestion, at all events any effective suggestion, of anything like a trap. It is true that condescendence 12, as amended, contains some definite averments of complaints made by tenants to the defender's factor, but one has to consider whether that amendment has in any way bettered the pursuer's situation.

I do not myself think that it has. There is a very vague, and I think insufficient, statement about an alleged report, through the medium of a child, of some sort of accident that had occurred. I do not attach any importance to that; it is too vague. But it is said with some specification that complaints were made by the tenants to the factor. That might be in the ordinary case a very important averment; but here it seems to me to lose all its importance when one refers to the consideration that the standard of this landlord's duty in regard to lighting was that which I have indicated, namely, lighting to the satisfaction of the Corporation of Glasgow. There is here no suggestion that that standard was not maintained, and that that duty was not performed. It is not said or suggested that any complaint was made by or on behalf of the inspector of lighting to the defender or his factor.

I think that is all one need say about this case. I agree with the result at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived; and I think we should affirm his interlocutor.

Lord Salvesen.—I am of the same opinion. Reading this record as favourably as I can for the pursuer in the light of the argument submitted by her counsel, I think it comes to this, that her complaint is that a burner in this particular stair had become so obstructed or otherwise defective that the light which the gas jet gave was less than it had previously given, and was not sufficient properly to light the part of the stair on which the pursuer fell.

I apprehend there is no duty at common law on the part of the proprietor of a tenement to light the stair which is the access of his tenants to their respective houses. They may lawfully take a house on a stair which there is no means of lighting at night, and they cannot complain if, when passing up and down the stair in the dark, they meet with an accident for no other reason than that in the dark it is more difficult for a person to maintain his footing. For public reasons, however, Parliament has enacted that in a large city such as Glasgow there shall be imposed upon the proprietor of every tenement in which there is a common stair the duty of providing and maintaining gas-pipes and burners which are to be placed there under the instructions of the inspector of lighting, and are to be maintained by the proprietor to the inspector's satisfaction. For the failure in that statutory duty—which is no doubt enacted for the benefit of the tenants, who have to pay, as I understand, for the gas consumed in the common stair—I think the proprietor might be liable, even to a person like the pursuer who was not a tenant but merely a visitor to one of the tenants. She had a perfect right to go up and down that stair in order to visit her friend, and a proprietor who lets a house at the top of a stair is bound to assume that other people besides his tenants will use it.

But then I think it is not sufficient to aver that the light was defective in the opinion of the tenants, or that the tenants complained that the light was defective. To make a relevant case it is necessary to aver that the appliances were not to the satisfaction of the inspector who is the statutory judge of their sufficiency, and for a very obvious reason. The

Oct. 30, 1913.
Gaunt v. M'Intyre.
Lord Salvesen.

Corporation of Glasgow can only charge 10s. per annum for the gas consumed by each of these jets, and they have an interest in seeing that no more gas passes through a particular burner than will leave them a reasonable profit on the gas supplied. If it were left to the individual discretion of the landlord or the tenants to fix the size of the burners no doubt they would adopt the largest burner which could be fitted on to the particular pipe, and would have the largest amount of light in the common stair that they could get. I think that is a very good reason why the statute has enacted that the appliances shall be supplied and maintained to the satisfaction of the inspector of lighting.

In these circumstances—the landlord having, as we must assume in the absence of any averment to the contrary, fulfilled his initial duty of putting pipes in the places directed by the inspector of lighting, and of supplying burners to his satisfaction—I think the landlord is entitled to assume that all is well with his appliances, unless he receives some complaint, not from the tenants, but from the person to whose satisfaction the appliances are to be maintained, to wit, the inspector. One of the inspector's men must daily visit the house to light the jets, and I should imagine it to be one of his duties to report to the inspector if, in his opinion, the lighting is inadequate in any particular stair. Now, there is no suggestion of anything of that kind having occurred here—no suggestion of any failure to comply with the statutory duty imposed by the section of the Act to which we were referred. In these circumstances, I think the pursuer's case is absolutely irrelevant.

Lord Guthrie.—I concur. The pursuer and the defender have raised a number of general questions. But I shall assume in favour of the pursuer a possible liability against the landlord in connection with such an accident as this; and I shall also assume that she is not personally barred by her previous knowledge and use of the stair. It seems to me sufficient to advert, as your Lordships have done, to the terms of section 361 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, which I think disposes of the case made on inadequate lighting. It is admitted that no independent case can be made on the absence of a handrail and on faulty construction of the stair.

The Glasgow Act might have been expressed in one of two ways. It might have said that the landlord shall adequately light the stair. In that case it might have been sufficient for the pursuer to say that the stair was inadequately lighted, first, because the light was in an improper place, and second, because it was not large enough or bright enough properly to light the stair. But, by contrast, this Act says that the landlord's duty is to conform to the instructions of the inspector of lighting, first in respect to the position of the lights, second in respect to the kind of burners that are to be provided, and third in respect of the way in which these are to be maintained.

The pursuer might have countered that case and averred herself out of the Act by alleging that the provisions of the Act had not been followed. But all that she says is, "the section of the Act mentioned in answer is referred to," thereby, I think, justifying the assumption that the Act was complied with. The pursuer's case is quite consistent with the inspector having been there that morning, or the night before when the burners were lighted, and having passed everything as in his opinion sufficient in the particular circumstances. I therefore think the Sheriff-substitute has taken the right course in dismissing the action. Oct. 30, 1913. Gaunt v. M'Intyre.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the appeal.

OLIPHANT & MURRAY, W.S.—MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

ROBERT CAIRNS AND OTHERS, Pursuers (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—Lippe.
HARRY WALKER, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—J. R. Christie—A. M. Stuart.

No. 8.
Nov. 19, 1913.
Cairns v. Harry Walker, Limited.

Reparation—Ship—Illegal use of ship—Smuggling—Steward supplied with articles to be smuggled—Fine imposed on ship—Liability of supplier of articles to repay fine.

A British ship, trading between Grangemouth and South America, was fined, on arriving at Buenos Ayres, by the Customs authorities in respect that certain dutiable articles on board had not, as required by Argentine law, been declared in the ship's manifest and had been found concealed in the steward's cabin. These articles had, unknown to the shipowners but with the connivance of the captain, been supplied to the steward by a firm of merchants at Grangemouth in the knowledge that they were to be carried on board the ship and traded with by him, and that, for the purpose of successful trading, they would have to be smuggled into the port of destination. They were supplied on credit, and were to be paid for by the steward out of the proceeds of the trading.

The shipowners having brought an action against the merchants to recover in name of damages the amount of the fine levied on the ship—

Held that the merchants, having been accessory to the wrongful and illegal use of the vessel for carrying goods on a smuggling adventure, were liable for the loss and damage thereby occasioned to the owners; and decree pronounced against them.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Skerrington

ON 22nd August 1911 Robert Cairns and others, the owners of the steamship "Cairngorm" of Leith, brought an action against Harry Walker, Limited, drapers and outfitters, Grangemouth, and Harry Walker, the managing director of that Company, concluding for payment of £89, 2s. 6d. in name of damages.

The pursuers averred that on 22nd December 1910 the "Cairngorm" sailed with a cargo of coal from Grangemouth for South American ports. On the arrival of the ship at Buenos Ayres on 28th January 1911 the captain delivered to the Customs authorities the ship's manifest, in which, according to Argentine law, it was necessary to declare all the goods on board which were liable to import duty. A few days afterwards the Customs authorities came on board and discovered a number of dutiable articles which had been concealed by the steward (William Post), and which should have been declared in the manifest. In consequence of the failure to declare these articles a fine amounting to £89, 2s. 6d. was imposed on, and paid by, the pursuers' agents at Buenos Ayres. The pursuers also averred:—"The said articles in respect of which the said fine was paid were put on board the pursuers' ship by Post under an agreement between Post and the defenders, entered into by Post and the defender Harry Walker, acting on behalf of his said Company, and for his own profit as the person having the whole substantial interest in the said Company, whereby Post and the defender Harry Walker conspired together to use the pursuers' ship for the purpose of smuggling goods into the Argentine without payment of duty. The said defender was well aware that in so acting he was subjecting the pursuers to a penalty if the goods were discovered; nevertheless he carried through the scheme in concert with Post, and thus brought upon the pursuers the loss in respect of which they now sue. The loss and damage sustained by the pursuers through the enforced payment of the said fine was the direct result of the said actings. The defenders' business largely consists in supplying seamen with goods, and the said Harry Walker was well aware that the articles supplied to the said William Post were not intended for his own personal use or for sale on board the ship. The said William Post was a domiciled Englishman, but a German by birth, and a stranger to the defenders, and was without means to pay for goods purchased in the ordinary course of business. In these circumstances the said agreement was entered into between Post and the defender Harry Walker, that the sale of the said articles should be for the mutual benefit of the parties, and that accounts should be settled after the success of the venture on the said William Post's return to the United Kingdom. Further, it was essential to the success of the said William Post's venture that no disclosure of the goods being on board should be made by the defenders to the pursuers. If such disclosure had been made to the pursuers the goods would have been returned to the defenders, or otherwise would have been duly declared in the ship's manifest. The defenders, in supplying the said goods, were well aware that it was Post's intention to trade with them by smuggling. Further, it was the duty of the defenders and of the said Harry Walker to disclose the transaction with Post to the pursuers; but they failed to do so, in consequence of which the said loss and damage occurred. The pursuers have requested the defenders to relieve them of the said fine, but they have refused or at least delayed to do so."

Nov. 19, 1913.

Cairns v. Harry Walker, Limited.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having conspired with the said William Post to use the pursuers' ship for the purpose of concealing dutiable goods on board, and smuggling them ashore at Buenos Ayres, for the mutual benefit of the said William Post and the defenders, and the pursuers having suffered loss and damage thereby to the amount sued for, decree ought to be granted as craved. (2) The defenders are liable for the loss and damage sustained by the pursuers, in respect that they supplied the said goods in the knowledge that the same were to be smuggled. (3) Separatim, the defenders, being aware of the destination of the ship, and that the said goods could not be introduced into Buenos Ayres without payment of duty, and having, as unpaid sellers, an interest in the goods, were bound to disclose to the pursuers that the said goods were on board the said vessel, in order that duty might be paid on them, and not having done so, are liable in damages.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) Any goods furnished by the defenders to the said William Post having been sold and delivered by them in the ordinary way of trade, they, as sellers, are not responsible for the actings of Post which are complained of, and they should be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed and led, the import of which is set forth in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Salvesen.

On 26th November 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender Harry Walker having been accessory to the wrongful and illegal use of the pursuers' ship 'Cairngorm' for carrying goods from Grangemouth to the Argentine on a smuggling adventure, the defenders are liable, jointly and severally, to the pursuers in damages: Assesses the amount of said damages at £89, 2s. 6d., with interest thereon at 5 per centum from 7th March 1911 till payment, and decerns against the defenders, jointly and severally, for payment to the pursuers of said sum of £89, 2s. 6d., with interest thereon as aforesaid till payment . . ."*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are the owners of the steamship 'Cairngorm' of Leith, which in December 1910 sailed from Grangemouth to Montevideo for orders, under a charter-party which named (Articles 1 and 17) Montevideo, Buenos Ayres, and certain other places on the River Plate as the port or ports of discharge. On reaching Montevideo the steamer was ordered to Buenos Ayres, and she there discharged her cargo. While she was lying in that harbour the Custom House officers found concealed in the steward's cabin and pantry a number of articles which were liable to duty according to Argentine law. These articles were seized, and the ship was condemned to pay a fine equivalent in our currency to £89, 2s. 6d. The receipt given by the Custom House treasurer bears (as translated) that the fine was imposed upon the steamer 'for failing to declare the goods found concealed in the steward's cabin.' The steward deserted the ship and has disappeared. The articles seized formed part of a large assortment which the defenders had sold to the steward on credit, and which they had delivered to him at the ship's side before she left Grangemouth. The pursuers claim damages from the defenders, whom they allege to have been accessories along with the steward in the wrongful and illegal use of their ship for the purpose of smuggling. The defenders first called are a limited company which carries on business as general drapers, clothiers, hatters, and outfitters, at Grangemouth, and the individual defender, Mr Harry Walker, is their managing director. The defenders' counsel expresely admitted that if Mr Walker had made himself personally liable to the pursuers, the limited company was also liable, jointly and severally. Accordingly I do not need to consider whether it was within the scope of Mr Walker's authority to act in the manner alleged by the pursuers.

"Mr Walker acting for his firm and afterwards for the limited company has, for a number of years, sold what are called 'slopchests' to the masters of sailing ships and tramp steamers, and occasionally to stewards, but in the latter case only if the master knew and approved. According to its original and proper meaning a slopchest is an assortment of slops, i.e., of articles such as clothing, soap, &c., which are likely to be required by seamen while absent from a home port. In the days of sailing ships, when voyages were lengthy, a slopchest was usually carried. It is now much less common, but it is carried on some tramp steamers, and the defenders still sell some in every year. Sometimes, if a slopchest is carried, the master or steward as the case may be, orders some goods which are not intended to be sold to the ship's company, but which are intended to be sold to the inhabitants of any port where the ship may happen to touch. Presumably in such cases the shipmaster acts upon the assumption that his owners would not object to petty trade of this kind. At any rate no one could blame a shopkeeper merely because he did not communicate with the owners before

Nov. 19, 1913.

Cairns v. Harry Walker, Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 18th and 19th November 1913. At the hearing counsel for the reclaimers cited Macdonald's Criminal Law, (3rd ed.) p. 6. Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

LORD SALVESEN.—In this case I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right, and that in the finding in the interlocutor under review he has put his judgment upon the right ground.

The facts, so far as material, are that the defenders seem for many years to have carried on a business of supplying to shipmasters and members of crews of ships which are going on long voyages what are known to them as "speculative slopchests." The meaning of "slopchest," when slopchests were in general use, was quite well known amongst persons in supplying a shipmaster with a few trade goods as distinguished from slops. But if the shopkeeper knew that the goods were intended to be smuggled into a foreign country by means of a particular ship, and if he delivered the goods on board that ship or contracted that they should be carried by it, and that he should be paid the price out of the proceeds of the sale, he would, in my opinion, be an accessory to the commission by the master of a wrongful and illegal act, unless, of course, he in fact believed that the owners approved of such a use of their ship. I refer to the summary of the criminal law as to accession given in Macdonald's Criminal Law (3rd ed.), p. 6, and I see no reason why a different rule should apply in the case of a civil delict. A servant who, for his own purposes, and without permission, makes use of his master's property in a manner calculated to cause him serious loss or even inconvenience, is guilty of a breach of contract and also of a positive delict, because he is certainly in no better position than if he had been a mere stranger who used the property of another without permission. According to Bell (sec. 479) it is barratry on the part of a shipmaster if he 'enters into any smuggling concern or evades duties to the loss of the ship.' In the present case the only question in my view is whether the pursuers have proved that the defender, Mr Walker, knew that the steward intended to smuggle into the Argentine a portion of the contents of the so-called slopchest. Though it is not necessary for me to decide the point, I am disposed to think that it would be enough for the pursuers to prove that Mr Walker did not in fact believe that the steward intended to pay or arrange for the payment of duty upon any of the dutiable goods which he might sell in a foreign port to persons other than members of the ship's company.

---

"The price of the slopchest which the defenders sold to the steward amounted to £96, 3s. 8½d., and I think that both the value and the quantity of the goods were greatly in excess of what is usual. Further, the quantity was out of all proportion to what could have been required by a company of twenty-four during a voyage which was to last little more than a month. The largest items in the invoice were for waterproof coats, which are not the same as the oilskins used by seamen. The items are :—'13 mens w. p. coats, 21s., £13, 13s.; 30 ladies w. p. coats, 15s., £22, 10s.; 20 old w. p. coats, 5s., £5." In addition to the articles which the defenders stock, Mr Walker, by special request, procured from Glasgow a quantity of cheap watches and jewellery, which he invoiced as follows :—"36 watches, 3s. 6d., £6, 6s.; 12 bracelets, 4s., £2, 8s.; 12 chain bracelets, 5s. 6d., £3, 6s.; 12 silver alberts, 3s., £1, 16s.; 11 mirrors, 3s. 6d., £1, 18s. 6d.; 7 rings, 4s., £1, 8s.; 17 rings, 7s. 6d., £6, 7s. 6d." Such articles are not usually included in a slopchest, and it was out of the defenders' ordinary course of business to procure and sell them. As regards the nature of the contract between the defenders and the steward, there is no evidence to the seafaring profession. The slopchest contained a number of articles which were likely to be used by the crew on the voyage, and with which they might not have adequately supplied themselves before the voyage commenced, and in order to prevent inconvenience to the crew it was customary for the captain, with his owners' consent, to purchase a slop-chest from which the crew's wants were supplied from time to time. But it is clear, indeed it was not seriously disputed, that the so-called speculative slopchest that was supplied to the steward in this case was not a slopchest of that kind. It consisted of a great many articles which could in no sense be regarded as reasonably required by the crew in the course of the voyage, but was professedly a collection of articles to be used by the steward in trading. The defenders say that they have frequently supplied similar articles for trading purposes to masters of ships going on support the pursuers' averment of joint adventure. I am disposed to think that the contract was really one of sale and return, such as is often made by a wholesale dealer when he provides a small shopkeeper with a certain quantity of stock. In the absence, however, of any notice on record or of any questions to Mr Walker at the proof as to the time at which he intended that the property in the goods should be transferred to the buyer, it would not be legitimate for me to decide that the goods when seized at Buenos Ayres were the property of the defenders. Even on that assumption the steward's possession of the goods would have been as prospective purchaser and not as the defenders' agent, so that the pursuers would still have required to prove guilty knowledge on the part of Mr Walker. I assume, however, that the property in the goods was transferred to the steward as soon as the articles had been selected and purchased. None the less the contract was peculiar in respect that the steward was to have credit until the ship returned to her first English port—the object being to enable him to pay for the goods out of the proceeds of the trading. Miss Mackenzie, who was one of the defenders' saleswomen, deponed:—"(Q.) Was it the understanding that Post should pay for these goods when he had traded with them? (A.) I understand on the arrival of the ship, or else when the ship came back to an English port. Mr Walker said that at the time the slopchest was made up. He said it was to be paid for with the proceeds of the trading. It was the understanding that when Post had sold these goods and made his profit, he was to pay us with the proceeds of these goods." The important point about this evidence is that the credit was given upon the footing that the goods should leave Grangemouth in the pursuers' ship, and I regard that as a term of the contract. Though I decide the case on the assumption that the steward had no legal right to return any goods which he had been unable to sell, Mr Walker deponed that he would probably have been willing to take back any such goods. Obviously, Mr Walker, though not technically a partner in the adventure, had a direct interest in its success. He deponed that the shipmaster verbally guaranteed to see him paid, but that meant nothing more than that the master promised not to allow the steward to be paid off without seeing that the debt to the defenders had been provided for. Accordingly Mr Walker arranged with the master that he was to be informed of the date and port of the ship's arrival in England, in time to enable him to travel there and get payment of his money. Newport, Mon., was mentioned by the master as being probably the first home port. It will be noticed that the master knew that the steward was buying a slopchest, and that is a strong point in favour of Mr Walker, as he was entitled to trust that the master would restrain any smuggling propensities which the servant might develop in the course of the voyage, and that the master would also personally see that all

---

Nov. 19, 1913.

Cairns v. Harry Walker, Limited.

Lord Salvesen.

long voyages, and that in these transactions they treat the master as if he were the owner, and do not concern themselves with the question whether the owners consent to their master being a trader as well as a navigator. I think the clear implication of that is that the defenders are perfectly well aware that in the ordinary case the owners of a vessel would not sanction their master buying quantities of goods in this country for disposal at the ports to which the vessel may be destined, on the footing that these are to be carried on the ship free of freight for the master's benefit, still less would they sanction their master purchasing such goods if they could only be advantageously disposed of on the footing that they must be smuggled into a port where there is a duty upon them. If that applies to the master it applies with all the greater force to the steward of a vessel like this. The defenders in this case seem to have taken the legal requirements were complied with, so as to protect the goods from seizure and the vessel from being fined in a foreign port. On the other hand, if there is evidence to prove complicity between Mr Walker and the steward, one must assume that the latter informed the former of his reasons for believing that there was a fair prospect of success in smuggling the goods into the Argentine. For this purpose it was necessary either to deceive the master into believing that the bulk of the articles had been sold to the crew before the arrival of the ship in the Argentine, or alternatively, it was necessary to make the master an accomplice. In point of fact, out of the whole contents of the slopchest, the manifest declared only twenty waterproofs. It ought to have declared in addition the articles detailed in the list annexed to the receipt by the Custom House treasurer, and also a number of other articles which the steward sold to persons who came on to the ship at Buenos Ayres during the few days between the first visit of the Custom House officers and their second visit when the seizure was made. I do not express any opinion as to how it came about that the master signed a false manifest. He deponed that he was deceived by the steward, and as he had no opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses it would be unfair on my part to express any opinion to the contrary. In any case the procuring of a false manifest was a natural incident to the smuggling adventure initiated by the steward. If Mr Walker was a party to that adventure, the pursuers are, in my judgment, entitled by way of damages to the sum sued for, £89, 2s. 6d.

---

"Apart from some hearsay evidence of statements by the steward, which, of course, are inadmissible as evidence of complicity on the part of Mr Walker, there is no direct evidence that he knew that the steward intended to smuggle any of the contents of the slopchest, and one must start with a strong presumption in favour of his innocence. But this presumption may be, and in my opinion has been, completely rebutted by the inferences to be drawn from the character of the mercantile adventure, from Mr Walker's conduct when he was first charged with having smuggled, and from his testimony and demeanour in the witness-box. Of course he is not to be found guilty of using the pursuers' ship for the purpose of smuggling merely because he entered upon a speculation which, if it was innocent, was unbusinesslike and foolish or because he wrote an uncandid letter to the pursuers' solicitors. Business men do occasionally make foolish speculations, and innocent men have not always the moral courage to speak the truth. After seeing Mr Walker and hearing his explanations I am quite satisfied that he was not innocent, but that, on the contrary, he was aware of the steward's scheme, and that the sale would not have taken place unless he had known that the steward saw his way to open a profitable market for a large part of the goods by smuggling them into the Argentine. It is proved master into their confidence too, and I think for a very obvious reason. Unless the master sanctioned the carrying of these goods by the steward the whole adventure would be frustrated, because he would in all probability come to know of such goods having been brought on board and could interfere with the steward in disposing of them. Accordingly, as I read the evidence here, I think it is plain that the master from the first was conniving at the scheme of the steward to purchase the goods on credit from the defenders with the intention of smuggling them into a port and there disposing of them for his own benefit.

Now, perhaps, that by itself would not be sufficient to attach liability to the defenders, but I think that they throughout had an interest in this adventure. They could not have got the goods sold unless they had supplied them upon credit, because the steward was a person of no means.

---

that the steward could speak Spanish, and that he boasted after the ship had sailed that he knew the officials at Buenos Ayres and how to bribe them. According to Mr Walker's evidence he himself neither inquired, nor knew, nor cared when, where, or how the steward intended to dispose of the goods. He knew nothing as to the steamer's destination except that he understood that she was going to Las Palmas for orders after which she might be absent for an indefinite time sailing from port to port as the owners might arrange. He explained that if she was away for a long time the bulk of the goods might be sold to the crew; or again she might touch at a duty-free port, or if she touched at a tariff port the steward might get an advance from the master in order to pay the duties on any goods which he wanted to sell on shore, or he might arrange with a purchaser to pay the duties. All these were matters as to which Mr Walker felt no interest or even curiosity at the time when he handed over goods to the value of £100 to a complete stranger upon credit. In cross-examination, when confronted with the letter quoted below, Mr Walker had to admit that the steward had said that he had a friend out at the River Plate who could do with some ladies' mackintoshes if the steward could take them out. The letter which was addressed to pursuers' London agents in reply to their letter intimating the present claim was as follows:—'Yours to hand re "Cairngorm." The steward, as customary in deep water steamers, bought certain goods as a slopchest to supply crew on voyage and never mentioned the word smuggling. He also bought some mackintoshes which he said were for a friend of his in the Argentine. I have no arrangement or connection with it in any shape or form. It was purely a business transaction, same as we have had for over 20 years, and I will be sorry to hear that either the owners or anyone else should lose through him. I have a balance of account to get as he had not sufficient cash to pay all when here. I repudiate any liability.' This letter falsely suggests that apart from the mackintoshes the goods were all of the kind which it is customary to supply to a crew on voyage, and it falsely states that the transaction, so far as concerned the writer, was of an ordinary character. It also falsely suggests that the steward had made a payment to account of the slopchest. Mr Walker's explanations as to this letter were unsatisfactory. As my decision depends upon considerations of credibility, I do not refer to the evidence in greater detail.

"The defenders having been parties to the wrongful and illegal use of the pursuers' ship for carrying goods from Grangemouth to the Argentine, have infringed the pursuers' legal right and must pay damages. Even if no fine had been imposed on the ship the case would not have been one for merely nominal damages—('The Mediana,' [1900] A. C. 113). I have already stated that in my view the imposition of a fine upon the ship was a natural consequence of Mr Walker's wrongdoing. The defenders' counsel

Nov. 19, 1913.

Cairns v. Harry Walker, Limited.

Lord Salvesen.

He was also a person whom they so little trusted that they had in their mind from the first that they would have to go and meet him at the first port at which he arrived in this country, in order to make sure that he paid them the price of the goods with which they had supplied him. That does not indicate that they had any exuberant confidence in his honesty. But the goods would not have been supplied without their intervention, because apparently the steward could only get credit from them or from somebody who was prepared to take the same risk as they were. Their interest, therefore, in the transaction was this, that they were supplying goods on a large scale to a man of no means at cash prices—no doubt without giving him the discount that is generally given on such a large order for cash—and they expected that the steward, having realised the goods at prices largely beyond the sale price, would account to them for the price at which he had bought them. In all this the defenders seem to have taken no account of the persons who were mainly interested, to wit, the pursuers. They were putting goods on board the vessel of these pursuers, as I hold, in the knowledge that they were to be traded with by the steward, and in the knowledge that, in order that the trade might be successful, the goods would have to be smuggled into the port to which the vessel was destined. I find, therefore, no fault with the Lord Ordinary's view that the defender, Harry Walker, was accessory to the wrongful and illegal use of the pursuers' ship "Cairngorm" for carrying goods from Grangemouth to Argentina in a smuggling adventure. That is the inference that I think may be legitimately drawn from all the facts that are proved in this case; and the inference is not displaced by the denial of Mr Walker, because the Lord Ordinary thinks that reliance cannot be placed upon his evidence, and he gives reasons for the conclusion at which he arrives on that subject.

If that be the true inference to be drawn from the facts as a whole, then, I think, the legal result is clear. Mr Mackenzie Stuart had to admit that the steward would have been liable for the sum sued for, and argued that even assuming Mr Walker to have been privy to the steward's scheme, he committed no wrong, or at least no wrong inferring liability to compensate the pursuers for the imposition of the fine. He argued that there was no competent evidence of the existence of a tariff at Buenos Ayres or of the goods being dutiable. The alleged Custom House officers might have been briganda. Again, the ship was fined not for attempted smuggling, but in respect of the master's failure to declare the goods. It was the master's duty to enter all dutiable articles in the manifest of stores, and his failure, whether innocent or wilful, to perform this duty, was the proximate cause of the ship being fined. Counsel further argued that the natural method of smuggling goods into Buenos Ayres was not to conceal them, as was done by the steward, but to declare them in the manifest. The receptacle containing the goods would then be sealed by the Custom House officers, but a single officer might break this seal when stores were required for use. In return for a bribe the goods might be smuggled ashore without risk to the ship, though the actual smuggler might be punished if he was caught. I have mentioned these arguments in order to show that I have considered them, but I do not think it necessary to answer them.

---

"I give decree for the sum sued for, with interest, as part of the damages."

if the defenders were accessory to his illegal and unwarrantable actings, they incurred the same liability. They were not merely accessories in the ordinary sense, but without them the adventure could not have been embarked upon at all. It was the goods which they supplied at the steward's request which, not having been entered in the manifest, were discovered at Buenos Ayres, with the result that a fine was imposed upon the vessel; and I think the reason why the goods did not enter the manifest was that the captain from the first was a party to the whole scheme, no doubt having a promise of some consideration from the steward in the event of the adventure being successfully carried through. I cannot otherwise understand the evidence of the first mate, who was examined on commission, and who speaks in great detail to what passed at Buenos Ayres when the seizure was made. The captain did make a partial disclosure in the manifest of the goods. I think the fact that he made that partial disclosure, looking to the other evidence that we have from the defenders' witnesses—e.g. that he had been himself engaged in the selection of the goods—is extremely significant, as showing his complicity in the matter from the first.

That being the view which I take, and which the Lord Ordinary has also taken, of the evidence I think the defenders must bear the consequence. It is perfectly true that it is not illegal to sell goods to a customer who informs the seller at the time that he intends to smuggle them; but it is a totally different thing if the seller sends goods on board a vessel belonging to the employer of the person who has conveyed to him the information that he intends to smuggle them and to use the vessel for that purpose. The seller thereupon makes himself a party to the wrongful use of the pursuers' vessel; and, as the defenders acted in this way and continued to have an interest in the adventure up to the end, it is but just that they should suffer the consequences that through their means have been brought upon the pursuers.—[His Lordship then dealt with a question with which this report is not concerned, deciding that a deduction of £3, 12s. should be made from the Lord Ordinary's award for certain goods declared in the manifest and left on board the vessel.]

Accordingly I think we should adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against, with the small variation as to the sum to which I have referred.

Lord Dundas.—I entirely agree with the opinion which has been delivered, and do not desire to say anything more.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary has found in fact that the defender has been accessory to the wrongful and illegal use of the pursuers' ship "Cairngorm" for carrying goods from Grangemouth to the Argentine on a smuggling adventure; and he has held in law that in those circumstances the defenders are liable, jointly and severally, to the pursuers in damages. The interlocutor is traversed by the defenders both in fact and in law. They argued that the Lord Ordinary's finding in fact was not well founded, and that, even if it were well founded in fact, the Lord Ordinary's conclusion in law does not follow, because it would only be if there were a known form of joint-

Nov. 19, 1913.

Cairns v. Harry Walker, Limited.

Lord Guthrie.

adventure that the defenders would be liable. I think the reclaimers are wrong on both points.

The Lord Ordinary starts with the ordinary presumption in favour of the defender Harry Walker's innocence. He thinks, however, that this presumption is rebutted from (1) the character of the mercantile adventure; (2) Walker's conduct when first charged with smuggling; and (3) his testimony and demeanour in the witness-box. The Lord Ordinary says—"My decision depends upon considerations of credibility." I prefer to put my opinion on the lines suggested by Lord Salvesen in the course of the argument, namely, on what the Lord Ordinary calls "the character of the mercantile adventure," and the irresistible inference therefrom unless displaced by the reclaimers by their witnesses and documents. So far from the inference being rebutted, it seems to me to be confirmed by the oral evidence of the reclaimers and their witnesses and by the documents produced. As to the character of the adventure, it is noticeable that, although the reclaimers have been for years engaged in trade similar to the trade in question in this case, no evidence of merchants has been brought to show that this is an ordinary kind of trade. It is on the face of it a very curious kind of trade. The person to whom the goods are sold for trade purposes is the steward of the ship. So far as trade on board is concerned, that is natural. But so far as the trade on shore is concerned, it is clear that he is in an exceptionally favourable position for smuggling. He is a member of the crew who sticks to the ship throughout the length of the voyage, and he is a man who can go backwards and forwards to the shore in the way that an ordinary seaman cannot do. In this particular case the steward was a man who knew the Spanish language and he knew some of the officials at the port of Buenos Ayres. Then it appeared from the nature of the goods that a very large proportion of them would be sold not on board but on shore. The ship was known to be going to what I think we must assume were duty-charging ports. The captain of the ship was interested in the result, and therefore had a direct motive to omit the goods from the manifest and thus to evade the payment of duty. Mr Walker himself says:—"What I suppose is that the captain and the steward share their slopchest as a rule." Lastly, the sale was on credit and credit of a very curious kind. It is said that the voyage might have lasted more than a year, so that it came to this that the steward was getting goods at cash prices on a credit of possibly two years. If that is so, then Mr Walker had a very direct interest in the adventure, and I think the result of the whole case is to lead to an inference from the nature of the transaction which the defenders have failed to rebut. Perhaps a key to the whole case may be found in Mr Walker's view to the effect that "we look upon the captain as owner, and we never think of the owner." Clearly the captain's mandate could never bind the owners in a transaction of this kind.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I agree with the opinion which your Lordships have expressed. I came very early in the course of the speech of Mr Mackenzie Stuart to the conclusion that, unless something more was shown, it must be held that Captain M'Gub, the master of the vessel, and Mr Walker, had both come here not as candid witnesses, but, as I venture to say, untruthful witnesses. If we wish to be sure that there is no mistake about that—because sometimes witnesses express themselves badly and do not say exactly what they mean, although I do not think this is a case of that kind—I think it is only necessary to refer to two of the letters produced. In one, Captain M'Gub writes to his owners upon the footing that he never knew that the stuff was on board his vessel:—"It appears that a man by the name of Walker"—indicating that he wishes it to be understood that he knew nothing about him—"who has a tailor's shop in Grangemouth, let him have all this stuff." If anything is conclusively proved in this case it is that Captain M'Gub was himself a party to the stuff being got at Walker's and put on board his vessel. He writes:—"I thought all my papers were in order, little thinking I had such a rogue on board." I am afraid there was more than one rogue on board. Then as regards Messrs Walker we have this letter from H. Walker:—"The steward, as customary in deep-water steamers, bought certain goods as a slopchest to supply the crew on voyage,"—the slopchest consisting among other things of 84 shirts and 82 pieces of jewellery, the value coming to about £100, in the case of a crew which only numbered 24—"and never mentioned the word smuggling." I have no doubt that this is about the most true statement in the whole letter; it was quite unnecessary to mention the word in order that it might be understood what was being done. He goes on to say:—"It was purely a business transaction, same as we have had for over twenty years, and I will be sorry to hear that either the owners or anyone else should lose through him. I have a balance of a/c to get, as he had not sufficient cash to pay all when here." In point of fact there is not the slightest doubt that he never paid a penny for these goods before the voyage began, and the very fact that the defenders applied to the captain to let them know at what home port they would arrive is proof positive that no money had been paid for these goods. I need not go further into the matter. I agree with all that Lord Salvesen has said; but I wished to state my reasons for thinking we have not a truthful statement on the part of the defenders. That throws considerable light on the question whether the defenders were accessories to what was done. As to that I have no doubt, and I am of opinion that they are liable in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—" . . . Refuse the reclaiming note; vary the said interlocutor (of the Lord Ordinary) by finding that the damages found due amount only to £85, 10s. 6d; quoad ultra adhere to the said interlocutor, and decern. . . ."

BOYD, JAMESON, & YOUNG, W.S.—C. STRANG WATSON, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 9.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

ALEXANDER YOUNG ADAM (John Colville's Judicial Factor), Pursuer and Real Raiser.—Chree, K.C.—J. R. Christie.
MRS ANNIE BRUCE YOUNG ADAM OR NICOLL, Claimant (Reclaimer).—Chree, K.C.—J. R. Christie.
ROBERT ADAM, Claimant (Respondent).—Moncrieff, K.C.—A. R. Brown.
MRS ANNIE ADAM OR LISTER AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents). Moncrieff, K.C.—A. R. Brown.

Succession—Intestacy—Representation in moveables—Collation—Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855 (18 Vict. cap. 23), secs. 1 and 2.

The Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855, which introduces representation in moveable succession, enacts, sec. 1, that "where any person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been among his next of kin, shall have predeceased the intestate," his issue shall have right to the share of moveable estate which he would have taken; but contains this proviso, "provided always that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers and sisters descendants." Sec. 2 enacts, "where the person predeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate leaving heritable as well as moveable estate had he survived such intestate," his child, being the heir in heritage, shall be entitled, on collating the heritage, to claim for himself and any other issue of his parent such share of the moveable estate as would have fallen to his parent on collation.

Held that sec. 1 and sec. 2 must be read together, and accordingly that the proviso contained in sec. 1 also applied to sec. 2, and excluded a deceased cousin's son, who was the heir in heritage of an intestate, from collating the heritage and claiming from a surviving cousin, who was the sole next of kin, a share of the moveable succession.

Jamieson v. Walker, (1896) 23 R. 547, overruled.

Observed (per the Lord President) "(1) that the first and second sections of this statute are not to be regarded as separate and independent enactments, but are to be read together as comprehending the whole scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the Act of Parliament; (2) that the proviso in the first section is applicable to the whole scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the statute; and (3) that the object of the second section of the statute is to apply, in the case of mixed successions, the rule of representation which is applied by the first section to estates consisting of moveables alone."

1st DIVISION with three consulted Judges. Ld. Ormidale.

ON 16th November 1912 Alexander Young Adam, judicial factor on the estate of the late John Colville, brought an action of multiplepoinding and exoneration for the distribution of the estate under his administration. The estate, which consisted of heritable property to the approximate value of £800 and of moveables estimated to amount to between £8000 and £9000, formed the fund in medio.

The late John Colville died intestate on 13th October 1911 at the age of over eighty. He was an only child and was unmarried, and his sole next of kin was his only surviving first cousin, Mrs Annie Bruce Young Adam or Nicoll, while his heir-at-law was Robert Adam, the son of a predeceasing first cousin.

The history of the family was as follows:—The intestate's paternal grandfather, David Colville, had (besides other issue, all of whom predeceased the intestate without surviving issue) a son, John Colville senior, the intestate's father, and a daughter, Barbara, who married

James Adam. This Mrs Barbara Colville or Adam had six sons, who predeceased the intestate, and one daughter, who survived him, namely, the said Mrs Annie Bruce Young Adam or Nicoll, his sole next of kin. Mrs Adam's eldest son, David Adam, left a family of whom five survived the intestate—viz., one son, the said Robert Adam, the heir at law, and four daughters, Mrs Lister, Mrs Butchart, Mrs Stark, and Mrs M'Leish—and two sons who predeceased the intestate, one of whom, Charles, left a son and a daughter, William Robertson Adam and Agnes Milne Adam. Two of Mrs Adam's younger sons also left families who survived the intestate.

The following claims were considered in the action:—

I. For Mrs Annie Bruce Young Adam or Nicoll, who averred that she was sole next of kin to the intestate and claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole of his free moveable estate.

II. For Robert Adam, who averred, inter alia;—"The claimant is the eldest son of the said David Adam, power loom tenter, and is thus the heir in heritage of the intestate. The said David Adam died on 27th May 1909, survived by the claimant and also by four daughters and the son and daughter of a predeceasing son, all of whom survived the intestate. The said David Adam would have been the heir in heritage of the intestate had he survived. The claimant being his son and the heir in heritage of the intestate is entitled to claim along with his sisters and his nephew and niece the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by the said David Adam upon collation if he had survived the intestate"; and claimed—"To be ranked and preferred (1) to the whole heritable estate which belonged to the said John Colville at the date of his death, and (2) to one-sixth of the share of the moveable estate of the said deceased John Colville which might have been claimed by the said David Adam upon collation if he had survived the intestate."

III. For (1) Mrs Lister, (2) Mrs Butchart, (3) Mrs Stark, (4) Mrs M'Leish, and (5) William Robertson Adam and Agnes Milne Adam, who averred, inter alia;—"The said David Adam, if he had survived, would have been the heir in heritage of the said deceased John Colville the intestate. As before mentioned the said Robert Adam is the heir in heritage of the intestate, and he and the claimants are entitled among them to the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by the said David Adam on collation if he had survived the intestate"; and claimed—"To be ranked and preferred to the following proportions of the share of the moveable estate of the said deceased John Colville which might have been claimed by the said David Adam on collation if he had survived the intestate, namely, each of the said Mrs Annie Adam or Lister, Mrs Elizabeth Adam or Butchart, Mrs Mary Adam or Stark, and Mrs Jessie Adam or M'Leish, to one-sixth thereof, and each of the said William Robertson Adam and Agnes Milne Adam to one-twelfth thereof."

On 24th June 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale), without delivering an opinion, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the claimant Mrs Annie Bruce Adam or Nicoll is the daughter of a sister of the father of the deceased John Colville, who died intestate on 13th October 1911, and that she was at the date of his death the sole surviving next of kin of the said John Colville: Finds that the claimant Robert Adam is the eldest son, and that the claimants Mrs Annie Adam or Lister, Mrs Elizabeth Adam or Butchart, Mrs Mary

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

Adam or Stark, and Mrs Jessie Adam or M'Leish are children, and the claimants William Robertson Adam and Agnes Milne Adam are grandchildren, all of the late David Adam, who was the son of a sister of the father of the said John Colville, and predeceased the said John Colville, and who would, had he survived the said John Colville, have been his heir-at-law and one of his next of kin along with the claimant Mrs Annie Bruce Adam or Nicoll: Finds that the claimant Robert Adam is the heir in heritage of the deceased John Colville the intestate, and is entitled as such to be ranked and preferred in terms of the first branch of his claim, No. 24 of process: Finds also that the said Robert Adam is entitled to participate in the moveable estate of the intestate, and to be ranked and preferred in terms of the second branch of his said claim, No. 24 of process: Finds that the claimants Mrs Annie Adam or Lister, Mrs Elizabeth Adam or Butchart, Mrs Mary Adam or Stark, and Mrs Jessie Adam or M'Leish, and William Robertson Adam and Agnes Milne Adam are also entitled to participate in the moveable estate of the said intestate, and to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim, No. 25 of process: Finds that the claimant Mrs Annie Bruce Adam or Nicoll is entitled, as next of kin foresaid, to receive and to be ranked and preferred upon the balance of the fund in medio; and with those findings appoints the cause to be enrolled for further procedure: Grants leave to reclaim."

Mrs Nicoll reclaimed against this interlocutor, and the case was first heard before the First Division on 31st October 1913, when it was ordered to be heard before a Court of seven Judges.

The case was accordingly reheard on 14th November 1913 before a Court consisting of the Lord President, Lord Johnston, Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, Lord Mackenzie, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Skerrington.

Argued for the reclaimer;—At common law and up to the date of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855,* there was no represen-

---

* The Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 23), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "In all cases of intestate moveable succession in Scotland accruing after the passing of this Act, where any person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been among his next of kin, shall have predeceased such intestate, the lawful child or children of such person so predeceasing shall come in the place of such person, and the issue of any such child or children, or of any descendant of such child or children, who may in like manner have predeceased the intestate, shall come in the place of his or their parent predeceasing, and shall respectively have right to the share of the moveable estate of the intestate to which the parent of such child or children or of such issue, if he had survived the intestate, would have been entitled; provided always that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers and sisters descendants. . . ."

Sec. 2. "Where the person predeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate leaving heritable as well as moveable estate had he survived such intestate, his child, being the heir in heritage of such intestate, shall be entitled to collate the heritage to the effect of claiming for himself alone, if there be no other issue of the predeceaser, or for himself and the other issue of the predeceaser, if there be such other issue, the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by the predeceaser upon collation if he had survived the intestate; and daughters of the predeceaser, being heirs-portioners of the intestate, shall be entitled to collate to the like effect; and where, in the case aforesaid, the heir shall tation in moveables in intestate succession; the rule was equal division among the surviving next of kin, the nearer in degree excluding the more remote. The heir took no share in the moveable succession, unless he happened also to be one of the next of kin. In that case he might avail himself of the privilege of collation, and remove his disability to share in the moveable succession by sharing the heritage with the other next of kin. But the privilege was open to the heir only when he was also one of the next of kin. This general rule of law was established by decision,[1] although a certain modification of it was suggested by Erskine.[2] The effect of section 1 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act was to allow representation in moveables amongst a certain limited class, i.e., persons not more remote than brothers' or sisters' descendants.[3] So far, therefore, as the provisions of this section were concerned there was no authority for the admission of representation among the class claiming in this case, viz., the issue of first cousins. But it was argued that the wider class was admitted when circumstances arose for the application of section 2. Section 2 did not admit of that construction.[4] Its opening words confined its application to a case where "the person predeceasing" would have been heir in heritage. To discover who "the person" was it was necessary to refer to section 1, and from section 1 it was clear that "the person" was one of the limited class. The respondents sought to construe the section as if it contained the words "a person" or "any person" predeceasing; but it was neither necessary nor admissible to construe the section otherwise than according to its terms, and these terms clearly implied that the two sections must be read together. The respondents' argument involved the inclusion of the family of David in the moveable succession, and the exclusion of the families of his brothers; an absurd result which could never have been intended by the Legislature. The case of Jamieson v. Walker,[5] on which the respondents relied, was wrongly decided and should be overruled. No support for that decision was to be found in Innes v. Coghill,[6] nor had it been followed except in the Outer House.[7]

Argued for the respondents;—The provisions of the first and second sections of the Act were separate and distinct, both according to the scheme of the sections and as regards the rights which they respectively conferred or dealt with, and each should be read alone and independently of the other. Section 1 introduced into moveable succession a new rule of statutory representation, by admitting the issue of predeceasing next of kin, who were excluded at common law. The object of section 2 was not primarily to deal with representation.

---

not collate, his brothers and sisters, and their descendants in their place, shall have right to a share of the moveable estate equal in amount to the excess in value over the value of the heritage of such share of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, as their predeceasing parent had he survived the intestate would have taken on collation."

[1] M'Caw v. M'Caw, (1787) M. 2383; Anstruther v. Anstruther, (1836) 14 S. 272, at p. 282.

[2] Inst. iii. 9, 3.

[3] Ormiston v. Broad, (1862) 1 Macph. 10; Turner and Others, (1869) 8 Macph. 222.

[4] M'Laren on Wills, (3rd ed.) vol. i., pp. 120 and 152.

[5] (1896) 23 R. 547.

[6] (1897) 25 R. 23.

[7] Robertson v. Robertson, (1907) 15 S. L. T. 249.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

It dealt with collation and with the rights of the heir-at-law in a mixed succession. It selected a beneficiary, qualified by descent and by the possession of the character of heir-at-law, and conferred on him, in unambiguous words, the right to collate the heritage to the effect of admitting himself and his brothers and sisters to the limited share in the moveable succession which would have been open to the ancestor through whom he derived his right. There was nothing anomalous in thus favouring the heir, who had always been a favoured person in Scots law. The right to collate, even when he was not one of the next of kin, had been attributed to him by Erskine.[1] If this view of the statute and its construction was sound, then the respondents' case was clear. This view was the ground of the decision in Jamieson v. Walker,[2] which was rightly decided and should be followed. But—assuming that section 2 could not be construed by itself, and that reference must be made to section 1 for a definition of the phrase "the person predeceasing"—that person was sufficiently identified as one who, had he survived the intestate, would have combined the qualifications of being (a) heir-at-law, and (b) one of the next of kin, as David Adam did here. To get a meaning for these words it was quite unnecessary to drag in the further qualification of the proviso limiting the class within which representation might take place in moveable succession. That class had in fact been extended, when a mixed succession and the question of collation fell to be dealt with, by the words of section 2.

At advising on 21st November 1913,—

Lord President.—We have had the advantage of a singularly able argument from both sides of the bar in this case, but I do not suppose that any of your Lordships at any time entertained any doubt as to what our ultimate judgment should be. But inasmuch as we were asked, and are about, to overrule a decision pronounced by the other Division of the Court some eighteen years ago, it was deemed necessary to summon seven Judges to the consideration of the case. The question relates to the scope and meaning of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act of 1855. The rival views presented of that statute are these: One side maintains that, in the case of all estates where you are dealing with collaterals, the scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the statute is confined exclusively to brothers and sisters of the intestate and their descendants. The other side maintains that, while that may be so where you are dealing with an estate consisting exclusively of moveables, it is otherwise where there is a mixed succession, and that in the latter case the heir-at-law, howsoever remote, is entitled, on condition of collating the heritage, to participate along with his brothers and sisters, if he has any, in the moveable succession.

The case before us relates to a mixed succession, heritable estate of the value of some £800 and moveable estate of the value of between £8000 and £9000. The intestate, an only child, died unmarried survived by one cousin, his next of kin, a Mrs Nicoll, who claims the whole moveable succession. The heir-at-law is to be found in the family of a deceased cousin, and the heir-at-law has four sisters. He claims, on collating the

[1] Inst. iii. 9, 3.

[2] 23 R. 547.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

Ld. President.

heritage, to participate along with his four sisters in the moveable succession. His claim rests exclusively upon the statute, because it is conceded that not being one of the next of kin he would not be entitled, by the common law of Scotland, on collating the heritage to participate in the moveable succession. There are two families of deceased cousins who make no claim. It is conceded that the statute does not admit the latter families to a right to participate in the moveable succession, and that it is only the family which has the good fortune to number among its members the heir-at-law which enjoys this privilege. That would be a fantastic result to which we should be led. If we were shut up by the plain words of the statute to that conclusion, I presume we would give effect to it. But I am of opinion that we are not.

The whole controversy turns upon the meaning to be attached to the expression in the opening words of the second section of the Act, "the person predeceasing." In my judgment "the person predeceasing" means exactly what it says and does not mean "any person predeceasing." When the statute means "any person predeceasing" it says so, and these very words will be found at the opening of the third section. If, then, we are to interpret these words "the person predeceasing" as meaning what they say, we must look for that person in the first section of the Act. We there find "the person predeceasing" either amongst the ascendants or the descendants or the brothers and sisters of the intestate or the descendants of brothers and sisters of the intestate. But the father of the family in which the heir-at-law in the present case is a member is not to be found in any one of these categories; and, therefore, the claim of that family fails.

I have only now stated shortly what might, in other language, be expressed in three propositions:—(First) that the first and second sections of this statute are not to be regarded as separate and independent enactments, but are to be read together as comprehending the whole scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the Act of Parliament; (Second) that the proviso in the first section is applicable to the whole scheme of representation in moveables introduced by the statute; and (third) that the object of the second section of the statute is to apply, in the case of mixed successions, the rule of representation which is applied by the first section to estates consisting of moveables alone.

These propositions I regard as sound in law. All of them were disregarded in the judgment of the Second Division in the case of Jamieson v. Walker.[1] That decision must now be regarded as overruled; and I move your Lordships, therefore, to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which I may say in passing he could not do otherwise than pronounce, to rank and prefer Mrs Nicoll to the whole of the moveable estate, to rank and prefer the heir-at-law to the heritable estate, and deny his claim and the claims of his sisters to participate in any part of the moveable succession.

Lord Dundas.—I am of the same opinion. This action of multiple-

[1] 23 R. 547.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

Lord Dundas.

poinding raises a question of law under the Intestate Moveable Succession (Scotland) Act, 1855. Mr John Colville, the intestate, died on 13th October 1911, leaving heritable estate to the value of about £800, and free moveable estate amounting to between £8000 and £9000. At the date of his death he left no brothers or sisters, or descendants of brothers or sisters; and his sole next of kin was the claimant, Mrs Nicoll, his cousin, who was the only then surviving child of Mrs Barbara Adam, a sister of his father. Mrs Nicoll's brother, David Adam, predeceased the intestate, leaving issue who survived the intestate, viz., the claimants Mrs Lister, Mrs Butchart, Mrs Stark, Mrs M'Leish, and Robert Adam; and Charles Adam, a son of David, predeceased the intestate, but left issue, a son and a daughter, who are also claimants. Mrs Nicoll claims to be ranked and preferred to the whole moveable estate of the intestate, as being his sole next of kin. Robert Adam is the intestate's heir-at-law, and is entitled, as such, to the heritage. But he claims, in respect that his father would, if he had survived the intestate, have been his heir-at-law, to be entitled, upon collating the heritage, to participate, along with his sisters and his nephew and niece, in the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by his father David (upon collation), if he had survived the intestate. The other claimants, upon a similar basis, claim to participate in the share of the moveable estate referred to. The parties are agreed that the case is ruled by that of Jamieson v. Walker.[1] The Lord Ordinary, in deference to the authority of that decision, and without expressing any opinion of his own, gave effect to the claims of Robert Adam and of his sisters and his nephew and niece. The present Court of seven judges has been convened to reconsider the judgment of the Second Division in Jamieson v. Walker.[1] I am of opinion that that case was wrongly decided. I am unable to see that Robert Adam, who is the intestate's heir-at-law, but not one of the next of kin nor a descendant of a brother or sister of the intestate, has any right to collate, to the effect of taking for himself or for his sisters or his nephew and niece the share of the moveable estate which his father would have taken if he had survived the intestate.

At common law, before the passing of the Act of 1855, representation in heritage was fully recognised, without limit; but there was no representation in moveables. The heir, if he was himself one of the next of kin, was entitled to claim his share of the moveable estate with the other next of kin, on condition of collating the heritage; but, if he was not one of the next of kin, he had no right of collation. This last proposition seems to have been doubted by Mr Erskine[2]; but the law was laid down in the sense I have indicated in M'Caw,[3] which has always been followed, e.g., Anstruther.[4] But Mr Moncrieff for the respondents contended, in the course of an able argument, that the Act of 1855, section 2, had in effect made law by statute that which Mr Erskine thought might be, or ought to be, common law in regard to collation. I observe that Mr Erskine's doctrine is carefully restricted to a case where the heir, as well

[1] 23 R. 547.

[2] Inst. iii. 9, 3.

[3] M. 2383.

[4] 14 S. 272, 282.

as the next of kin, is a descendant of the intestate. So far I agree with Mr Moncrieff that section 2 has restored Mr Erskine's doctrine; and indeed it goes somewhat further, for it provides that an heir descended from a brother or sister of the intestate may collate with those whom the statute designates as the intestate's heirs in mobilibus. But if Mr Moncrieff's clients are to succeed, a much greater change in the common law must have been effected than the restoration of Mr Erskine's doctrine, even with the extension I have indicated. In order to succeed they must, I apprehend, show that, under the statute, an heir, not related to the intestate within the degree specified in the first section, may nevertheless, under the second section, claim to share in the moveable estate on condition of collation. I am unable so to read the Act. As matter of construction, I think the plain meaning of its words negatives the respondents' argument.

The first section of the statute introduced representation in moveables, but only within narrow and well-defined limits. It expressly provides that "in all cases of intestate moveable succession in Scotland accruing after the passing of this Act, where any person who, had he survived the intestate, would have been among his next of kin shall have predeceased the intestate, the lawful child or children of such person so predeceasing shall come in place of such person," and so forth; but the section ends with the important and quite unqualified words, "provided always that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers and sisters descendants." The second section by its initial phrase makes it, to my mind, clear that it is intended to follow as a direct sequence of section 1, and cannot be read as a substantive provision independent of it. The opening words are, "Where the person predeceasing," &c. I think the word "the" is precisely equivalent to "such"; and so one is taken back to section 1, and to its proviso as regards the extent and degree to which representation in moveables is intended to be introduced by the Act. I need not quote the words of the second section. It is, to my mind, clear that they must all be read subject to the scope of section 1 and its proviso. If this be so, it seems to follow that Robert Adam, the heir-at-law, not being within the class of persons entitled to share in the moveable estate, has no right of collation either for himself or for the benefit of his sisters or his nephew and niece.[1]

For these reasons I think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, pronounced by him solely upon the authority of Jamieson v. Walker,[2] ought to be recalled, and that Mrs Nicoll should be ranked and preferred to the whole moveable estate of the intestate, Robert Adam being found entitled to the heritage.

Lord Johnston.—We are called upon in this case to reconsider the judgment of the other Division pronounced in 1896 in the case of Jamieson v. Walker,[2] regarding the application of the second section of the Moveable Succession Act, 1855. I think that that case was wrongly

[1] See M'Laren on Wills and Succession, (3rd ed.) vol. i., p. 152, sec. 299.
[2] 23 R. 547.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

Ld. Johnston.

decided, and mainly by reason of the fallacy which is expressed in the leading judgment thus:—Sections 1 and 2 of the Act "are independent of each other. They deal with separate matters, and are intended to effect changes in our law quite distinct from one another." I think that the opposite is the sound view and leads to an opposite conclusion. These sections are dependent on one another. They deal, indeed, in one sense with different matters, but so that the latter section is the complement of the former, and is intended to complete and perfect the change in our law effected by it.

The Act in its entire purview was remedial, its object being to alter certain anomalies and defects in the Scots law of intestate succession. As pointed out by Lord President Inglis in Turner's case[1] the particular purpose of the first section of the Act was "to take away the hardship which arose when, of several persons who would have been all equally next of kin of an intestate, one or more had predeceased the intestate, leaving children." By the common law the children of the particular predeceaser would have been excluded from all share in the moveable succession of the intestate, though their parent, had he survived, would have taken an equal share with the other next of kin, and though they being left orphans are more likely to be the most necessitous. To remedy this hardship the statute introduced representation in moveable succession. But it introduced it with the limitations, first, that of the predecessor it must be possible to predicate that had he lived he would have been among the actual next of kin—Turner's case[1]; and second, that representation among collaterals shall be confined to the descendants of brothers and sisters of the intestate. Thus in the present case, the next of kin of the intestate being one cousin out of a family of seven, the other six having predeceased the intestate, the statute did not go the length of bringing in the children of those of the six who left issue—and in particular the children of the predeceaser with whom we are concerned—to share by reason of the statutory introduction of representation in moveables, because they are outside the category of those to whom the benefit of representation is accorded by the statute.[2]

But then how was the common law of collation to be reconciled with this limited statutory recognition of representation? Was section 2 of the Act added as a complement of section 1 to avoid a new or further anomaly, which might—I think, would—have been created by that section had it stood alone, or as an entirely separate and detached provision, not remedial of any hardship which can be suggested, or of any existing defect in the law of succession, but occasioning what indeed would have called for remedy? Adapting the expression of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in Ormiston's case[2]—If in answering this question "we incline to that which shall give the statute consistency and effect, we are at once led to the conclusion" that section 2 was added for the former purpose.

The second section commences with the words—"Where the person predeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate." If this is treated as an independent provision, then it must apply to every case,

[1] 8 Macph. 222.

[2] Ormiston v. Broad, 1 Macph. 10.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

Ld. Johnston.

without limitation, of the predecease of a person who would have been heir in heritage of an intestate. I do not think that I should detain the Court by exposing the anomalies which would be created, and the confusion which would result from the combination of the limited introduction of representation of predeceasing next of kin by section 1 with the assumed universal introduction of representative collation by section 2. But the statute does not say "where a person predeceasing," but "where the person predeceasing," and the definite article is, I think, used with meaning and intent. It indicates that, to find the person referred to, the reader is sent back to something preceding, viz., to section 1. When he turns to that section he finds that "the predeceaser" is not any predeceaser, but a predeceaser of a class limited by two conditions. If the person who has predeceased—and who would, had he survived, have been heir in heritage of an intestate—would have been (1) among his next of kin, and (2) within the limited class of collaterals specified in the proviso of section 1, then it at once becomes clear that, to complete the remeid of the common law, not only must his issue be given the benefit of representation in moveables, but provision must be made for reconciling the law of collation with this introduction of limited representation in the law of moveable succession. And this, and this only, is provided for by section 2, and it is provided for in a manner which exactly meets the case. It must be kept in mind that no heir at law who is not one of the next of kin can collate at common law.[1] If then by representation he acquires right to share in the moveables, and as a condition of taking that share is not required to collate, injustice to others would be done. To remedy that possible result of section 1 section 2 was required. But to that purpose section 2 is, I think, limited. If the predeceaser does not come within the above category there is no suggestion of any reason for the provision of section 2 regarded as an independent provision. And I am satisfied that it was not intended to give a right to collate, and to share in the benefit of collation (as would be the result of the judgment in Jamieson's case[2]), to a stirps which otherwise would have no right at common law as next of kin, and no right by statute as representing next of kin, to any share in the moveable succession at all.

The Lord Ordinary had no alternative but to follow the precedent in Jamieson's case.[2] But for the above reasons I think that that decision was unsound, and that the interlocutor reclaimed against must therefore be recalled.

Lord Salvesen.—The difficulty in this case, and I think it is a real difficulty, arises from the imperfect way in which the statute is expressed. If sections 1 and 2 are to be read as dealing with separate matters, then I think the reasoning of Lord Trayner in Jamieson v. Walker[2] cannot be impugned. It would have been very easy for the draughtsman of the Act to have commenced the second section by such words as "Subject to the provisions of the preceding section" or in some other way to have correlated it to the preceding section; and probably it would have been

[1] M'Caw, M. 2383. [2] 23 R. 547.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

Lord Salvesen.

a still better way of making the meaning of the Legislature clear if the second section had simply been made an additional proviso of the first.

According to the mode in which the statute is expressed I think the prima facie view is that section 2 deals with a different set of circumstances from those dealt with in section 1; but to read it in that way is to make the two sections inconsistent with each other; and, therefore, I agree with your Lordship in the chair that we must read them together. So reading them, I am of opinion that the result at which the Second Division arrived cannot be sustained.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In my opinion section 2 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, is not independent of section 1, but must be read along with it. Section 1 introduced the doctrine of representation as regards all cases of intestate moveable succession. The proviso at the end of the section is expressed in very plain terms and provides that no representation shall be admitted among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' descendants. Accordingly, in the present case, the families of John and William, deceased brothers of Mrs Nicoll, cannot make any claim to share in the moveable succession along with her. She is the first cousin of the intestate and his sole next of kin. The respondents are the family of David, another deceased brother of Mrs Nicoll. It is a fortuitous circumstance that the intestate left some heritable property. The effect, however, of this, according to the respondents' construction of section 2, is that, as the heir in heritage, Robert, is a son of David, this gives him, or failing him the other members of David's family, a right to a share of the moveables. Robert is not one of the next of kin, nor one who has a statutory right of representation under section 1. It is said he has an independent right as heir to collate and claim for himself and his brothers and sisters a share of the moveable estate, and that, if he does not collate, his brothers and sisters may come in and claim in their own right. The result of this is startling, for it makes the right of these descendants to claim a share of the moveables along with the next of kin depend entirely upon whether there is any heritage, however trifling in amount. If there is, then they, though of the same degree as their cousins who are entirely cut out, are to be held entitled to a share of the moveables, otherwise they are not. This does not appear to me a reasonable construction to put upon section 2. It is, in my opinion, an enactment, consequent upon section 1, for the purpose of obviating any questions as to the extent of the rights of an heir in heritage, who, also in virtue of the provisions of section 1, was made one of the heirs in mobilibus of the intestate. If and when the heir in heritage is clothed with the character of one of the next of kin as defined by section 1, then section 2 will operate but not otherwise. The provisions of section 1 including the proviso must, in my opinion, be read into section 2.

If sections 1 and 2 are read together then I think the argument of the respondents is untenable. I am, accordingly, unable to agree with the judgment in Jamieson v. Walker[1] upon which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded.

[1] 23 R. 547.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Colville's Judicial Factor v. Nicoll.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with your Lordships.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor except in so far as it finds the various claimants entitled to be ranked and preferred on the moveable estate of the deceased: Recall said findings, and in lieu thereof find that the said Mrs Annie Bruce Adam or Nicoll is entitled, as sole next of kin of the deceased, to be ranked and preferred in terms of her claim: Remit to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure, and decern."

MORTON, SMART, MACDONALD, & PROSSER, W.S.—GORDON, FALCONER, & FAIRWEATHER, W.S.—Agents.

No. 10.

Oct. 29, 1913.

The Lamson Paragon Supply Co., Limited, v. MacPhail.

THE LAMSON PARAGON SUPPLY COMPANY, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—Lippe.
CAMPBELL D. MACPHAIL, Defender (Reclaimer).—Macgregor—Macquisten.

Contract—Pactum illicitum—Agreement to refrain from prosecution.

In an action brought by a firm against a former employee to recover a sum which he was alleged to have embezzled, the pursuers founded on a promissory-note granted by him to them for this sum, and on a letter from him admitting that he had used the firm's money and acknowledging their kindness in not prosecuting him. The defender averred that the pursuers had induced him to sign these documents by threatening that otherwise they would prosecute him; and pleaded that this was a pactum illicitum, and, accordingly, that the documents could not be founded on against him.

Held that, even if an agreement to refrain from prosecuting the defender would have been unlawful, no such agreement had been relevantly averred; and defences repelled.

Opinions reserved as to whether such an agreement would be a pactum illicitum.

2D DIVISION. Lord Hunter.

ON 24th January 1912 the Lamson Paragon Supply Company, Limited, brought an action against Campbell D. MacPhail, commercial traveller, Glasgow, concluding for payment of the sum of £110, 8s. 8d.

The pursuers averred that the defender was in their employment as a commercial traveller for a number of years prior to 1908; that in that year he was sent to the West Indies to collect accounts due to the pursuers from certain customers, and that, without authority, he retained and used for his own purposes the money so collected and failed to pay it to the pursuers.* (Cond. 2) "On account of this the pursuers proposed, in November 1908, to discharge the defender from their employment, but, on his granting to the managing director of the pursuers a letter, acknowledging that he had so acted, and had so appropriated to his own uses money belonging to the pursuers to the extent foresaid, and on his agreeing to make repayment thereof,

* The agreement under which the defender was employed to travel in the West Indies provided that his remuneration should be "by way of commission entirely"; and that the pursuers should advance to him £50 towards his expenses, this sum to be debited against his commission account.

Oct. 29, 1913.

The Lamson Paragon Supply Co., Limited, v. MacPhail.

the pursuers retained him in their employment. The letter above referred to, which will be produced at the calling hereof, is in the following terms:—

'Avoca, Silverdale Avenue,
'Westcliff-on-Sea, Essex, 19th November 1908.

'Robert Clark, Esq.,
'Messrs The Lamson Paragon Supply Co., Ltd.,
'Canning Town, London, E.

'Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the fact that I have used the Company's money in my recent journey to the West Indies to the extent of £110, 8s. 8d., having collected the accounts enumerated hereunder on behalf of the Company. [Here followed a note of the accounts collected.] I beg to assure you that the foregoing names and amounts cover all the accounts collected, and that I have not pledged the Company's credit in any way; nor personally have I borrowed any sum or sums from customers or others. I now appreciate the seriousness of my conduct in collecting this money and using it for my own purposes without your authority; and I beg to express to the directors my gratitude for their kindness in not prosecuting me. I agree to pay back the sum owing as quickly as possible out of my commission account, and you are at liberty to so apply commissions to such extent as you consider proper.—Yours faithfully, C. D. MacPhail.'" (Cond. 3) "On the day following that on which the said letter was granted, namely, on 20th November 1908, the defender further granted to the pursuers a document of debt in the following terms, namely, 'London, 20th November 1908.—I promise to pay on demand to The Lamson Paragon Supply Company, Limited, or order, the sum of one hundred and ten pounds eight shillings and eightpence value received. C. D. MacPhail, Avoca, Silverdale Avenue, Westcliff-on-Sea.'"

In answer to these averments the defender admitted that he had signed the letter and promissory-note, and explained that his necessary expenses on his journey to the West Indies exceeded, by the sum of £112, 10s., the allowance made to him for expenses by the pursuers. "When defender returned after a five months' journey he advised pursuers of the extra expense incurred by him on pursuers' behalf, and explained that no sum was due by him to them. The pursuers, however, without making any inquiries, refused to accept his explanations and declined to admit liability for his expenses, and charged the defender with embezzlement, and threatened him with a criminal prosecution and imprisonment, unless he would (first) sign an agreement to remain in their service, and in the event of his leaving their service not to engage in the service of other firms in Great Britain for three years thereafter; (second) an acknowledgment that he had embezzled; and (third) a promissory-note for £110, 8s. 8d. sterling. The defender protested, but the pursuers repeated their threats of a criminal prosecution and imprisonment, and induced the defender through fear thereof to sign (1) a memorandum of agreement, dated 20th November 1908, a copy of which is produced; (2) the alleged letter of 19th November 1908; and (3) the alleged promissory-note. The defender was terrorised by the threat of a criminal prosecution and imprisonment, and his signature to the said documents was extorted from him by fear, and accordingly said documents fall to be reduced ope exceptionis. Further, the alleged promissory-note is unstamped, and cannot be founded on. No consideration was given by the pursuers for said documents, but the pursuers hoped to obtain the advantage of retaining him permanently in their service by endeavouring to exclude him, if he should leave their employment, from following the only occupation with which he was acquainted." The agreement of 20th November 1908 provided, inter alia, that the pursuers should employ the defender as traveller in London for the term of one year from the date of the agreement at a weekly salary and commission on the orders obtained; and bound the defender not to solicit orders from customers of the pursuers for goods of the kind manufactured or sold by them, and not to engage, alone or in partnership, in any business similar to that carried on by the pursuers, for the term of three years after he should have left the pursuers' employment.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defences being irrelevant, should be repelled.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(6) The said alleged documents of debt having been granted for an illegal consideration, or without any consideration, the defender is not liable in respect of any liability alleged to be constituted thereby.

On 18th October 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, decerned against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

---

* "OPINION.—[After summarising the pursuers' averments and dealing with certain pleas by the defender with which this report is not concerned]—The other way the case was presented was this. Mr Jamieson said, assume that my client embezzled the money, this letter is an agreement to compound a felony, and you cannot, therefore, sue upon it, because the agreement is in the nature of a pactum illicitum. In the course of his argument he cited certain English cases. Mr Lippe referred me to three cases which I think have a bearing upon this matter. In the first place there is a case of Ferrier v. Mackenzie, 1 F. 597, where in somewhat similar circumstances a plea that an agreement was a pactum illicitum was repelled and certain remarks were made with reference to what amounts to pactum illicitum. But in the English cases, namely, Ward v. Lloyd, 7 Scott, N. R. 499, and Flower v. Sadler, (1882) 10 Q. B. D. 572, I find statements made by the English Judges as to the circumstances in which a plea founded upon such an alleged pactum illicitum may be sustained, and applying what was said by the Judges there, I think it is perfectly clear that there is no relevant averment of such an agreement here.

"In the case of Flower Lord Coleridge said this:—'A creditor may use strong expressions and even threats; and it was held in Ward v. Lloyd that strong language is not conclusive evidence of an agreement to compound a felony or to stifle a prosecution.' He also referred to a statement made by Tindal, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in a previous case (Keir v. Leeman, (1846) 9 Q. B. 371) where he said: 'We have no doubt that, in all offences which involve damages to an injured party for which he may maintain an action, it is competent for him, notwithstanding they are also of a public nature, to compromise or settle his private damage in any way he may think fit.' Looking to the pleadings of the defender, I do not think that there is any averment to the effect that there was an agreement not to prosecute. The letter itself does not bear to be an agreement not to prosecute, and the averments amount merely to this, that there was a threat to prosecute, and a repetition of the same threat. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the averments of the defender are irrelevant, and that the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, with expenses."

Oct. 29, 1913.

The Lamson Paragon Supply Co., Limited, v. MacPhail.

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 28th and 29th October 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The averments in the defences set forth an agreement between the reclaimer and the respondents under which the latter agreed not to prosecute the reclaimer in consideration, inter alia, of his signing the documents in question. Such an agreement was void under both Scots[1] and English law.[2] Even if the money sued for were actually due to the respondents, which was disputed, this would not save the transaction.[3] It was not necessary to show that there was an express undertaking to refrain from prosecuting; it was enough if it appeared that this was in reality part of the arrangement although it was not explicitly stated.[4]

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

LORD DUNDAS.—It is not necessary to call upon the counsel for the pursuers, for we are all of one mind in thinking that the interlocutor reclaimed against is right. For my own part, the grounds of the Lord Ordinary's judgment are so fully and clearly set out in his opinion that I am not disposed to add much to what he has said. [His Lordship then proceeded to deal with certain pleas of the defender with which this report is not concerned.]

There remains the point which was most argued before us, namely, that the letter amounts really to an agreement to compound a felony, is a pactum illicitum, and that the pursuers cannot sue upon it. On that point I do not think any consideration has been adduced or any authority cited that is not covered by what the Lord Ordinary has said. It is sufficient to say that I look in vain in this record for an averment that there was an agreement or bargain not to prosecute. I think the Lord Ordinary is quite right when he says: "Looking to the pleadings of the defender, I do not think that there is any averment to the effect that there was an agreement not to prosecute. The letter itself does not bear to be an agreement not to prosecute, and the averments amount merely to this, that there was a threat to prosecute and a repetition of the same threat." If that is so, and I think it is so, there is no need to hazard any opinion as to what would have been the position if an averment had been made which is not made; and I shall reserve my opinion on that matter until the question requires to be decided.

There is one point of a separate nature on a matter of pleading. I am surprised to notice that the pursuers' first plea in law in this record is that the defences are irrelevant. Now that is bad pleading. We sometimes see it in records from the Sheriff Court, but I confess I am surprised to

---

[1] Bell's Prin., (10th ed.) sec. 41; Ferrier v. Mackenzie, (1899) 1 F. 597; Kennedy v. Cameron, (1823) 2 S. 192.

[2] Ward v. Lloyd, (1843) 7 Scott's New Reports Common Pleas, 499; Williams v. Bailey, (1866) L. R., 1 H. L. 200, per Lord Westbury, at p. 220, Lord Chelmsford, at p. 216; Flower v. Sadler, (1882) 9 Q. B. D. 83, 10 Q. B. D. 572.

[3] Ferrier v. Mackenzie, 1 F. 597, per Lord Justice-Clerk Macdonald, at p. 599, Lord Young, at p. 600.

[4] Keir v. Leeman (1846) 9 Q. B. 371.

see it in a record presumably drawn by learned counsel. The plea of relevancy may properly be put in the forefront by a defender, but it surely cannot, in logic or in substance, form the first plea or the principal ground of judgment for a pursuer. He must state and plead a prima facie case, apart from anything that is to be said against it. I merely call attention to this, because I think it is bad pleading, and hope it will not become common.

I move your Lordships that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor be adhered to.

Lord Salvesen.—I am of the same opinion. The claim in this action is for a sum of £110, 8s. 8d., with interest from the date of citation. This claim is vouched by an acknowledgment admitted to be under the hand of the defender, and unless there is some reason for setting aside that acknowledgment the pursuers are entitled to get decree in terms of it. Now I look in vain for any pointed defence to the effect that that sum was never due. The pursuers say that it represents the amount of certain accounts belonging to them which the defender uplifted and applied to his own purposes. The defence on the merits is to the effect that the defender was obliged to expend that sum—and I see no question is raised as to the amount—because he had incurred expenses in travelling on behalf of the pursuers in excess of the amount which he had in hand. But then he does not go on to say that these expenses were payable by the pursuers, and there is a probative agreement produced in process and printed as an appendix to this case which shows that he was to pay his own expenses of the journeys, and that the employers were only to advance £50 to account of these expenses, the assumption being that he would be able to earn so much commission that he would have enough to meet his expenses and a reasonable remuneration to himself. There is thus no substantial defence to the effect that this amount which the pursuers claim, and which admittedly consists of certain specified accounts which the defender collected on their behalf, was not due to them at the time the acknowledgment was given.

But then it is said, and this also involves an admission of the collection of these accounts, that in consequence of what the defender had done in appropriating these sums to his own purposes he was threatened with a criminal prosecution for embezzlement, and through fear of a criminal prosecution was induced to sign this acknowledgment. It is further said that the acknowledgment is accordingly tainted, and, being the result of a pactum illicitum, cannot be founded upon. Speaking for myself, I doubt very much whether it is a crime by the law of Scotland for an employer to say to an employee who has embezzled his money,—"If you will make up the amount which you have taken from me I will not prosecute you." I do not think it is reasonable to suggest that that constitutes a crime, whether you give it the name of compounding a felony or whatever name you give it. It seems to me that an employer who takes that line acts humanely; and is not acting wrongly, far less criminally. The crime that has been committed has injured the employer only, and there is no duty laid upon him in the public interest to give information to the police.

Oct. 29, 1913.

The Lamson Paragon Supply Co., Limited, v. MacPhail.

Lord Salvesen.

But it is not necessary to decide that in this case. It may be a different matter if the employer, using his knowledge that a crime has been committed, gets some benefit to himself—extorts something from the employee to which he is not entitled. That would present an entirely different case to my mind, But that is not the allegation here, and such a defence, as your Lordship in the chair has pointed out, can only arise if there is a relevant averment of an agreement on the part of the employer, in respect of certain pecuniary considerations, not to prosecute at all. Now I fail to find any proper averment of such an agreement. It may be that in the present case it was the expectation of the employee, and the intention of the employer, that there would be no prosecution, but in order to make a pactum illicitum there must have been a definite bargain to that effect, and I do not find that there is any proper averment of such a bargain. The circumstances here averred, indeed, seem to me to fall short of what was proved in the case of Ferrier v. Mackenzie,[1] where it was held that a bargain had not been established so as to bring into operation the law which exists in England—whether it exists in Scotland or not is still an open question—with regard to compounding a felony. It is certainly a remarkable circumstance that a prosecution for the crime of compounding a felony has never, so far as we know, taken place in Scotland; and there are excellent reasons why, in a country where the conduct of the prosecution of crimes is entrusted to a public prosecutor, it should not be necessary to create a more or less artificial crime, one purpose of which in England seems to be to stimulate the activities of private prosecutors. But I say nothing further on this subject.

I agree generally with the grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary has decided the case, and with the additional observations which your Lordship in the chair has made.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur in thinking that the important general question which Mr Macquisten raised does not arise on the pleadings for decision. That question, as I understand it, is this—whether an agreement to refrain from criminal prosecution, in return for payment of money due, amounts to a pactum illicitum by the law of Scotland. At first sight it would look as if in Ferrier's case [1] the affirmative of that proposition was assumed by the Judges who decided it. I do not think that is so. Certainly the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, holding the averments relevant—that does not appear to have been questioned—seem to have proceeded on that assumption, but when one examines the opinions in the Inner House, three of the Judges quite distinctly say they reserve their view on that question. Lord Young says:—"If we came to the conclusion that a criminal offence had been committed by Alexander, I think that it may be according to the rule of our law—although no instance of it, as far as I know, has occurred in practice—that this promissory-note cannot be a ground of action in a Court of law." Lord Trayner says:—"I abstain from saying anything on the question as to whether an engagement to refrain from criminal prosecution in return for payment of the loss incurred through the alleged crime would amount to a pactum illicitum." And Lord Moncreiff says:—"I think it is sufficient for the judgment to hold that the defender has not proved that the bill was obtained in return for an agreement to abstain from a criminal prosecution against his brother." Lord Moncreiff adds a striking sentence showing how far the proof in that case went, and yet it fell short of proving an agreement. He says:—"I even think that the defender signed the bill in order to insure his brother not being prosecuted, but, as I have said, there is no proof of any bargain."

[1] 1 F. 597.

Oct. 29, 1913.

The Lamson Paragon Supply Co., Limited v. MacPhail.

Lord Guthrie.

It seems to me that the Lord Ordinary has come to the right conclusion when, without finding it necessary to decide the general question, he has held that, supposing such an agreement would have the effect contended for by Mr Macquisten, no such agreement has been relevantly averred.

THE COURT adhered.

W. & J. BURNESS, W.S.—HUME M'GREGOR & Co., S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 11.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

MRS ELSIE GRANT AND ANOTHER (Executrices-dative of Jessie Taylor), Pursuers (Appellants).—Lippe.
ROBERT TAYLOR THOM AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—Chree, K.C.—Mitchell.

Writ—Holograph writing—Testament—Subscription.

A document was found in the repositories of the deceased Miss Jessie Taylor enclosed in an unsealed envelope on which was written "My will." The document, which was holograph of the deceased, was written on one side of a sheet of paper and contained a list of bequests which disposed of the whole of her estate. It was headed, "Sunnybank Alford My last Will Jessie Taylor," but was not signed by her at the end.

Held, by a Court of seven Judges (diss. Lord Salvesen, Lord Mackenzie, and Lord Guthrie) that, in the absence of subscription, the document could not receive effect as a valid testamentary writing.

ON 7th May 1913 Mrs Elsie Grant and another, the executrices-dative of Miss Jessie Taylor, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Robert Taylor Thom and others, in which the pursuers craved declarator that a certain holograph writing was "the valid last will of the late Jessie Taylor, who resided at Sunnybank, Alford, Aberdeenshire."

1ST DIVISION with three consulted Judges. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

The writing, which was on one side of a sheet of paper, was in the following terms:—

"Sunnybank Alford
"My last Will Jessie Taylor

"I leave my fourth share of this house to Jessie Taylor Gellie (Dora) my cottage at Kemnay Lilliesleaf to Robert Grant 43 Lauderdale Street Edinburgh Sell out my shares in the N. of S. and T. & County Bank. also N. of S. & Steme Coy and Scotish Union & N. Insurance Coy also what money may be in the Bank after my funeral divide it equally between Mrs Grant 107 Warrender Park Road Mrs Gellie 110 Desswood Place Aberdeen Dr Grant, George Alford Grant Vancouver, Cara Grant, Robina Thomson Glassgreen & Isbe Thomson

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Jane Joiner and Freida Joiner let all share alike also Eleanor Thomson, King Williams Town S. Africa to Nellie Grant £5 because of her usage to me when living in her Father's house last. my clothes divided among those also my bedding linnen and the furniture, to Robert Grant my eight day or Grandfather clock what furniture is not wanted sell out and let the money go with what is in the Bank Mrs Thomson Glassgreen all my dishes or however many she want. divide the books I would not like the Bibles sold"

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The alleged testamentary writing founded on not having been subscribed by the said Jessie Taylor is inoperative as her will, and decree of absolvitor should be granted accordingly with expenses.

On 12th July 1913, after a proof, the Sheriff-substitute (Young) pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Finds in fact (1) that the late Miss Jessie Taylor, whose ordinary residence was at Sunnybank, Alford, Aberdeenshire, died in a nursing home at Aberdeen on 26th February 1913; (2) that shortly after her death an examination was made of her repositories in her house at Alford, and in particular attention was directed to a locked drawer as the place in which she was accustomed to keep papers of value and importance; (3) that in that drawer, part of a chest of drawers which stood in the kitchen, there was found, along with share certificates, deposit-receipts, and titles to property, an unclosed envelope, No. 5 of process, on the back of which was written the words 'My Will,' and inside which was the document No. 5a of process; (4) that this document does not expressly bear to be written by the deceased, but it, as well as the words on the envelope, has been proved to be in her handwriting; (5) that at the beginning of the document and slightly separated from the body of it there is this heading 'Sunnybank, Alford, My last Will Jessie Taylor,' and what follows contains words of bequest, and appears to deal with every item of the deceased's estate, excepting a small sum of cash in the house and a proportion of rents current at her death; (5) that the said document is not dated, but there is evidence to the effect that in all probability it was written after September 1912; and (7) that it is not subscribed: Finds in law that the said document, not being subscribed, is not a valid and effectual testamentary writing: Therefore refuses decree of declarator as concluded for."

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard on 17th October 1913 before the First Division (consisting of Lord Kinnear, Lord Johnston, and Lord Mackenzie), the Right Honourable Alexander Ure, K.C., being present as Lord Probationer.

The Court ordered the case to be reheard before a Court of seven Judges, and it was accordingly reheard on 13th November 1913 before the First Division, with Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie.

Argued for the appellants;—The declaration "my last will," which was signed by the testatrix, was an adequate equivalent for subscription of the list of bequests which followed, because what followed was declared by these words to be the writer's will. By that declaration the holograph writing, which was on the same side of the same piece of paper, had been sufficiently identified and adopted as her testament. Moreover, that it was intended as a completed expression of her testamentary wishes was evident from the fact that it disposed, in testamentary form, of the whole estate of the testatrix, and was found among documents of value in her repositories at her death. In such circumstances it should receive effect as a valid will.[1] The mere fact that the list of bequests was unsigned was not conclusive against the appellants' contention, for an unsigned document had been held to be a valid testament where there were circumstances which excluded the presumption that, being unsigned, it was necessarily incomplete.[2] The cases in which that presumption had received effect were distinguished by the absence of any such circumstances.[3]

Argued for the respondents;—In no case within the last 300 years had a manifestly unsubscribed holograph writing been held to be a valid and effectual will, and 100 years later than the case of Titill,[4] relied on by the appellants, the law clearly was not regarded as being in accordance with that decision, because had it been so a question which the Court had then to consider on the subject of a holograph testamentary writing could not have arisen The circumstances here were quite different from those in the case of Gillespie v. Donaldson's Trustees,[6] where a testator was held to have successfully dispensed with certain solemnities in future writings by a clause to that effect inserted in a formal deed. What was maintained by the appellants here was that the words with which the holograph writing of the deceased opened should be read as an adoption of what followed. That was an impossible contention. It could not be suggested that they were added after the rest of the writing, and the natural, and indeed only possible, interpretation of them was that they were a declaration that the writer was about to make her will. They were in fact merely a heading; and as the writing that followed was not subscribed, and was undated and contained no appointment of executors and no residuary clause, it could in no sense be regarded as a completed testamentary writing.[7] If there was any doubt as to whether such a writing had been completed it could not receive effect. Knowledge of the difference between a subscribed and an unsubscribed document was to be presumed in the case of every testator, and the writer of a holograph will must be held to regard it as incomplete and ineffectual until subscribed.[8] In the cases in which ex facie unsubscribed holograph writings had been held to be valid the Court had always found them to be authenticated, at least indirectly, by subscription.[9] But where,

---

[1] Titill, (1610) M. 16,959; Dunlop v. Dunlop, (1839) 1 D. 912, Lord President Hope, at p. 918, Lord Mackenzie, at pp. 918 and 920; Stair, iv. 42, 6; M'Laren, Wills and Succession, i. 289.

[2] Gillespie v. Donaldson's Trustees, (1831) 10 S. 174; Russell's Trustees v. Henderson, (1883) 11 R. 283; Murray v. Kuffel, 1910, 2 S. L. T. 388; Baird v. Jaap and Others, (1856) 18 D. 1246, Lord Benholme, at p. 1258.

[3] Dunlop v. Dunlop, 1 D. 912; Skinner v. Forbes, (1883) 11 R. 88, Lord President Inglis, at p. 91; Goldie, &c., v. Shedden, &c., (1885) 13 R. 138, Lord President Inglis, at p. 142; Foley v. Costello, (1904) 6 F. 365, Lord Trayner, at p. 369; Shiell v. Shiell, 1913, 1 S. L. T. 62.

[4] M. 16,959.

[5] Pennycuick v. Campbell, (1709) M. 16,970 (No. 223). [6] 10 S. 174.

[7] Petticrew's Trustees v. Pettigrew, (1884) 12 R. 249, Lord Craighill, at p. 252.

[8] Dunlop v. Dunlop, 1 D. 912, Lord Fullerton, at p. 921; Skinner v. Forbes, 11 R. 88.

[9] Baird v. Jaap and Others, 18 D. 1246; Speirs, &c., v. Home Speirs, &c., (1879) 6 R. 1359; Russell's Trustees v. Henderson, 11 R. 283; Hamilton v. White, (1882) 9 R. (H. L.) 53; Lamont v. Magistrates of Glasgow, (1887) 14 R. 603.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

as here, such a document was not in any sense subscribed, it could not receive effect.[1]

At advising on 21st November 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This Division of the Court has more than once expressed the opinion "(1) That they would not in the future sustain any document as a will which did not bear the subscription of the testator; and (2) that the recital of the testator's name in the commencement of a holograph writing would not be sustained as a subscription or its equivalent." I am quoting from the words of Lord M'Laren in the case of Goldie v. Shedden.[2] And the law was laid down in substantially similar terms in the other Division of the Court. I quote now from the opinion of Lord Trayner in Foley v. Costello[3]—"I think the law of Scotland requires subscription as the essential and only admissible evidence of a concluded expression of will on the part of a testator. . . . In my opinion the rule is inflexible—no subscription, no will—and to admit the consideration of facts and circumstances to modify that rule would be very inexpedient and dangerous." Lord Moncreiff says in the same case—"Subscription is the test of a holograph will," and "the want of subscription cannot be supplied by parole proof."

Now, the question before us to-day is not whether these opinions express truly the law of Scotland, upon which (as I understand) all your Lordships are agreed, but whether or no the doctrines there laid down are applicable to the present case. It is what Lord Fullerton calls, in the case of Dunlop v. Dunlop,[4] a "pure" case. There are no facts and circumstances here. If there were, I presume your Lordships would agree with what was said by Lord President Inglis in the case of Skinner v. Forbes,[5] that "there are cases which give a certain countenance to sustaining unsubscribed holograph testamentary writings upon consideration of facts and circumstances indicating a purpose of the writer to treat the unsigned document as a completed act." I desire, for my own part, to add that, in my judgment, the cases there referred to can no longer be regarded as sound law.

The concrete case before us is one in which we are asked to sustain the validity of a writing which is holograph, which is testamentary in form, which was found in excellent company at the deceased's death, and which purports to dispose of the whole of her estate. It lacks a date, which is immaterial; it lacks the nomination of executors, which is also immaterial; but it lacks, as I read it, a subscription, and that is fatal, in my judgment, to its validity. For I read the paper on which the writing is found as one continuous writing, thus—"My last will, Jessie Taylor, I leave"—and so on. That, it appears to me, is the natural way in which to read the writing; for I think it would be dangerous to judge of the validity or invalidity of a testamentary writing by minute con-

[1] Goldie v. Shedden, 13 R. 138, Lord Adam, at p. 144; Skinner v. Forbes, 11 R. 88; Foley v. Costello, 6 F. 365, Lord Moncreiff, at p. 371; M'Laren, Wills and Succession, (3rd ed.) vol. i. pp. 280 and 289.

[2] 13 R. 138, at p. 141.

[3] 6 F. 365, at p. 369.

[4] 1 D. 912.

[5] 11 R. 88, at p. 91.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Ld. President.

sideration of the spaces between words and lines. It is now trite law that if the signature of the writer is found anywhere in the body of the writing or at its very commencement it cannot supply the place of a subscription; and if this writing is read—as I think it should be read, as it seems to me natural to read it—as one continuous writing, it is obviously invalid as a testamentary document in respect that it lacks a subscription. The cases of Skinner[1] and Goldie[2] and Foley[3] are directly in point. This writing may, however, be read as if the words "My last will" simply signified a title, followed by the signature of the writer. The signature would then be regarded as a superscription, and exactly the same result would follow for it is well-established law that superscription on the part of a subject cannot authenticate the writing.

The writing may, however, be regarded as really two separate and distinct writings, the first a declaration of authentication or identification of the writing which follows, as thus: "What follows is my last will, Jessie Taylor," and then you turn to the writing which follows to find out whether it has been identified by the duly subscribed declaration which precedes. The writing which follows is deliberately described by the testator as her "will." A will is a final and complete act, and the writing which follows is not a final and complete act, because it lacks a subscription. The omission to subscribe admits, in my judgment, of one interpretation and one only, and it would be dangerous to give it any other, to wit, that the writer had not finally made up her mind and desired to have a little more time for consideration with regard to the disposal of her means and estate. That I take to be the just meaning to attach to the two writings if you regard them as separate and distinct, and it appears to me that this in no way militates against the familiar doctrine of authentication or identification by reference of informal testamentary writings. That doctrine I recognise but deem it to be inapplicable to the present case. It might have been applicable to the present case if the writer had said, "the unsigned writing which follows is my last will," but she has not done so. She has, on the supposition I am now making, said it is her last will. When looked at, it obviously is not, for it is not subscribed. If she had said, "my will is to be found in an unclosed envelope," or "my will is to be found in a certain receptacle," or "my will is to be found on this paper," and if, when you turn to the envelope, the receptacle, or the paper, you find it is not subscribed, it would not be identified because it would not be a will, in respect that it lacks subscription.

Now, I hold that it is now the settled law of Scotland that the lack of a subscription indicates an intention on the part of the testator not to regard the writing as a final and complete act. As Lord Fullerton observed in the case of Dunlop v. Dunlop,[4] "the necessity of subscription to a will is a matter which depends on no technical rule . . . but is familiar to all the lieges without exception. Every man knows the difference between a deed that is signed and one that is unsigned. It appears

---

[1] 11 R. 88. [2] 13 R. 138. [3] 6 F. 365.
[4] 1 D., at p. 921.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Ld. President.

to me, therefore, that the deceased must have believed and understood that the writing was not effectual so long as he withheld his subscription from it, and that, if we now sustained it as a valid instrument, we should be making a will, which the party died believing to be ineffectual." That being so, it seems to me plain, to use the language of Lord Deas in the case of Skinner v. Forbes,[1] that "There are no doubt advantages in holding that subscription in such cases as this is essential. That rule puts matters of this kind beyond all question, as every man then knows that so long as he does not subscribe a testamentary deed it is not completed, and that he has power to recall it whenever he likes, or not to complete it at all."

I decline for my part to weigh probabilities. I think it is dangerous for this Court to weigh probabilities in a question of this kind, and that there is one way of putting probabilities out of the question, and that is by the testator signing the deed. In short, I adhere to the doctrine expressed in the familiar passage by Lord Stair—"If we unfasten our moorings from that doctrine, there is no saying to what length we may drift."

The law of Scotland gives what I may call a latitudinarian discretion to testators in the expression of their intentions to dispose of their property. But the least thing we can demand now, I think, is a subscription, as the one and only reliable index of final and complete intention.

Lord Dundas.—I have come to the same conclusion. The general law applicable to cases of this kind appears to me to be correctly summarised in the opinion of Lord Trayner in Foley v. Costello,[2] part of which has already been quoted by your lordship in the chair. Lord Trayner said, and I respectfully adopt his words: "I think the law of Scotland requires subscription as the essential and only admissible evidence of a concluded expression of will on the part of a testator. It has been so decided more than once. The cases of Skinner,[3] and of Goldie,[4] referred to at the debate, are, I think, conclusive upon this matter. In my opinion the rule is inflexible—no subscription, no will—and to admit the consideration of facts and circumstances to modify that rule would be very inexpedient and very dangerous. The case of Russell,[5] relied on by the pursuer, was a very special case indeed, while the case of Burnie's Trustees[6] was not so special. In so far as these cases conflict with the cases of Skinner[3] and Goldie,[4] I am not prepared to follow them." I may add, quoting the words of my brother Lord Skerrington in an Outer House case, to which we were referred, that "there are no equivalents which obviate the necessity for subscription"—Shiell v. Shiell.[7]

The pursuers, however, argue that, assuming the law to be as above stated, the document under consideration is a subscribed will. It is proved to be holograph of Miss Taylor, and is all written on the same side of a sheet of paper. There is no signature at the end of the writing, but it begins with the words, "Sunnybank Alford My last Will Jessie

[1] 11 R., at p. 91.
[2] 6 F. 365, at p. 369.
[3] 11 R. 88.
[4] 13 R. 138.
[5] 11 R. 283.
[6] 21 R. 1015.
[7] 1913, 1 S. L. T. 62.

Taylor." The pursuers say that Miss Taylor has in effect written, "What follows is my last will," adding her signature, and that she thereby authenticated, or adopted, or recognised, by way (so to speak) of a schedule, the remainder of the writing as containing the final expression of her testamentary intentions. The case seems to me a narrow one and near the line, but I have come to the conclusion that the document is not a subscribed will, and cannot receive effect. It is in the pursuers' favour that the document is all on one sheet of paper, and (so far as appears) may all have been written at the same time, and also that it bears to deal, as the Sheriff-substitute has found, with every item of Miss Taylor's estate, excepting a small sum of cash in the house and a proportion of rents current at her death. Nor do I attach importance to the absence of date, or of the nomination of an executor. It may be that, if one were entitled to proceed upon conjecture, one might suppose that Miss Taylor intended the document to be her last will, and imagined it to be valid and effectual; or again, one might suppose that she did not so intend or imagine. But the writing is not subscribed in the ordinary and proper way, and I am unable to hold that it is subscribed at all. It is not, to my mind, certain what is meant by the bare words "my last will," or that "Jessie Taylor" is truly meant to be a signature. The language of the document is entirely consistent with the theory that Miss Taylor had written what she proposed or intended in the way of testamentary provision, but deliberately refrained from affixing her subscription,—"the essential and only admissible evidence of a concluded expression of will" on her part to test. I do not think we are entitled to proceed upon the conjecture that Miss Taylor may have intended the document to be her valid and effectual testament. In construing wills we sometimes meet with cases where, if conjecture might be resorted to, the Court would incline to such or such a conclusion, but in these cases the Court holds itself bound to give effect to the testator's intention as it can be ascertained from what he has said, and not from what it might readily be inferred that he may have meant to express. This case, like others that occur now and again, may be a hard one, though I am not convinced that it is so, but it is our duty to maintain the established rules of law, and not to admit variations on, or exceptions to, them in view of hardship or supposed hardship in any particular case. I do not think the law imposes an undue or excessive burden upon the public in general, or intending testators in particular, in demanding that a will must be properly subscribed. For these reasons, I am for refusing the appeal, and affirming the interlocutor of the learned Sheriff-substitute.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Lord Dundas.

Lord Johnston.—I think that the learned Sheriff-substitute has come to a sound conclusion in this case. The law of the subject has I think been gradually settled by a series of cases during the last seventy years, and settled in the direction of increasing strictness in application, in the case of the execution of wills—and this I think for sound reasons, because wills, in the matter of their execution, stand in a different position from other documents. In regard to wills there can be no such thing as delivery, rei interventus, or homologation, to validate an unsigned

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Ld. Johnston.

document. On the other hand a will is required "not only to be the true writing of the deceased, but also the completed act of his will."—Lord Mackenzie in Dunlop's case.[1] There are, no doubt, in the cases to which I shall advert, expressions of individual Judges which would leave the law on the subject much more loose, but I think that it has now hardened into the following:—1, To validate a will there must be signature; 2, that signature must be directly or indirectly by subscription; 3, external facts and circumstances cannot be admitted to supply the want of subscription.

The case of Gillespie[2] in its second branch, would be an authority against the first two of these propositions. But it cannot stand in view of subsequent decisions, and Lord Balgray's idea that a document not signed could be considered "to be legally signed to all intents and purposes"[3] is one which cannot be entertained.

The pure question arose shortly after, in Dunlop's case,[4] and it was emphatically decided that an unsubscribed will was invalid, though holograph, though containing the testator's name in initialibus, and a declaration that he thereby made his last will and testament, and though purporting to be a universal settlement with residue clause. The Court felt themselves clear of all other considerations, "because the writing in dispute stands alone." But Lord Cockburn, Lord Ordinary, says,[5] where the Court has arrived at seemingly opposite results it has never been "by merely looking at the unsubscribed writing by itself, but always by incorporating it with other matter with which it has a necessary connection. This matter has generally consisted of two circumstances, one or other or both of which have been invariably required to warrant any relaxation of the strict rule. These are that the defects in the instrument have been supplied, 1st, By other unobjectionable writings connected therewith by the testator; or 2nd, By evidence of facts extrinsic of the disputed instrument, but linked to it. So that, in truth, it has never been the unsubscribed writing alone that has been sustained." I am not aware of the cases to which his Lordship refers, in which the Court are supposed to have arrived at seemingly opposite results. The only prior cases referred to at the hearing were Titill[6] and Gillespie.[2] Lord Fullerton also said[7] in agreeing in the judgment—"I do not wish to be understood as saying that there are no circumstances in which an unsubscribed deed should receive effect. There may be cases where facts and circumstances occur, sufficient to instruct that an unsubscribed holograph deed was nevertheless the last will of the deceased. But there are no such circumstances here."

I think that it must now be accepted that Lord Cockburn's second proposition, apparently concurred in by Lord Fullerton, will not hold. And I further think that his first proposition requires consideration, limitation, and definition. It is this point only I think which makes the present case of importance, and justifies its being discussed by a Court of seven Judges. Had I thought it depended on special circumstances, as

---

[1] 1 D. 912, at p. 919. [2] 10 S. 174. [3] Ibid., at p. 177. [4] 1 D. 912.
[5] Ibid., at p. 917. [6] M. 16,959. [7] 1 D., at p. 920.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Ld. Johnston.

I gather some of your Lordships do, I could hardly have consented to that course being taken. My own conclusion, after carefully considering the authorities, is that Lord Cockburn's statement that the defect of subscription can be supplied "by other unobjectionable writings connected therewith by the testator" can mean no more than that there must be subscription, but that that subscription may be indirect, as I have put it in the above propositions, that is, by the subscription of some other document connected by the testator with the unsubscribed will. Such other document must be unobjectionable in itself and therefore, whether holograph or tested, must be subscribed. It must be connected by the testator with the incomplete will. But what precisely is to be understood by "connected therewith" is most difficult to determine, and there is risk of derogating from the rule by the exception. I think that it must be a document so linked with the unsubscribed will as, by its own subscription, unequivocally to supply the want of a subscription to the will.

In Skinner's case[1] the law of Dunlop's case[2] was unconditionally endorsed, though the document in question bore even a greater semblance of being a completed deed than that in Dunlop's case.[2] Lord Deas in fact suppressed his own inclination to dissent, saying[3]: "it is most important that on this branch of the law, when a rule has once been decided, it should not be opened up again except for some very strong reason, and I look in vain here for any sufficient reason why we should reconsider the case of Dunlop.[2] . . . There are no doubt advantages in holding that subscription in such cases as this is essential. That rule puts matters of this kind beyond all question, as every man then knows that so long as he does not subscribe a testamentary deed it is not completed, and that he has power to recall it whenever he likes, or not to complete it at all. I think, therefore, that on the authority of the case of Dunlop[2] we must find that this deed is invalid." Then Foley's case[4] and Goldie v. Shedden[5] conclusively disposed of the suggestion, adumbrated in Dunlop's case,[2] that facts and circumstances might supply the want of subscription, and determined that "the law of Scotland requires subscription as the essential and only admissible evidence of a concluded expression of will on the part of a testator."[4]

None of these cases, however, touch the first point put by Lord Cockburn in Dunlop's case,[2] viz., that defect of subscription can be cured "by other unobjectionable writings connected therewith by the testator." In this relation it is necessary to examine the case of Russell's Trustees,[6] where a lady left a holograph writing commencing: "I, Margaret Russell, do hereby make my last will and testament revoking all other wills." She dated, but did not subscribe it. It was found contained in a sealed packet, bearing on the outside her signature and the words "James Henderson," this Mr Henderson being Miss Russell's nephew and the executor nominated in the above writing. Attached to the packet by a string was an envelope addressed "to James Henderson from Margaret Russell," containing a letter with a date of the same month and year as

---

[1] 11 R. 88. [2] 1 D. 912. [3] 11 R., at p. 91.
[4] 6 F. 365, at p. 369. [5] 13 R. 138. [6] 11 R. 283.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Ld. Johnston.

the above writing, holograph of Miss Russell, stating that she had rewritten her will "for this year," and giving directions about her funeral. It was signed with her Christian name only, and there was no proof that she was in use so to sign. The whole were stated to have been delivered by Miss Russell to Mr Henderson, with the statement that her will was therein contained, and that they were not to be opened until her death. The Court held that the circumstances supplied the defect of subscription, and the writing was sustained as a valid will. As this question has been sent to seven Judges, I conceive that I am entitled, if not bound, to examine this judgment, which I should not otherwise do, and I venture to take exception to much which was stated in support of it, and even to entertain grave doubt of the result arrived at. Lord Craighill pronounced the leading judgment, and he proceeds on a view of the virtue and competency of a proof of facts and circumstances which is not consistent with the cases to which I have just referred, and in particular gives weight to the admission, for the question was raised in a special case, of what Miss Russell said in delivering the sealed packet to Mr Henderson, evidence of which, I think, would have been entirely inadmissible. But his Lordship also finds sufficient token of authentication under the hand of the lady in the envelope and its contents which was attached by a string to the sealed packet containing the alleged will, and which he held to be an appendage to the will. I should myself have thought that there was neither an intelligible subscription nor an unequivocal connection of the document bearing that subscription by the testator with the unsigned document. Lord Young, on the other hand, gives an interpretation of Stair, iv. 42, 6, which would leave the validity of all such unsubscribed holograph writings to be a question of circumstances. The sound interpretation of the passage from Stair is that given by Lord Shand in Skinner's[1] and Goldie's[2] cases.

In the present case we have an unsigned holograph writing testamentary in its nature. I think that it is irrelevant to the question of its validity that, if valid, it would have disposed of all that the writer is known to have possessed, or that it was written at any particular date, or was found in any particular repository. It depends for its validity, if it is valid, entirely upon its heading:

"Sunnybank Alford

My last Will Jessie Taylor"

I cannot regard this as an unexceptionable document connected with the alleged testamentary writing by the testator, and therefore as supplying the want of subscription of the document itself. It is at best a superscription, for presumably it preceded the making of the document which was to follow. Indeed, whether it preceded or followed the making of the document to which it is prefixed it was in effect superscription. And superscription cannot be regarded as any but a royal prerogative. Moreover, such a preliminary announcement is no unequivocal proof of the finality of what follows. But the equally fatal objection is that its meaning is inconclusive. No one can say, except as an assertion of probability, what the writer meant. It is possible that she meant "This which the reader will find below I mean to be received as my last will." If what has been referred to as the docquet, though I never heard of a docquet preceding the document assumed to be docqueted, had followed the writing, the above interpretation would have been a reasonable and natural implication. But being found where it is, it is also possible that it meant "What I am about to write I intend to be my last will." A statement which, if written in extenso, would not have established the finality of what was to follow. With all respect I adopt the view of Lord Shand in Skinner's case[1]: "There is one way of putting probabilities out of the question, and that is by the testator's signing the deed; and I think the view expressed by Lord Stair is the safe and proper view of the law on the point."

[1] 11 R. 88. [2] 13 R. 138.

Lord Salvesen.—In this case we had a very full citation of authorities on both sides of the bar; but in the view I take it is unnecessary to consider whether the judgments pronounced in several of these cases, which have been since commented on, would now be repeated. One proposition is clear that an unsubscribed holograph will is not a valid and effectual testamentary writing even although the name of the granter is embodied in the document. The tersest and most lucid exposition of the law on this point is contained in the passage from the opinion of Lord Trayner in the case of Foley v. Costello,[2] already quoted by your Lordship in the chair. As at present advised I do not see any ground for modifying this absolute statement of the law; but the question remains whether it is applicable to the circumstances of the present case.

The writing founded upon begins with the following words:—"Sunnybank Alford My last Will Jessie Taylor". There follows a holograph statement of her testamentary wishes which, as the Sheriff-substitute has found, "appears to deal with every item of the testator's estate excepting a small sum of cash in the house and a proportion of rents current at her death." The document is not dated, but there is a finding to the effect that in all probability it was written after September 1912, while Miss Taylor's death occurred on 25th February 1913.

I apprehend that if the words "My last Will" and the signature had followed the testamentary directions no question could have been raised. The words would then have been construed as meaning "the above is my last will"; and I would have attached no importance to the fact pointed out by the respondents' counsel that the signature is in the same line with the words "my last will," and is not below it. Nor do I think it would have made any difference in such a case that the writing bore no date, and that there was no appointment of an executor. The date may be of importance when it is doubtful whether the deed was signed before or after marriage; but not generally where the will of an unmarried person is concerned. Even if it were otherwise, the fact that the property left was precisely what was disposed of by the settlement shows, apart from the parole evidence to which the Sheriff-substitute refers in the finding

[1] 11 R. 88, at p. 93. [2] 6 F. 365.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Lord Salvesen.

from which I have partially quoted, that the document cannot have been executed very long before the testator's death. As regards an executor the law will appoint one if the testator has not done so; and it is probable enough that this lady who wrote her own will should be ignorant that the distribution of her estate could not be effected except through the medium of an executor. Such an omission does not tend to throw any doubt on the document as a complete expression of her testamentary wishes.

Does it then make any difference that the words "My last Will Jessie Taylor" precede and do not follow her testamentary directions? In my opinion, in the circumstances of this case, it does not. I construe the words in the position which they occupy on a single sheet of paper as being equivalent to a statement that the directions as to the distribution of her estate which immediately follow constitute her last will. This settlement is duly subscribed and, as there can be no question as to the identification of her testamentary wishes, constitutes a disposal of the whole estate of which she knew herself to be possessed. I have therefore come to the conclusion, differing from the Sheriff-substitute, that the document, taken as a whole, validly disposes of her estate. In so holding I conceive myself to be simply applying to the circumstances of this case the well-known rule stated in M'Laren on Wills, section 531. There is not the same difficulty in applying this rule in the present case as there would have been if the testamentary writings had been on different sheets of paper, as in some of the decided cases quoted in the footnote. The present case is extremely special, and can scarcely be an authority unless in circumstances which are substantially identical.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of opinion that this is a good will.

The question is a short one, depending upon (1) the construction put upon the declaration, "My last Will"; and (2) the identification of the will therein referred to.

Two constructions are put forward. The first that "My last Will" means "This is the will I am going to make," the other that it means "This paper is my last Will." I prefer the latter as the more reasonable. To the statement so made by the testatrix is appended her signature. It is subscribed. Therefore the case is not like those where the name of the testator appeared merely in gremio of the writing. I recognise that the later cases settle that without subscription a writing cannot per se be valid as a will. The law is contained in the cases of Skinner,[1] Goldie,[2] and Foley[3] cited by the Sheriff-substitute, and I refer to Lord Low's and Lord Trayner's opinions in the last mentioned. There is here, in my opinion, compliance with the required formalities.

The next question is whether there is room for doubt that the document is a completed will. If it is a mere scroll from which a will was afterwards to be made, it is of course not operative. This is, as was pointed out in Dunlop,[4] the question to be decided. It is not necessary to recapitulate the findings in fact relating to the circumstances under which the present writing was found. The surrounding circumstances all point to its being, what it purports on the face of it to be, the last expression of the will of the testatrix. The fact that it was found in an envelope (though unclosed) with the indorsation "My will" is entirely consistent with this view. There is to my mind no reasonable doubt as to the identity of the will referred to. It is the universal settlement of her whole estate which, with her own hand, she wrote upon the same page of the paper. The respondents argued that there is no nomination of executors; no date; and, during the original argument, it was pointed out that there is no full stop at the end. These circumstances do not, to my mind, lead to the conclusion that the will is not a complete expression of the intentions of the testatrix. Nor was it necessary that there should be a residuary clause, for there does not appear to be any residue. The writing is not a memorandum of what was intended to be a will. It is a completed will. The subscription may or may not have been added before or after the writing which follows it upon the page. I am content to assume that it may have been written immediately after the words "My last Will." These words, with the accompanying subscription, are, I am of opinion, a sufficient recognition by the testatrix of her will. I prefer to rest my judgment upon this, rather than upon the doctrine of adoption. Suppose that the writing which follows the docquet had been on a separate sheet of paper in a sealed envelope which bore the indorsation "My last will," or "What is contained herein is my last will," with the subscription of the testatrix. In these circumstances it would have have been, in my view, impossible to refuse to give effect to it. Yet then the docquet and subscription might have been written before the will; and the identity of the will might have been more open to doubt than is the case here.

[1] 11 R. 88. [2] 13 R. 138. [3] 6 F. 365. [4] 1 D. 912.

I therefore think that, consistently with established principles, effect should be given to this will.

When the foregoing was written I was of opinion that there was no difference of opinion as regards the law, but only as regards its application. As regards some of the propositions laid down by those who take a different view I am unable to concur. I reserve my opinion on these when they come up.

Lord Guthrie.—I concur in the opinions of Lord Salvesen and Lord Mackenzie. It was stated by Mr Lippe at the commencement of his argument that the object of this case being heard before seven Judges was to obtain a decision on the Sheriff-substitute's finding in law—namely, that the document in question, not being subscribed, is not a valid and effectual testamentary writing. But as the argument proceeded it appeared that the real question raised was whether, being unsubscribed, it could be shown that there were what the law would hold equivalents for subscription and that the document was truly subscribed. On the whole, but with difficulty, I think the words, "My last Will Jessie Taylor," although in the position in which they occur, amount to subscription of the document in question. At the same time, I am bound to add that the question might have arisen for consideration under more favourable conditions; and I should have felt more confidence that I was giving effect to the deceased's intention if these words had been at the very commencement of the document, if what I consider the deceased's signature had been underneath instead of alongside the words, "My last Will," if the end of the document had been less ragged, and if the envelope containing the document had been sealed or at least closed. I do not regret the result at which I understand the majority of your Lordships have arrived, as it does not seem unreasonable or contrary to public policy to require that, in every case where there is not clear adoption or recognition, testators must append their signatures at the end of their testamentary documents, if not necessarily under the last words of these writings.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Lord Guthrie.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—This appeal does not, in my view, raise any question either of legal principle or of general interest. On the one hand it is now settled that a holograph will is invalid unless it is subscribed by the testator. On the other hand, with very great deference to the opinion expressed by your Lordship in the chair, I had thought, and I still think, that a will which is itself either holograph and subscribed or probative may incorporate by reference unsubscribed testamentary directions which are to be found outside of itself—for example, in an unauthenticated writing sufficiently described for identification, or in a model will printed on a certain page of a legal style-book, or in the published life of some person, either real or imaginary. I refer to the case of Crosbie v. Wilson,[1] where a Court consisting of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, Lord Cowan, Lord Benholme, and Lord Neaves, sustained a holograph but unsubscribed testamentary writing in respect that the testatrix had directed by her formal will that any holograph writing, whether signed by her or not, should receive effect. I share the doubts expressed by Lord M'Laren[2] as to whether it is consistent with the attestation statutes that a person should be allowed to dispense with the solemnities required by law in regard to testamentary writings not in existence at the date of the will or prepared unico contextu therewith. But the authorities, including the opinions in the House of Lords case of Inglis v. Harper[3] do not, in my opinion, support the view that a writing cannot be adopted as a will unless it is itself subscribed by the testator.

In the present case all that we have to decide is whether the holograph writing, printed in Appendix B, ought to be read as forming two separate documents, and if so, whether the first seven words, viz., "Sunnybank Alford My last Will Jessie Taylor" ought to be construed as meaning that the writer referred to and incorporated as part of her subscribed will the holograph but unsubscribed directions written below her signature. I think that there is at least a reasonable doubt as regards both questions, and I am not prepared to answer either of them in the affirmative. I am not satisfied that the words "Jessie Taylor" were intended to authenticate the words which preceded them, or were other than descriptive of the person who was beginning to write out her will. Nor am I satisfied that the writer intended the words "My last Will" to have the meaning and effect attributed to them by the appellants' counsel. The presumption that testamentary directions are incomplete and deliberative until they have been subscribed militates against the construction contended for. This presumption is founded not upon any technical rule of law but upon the ordinary understanding and practice even of rustics in this country. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute should be affirmed.

[1] (1865) 3 Macph. 870.
[2] Wills and Succession, (3rd ed.) vol. i. pp. 289-290.
[3] (1831) 5 W. & S. 785.

Nov. 21, 1913.

Taylor's Executrices v. Thom.

Lord Skerrington.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

DALGLEISH, DOBBIE, & Co., S.S.C.—HENRY BOWER, S.S.C.—Agents.

GREGOR MACGREGOR FRAME, Petitioner.—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Lippe.
THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Respondents.—Clyde, K.C.—Wark.

No. 12.

Nov. 26, 1913.

Frame v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Appeal to the House of Lords—Leave to appeal—Interlocutor appointing proof instead of jury trial.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutor appointing an action of damages for personal injuries to be tried before a Lord Ordinary without a jury refused.

2D DIVISION. Lord Hunter.

ON 14th February 1913 Gregor Macgregor Frame, produce merchant and commission agent, London, brought an action againt the Caledonian Railway Company, concluding for £3000 as loss and damages sustained by him through illness, brought on by the defenders not having supplied artificial heat to the carriage in which he travelled from Aberdeen to London on 30th September 1911, while convalescent after an operation for appendicitis.

The pursuer's averments are summarised in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, infra.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer having been injured through the fault or breach of duty on the part of the defenders or their servants, they are liable in reparation.

The pursuer proposed this issue:—"Whether, on or about the 30th September and 1st October 1911 the pursuer, while travelling as a passenger of the defenders from Aberdeen to London, was injured through the fault of the defenders to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuer."

On 28th May 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, finds that the same is one more suitable to be disposed of by way of proof before his Lordship than by a jury; therefore refuses the issue proposed; allows to the parties a proof of their respective averments on record."*

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuer, who is a produce merchant and commission agent in London, sues the Caledonian Railway Company for £3000 as loss and damages sustained by him in consequence of the defenders not having supplied artificial heat to the carriage in which he travelled from Aberdeen to London on 30th September 1911. The pursuer moved for approval of an issue for trial of the case by a jury, but the defen-

Nov. 26, 1913.

Frame v. Caledonian Railway Co.

The pursuer reclaimed, and on 12th July 1913 the Second Division adhered.

On 12th November 1913 the pursuer presented a petition for authority to appeal to the House of Lords against the interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary and the Second Division, dated 28th May and 12th July 1913 respectively.

He submitted that leave to appeal should be granted "because the action being one of damages in respect of personal injury the pursuer is entitled to trial by jury, there being no special cause shown to the contrary."

The petition was heard before the Second Division on 26th November 1913.

Argued for the petitioner;—The petitioner had an absolute right to trial by jury, this being one of the enumerated causes, unless special cause were shown why proof before the Lord Ordinary should ders maintained that in the special circumstances of the case it would be more appropriately tried by a judge without a jury.

---

"According to the pursuer's plea in law and the issue of which he asked me to approve, he bases his case upon fault or failure of duty on the part of the defenders. On examining his averments I think that the foundation of his case is really breach of contract, and that a very special contract. The pursuer was recovering from an illness, and proposed to travel from Aberdeen to London. In the fourth article of his condescendence he says: 'The defenders advertise that the corridor sleeping saloons run by their route are specially built with the view of ensuring comfort and privacy during the journey, and that each saloon is comfortably warmed by special heating apparatus during the winter months. The pursuer proposed to leave Aberdeen by the defenders' night express corridor train, starting from Aberdeen on Saturday, 30th September 1911, at 7.55 P.M., provided the berth was heated as advertised.' I do not think the terms of the advertisement necessarily justify the suggestion which the pursuer makes that the berth would be heated in September. That is not usually considered a winter month. The pursuer, however, avers that Mr William Smith Gill, his brother-in-law, arranged with the defenders' passenger agent that the berth would be heated. This is admitted by the defenders. The pursuer then goes on to say that on 'arriving at the defenders' railway station in Aberdeen a few minutes before the said train started it was discovered that the sleeping berth was not heated. The night was bitterly cold. The said William Smith Gill (i.e. his brother-in-law) on the pursuer's behalf, spoke to the defenders' car attendant about this matter, and the latter stated that the heat would be turned on directly the train started. Had this assurance not been given the pursuer would not have travelled.' This alleged conversation, which is really the basis of the pursuer's case, is denied by the defenders. So far as the averments involve a possible conflict of testimony there is no reason for refusing a jury trial. I think, however, a difficult and delicate question may arise from the terms of any conversation, which may be proved to have taken place, as to whether what was said by the defenders' employee amounted to an undertaking upon which the pursuer was entitled to rely as binding upon the defenders. The further averments of the pursuer all point to the unusual and special nature of the undertaking or contract upon which the pursuer is founding. I think that the nature and extent of the defenders' liability will be more satisfactorily determined by a proof than by a jury trial.

"There appears to me to be a further reason for not ordering a trial by jury. The pursuer's claim for damages comes under a number of different heads—e.g. suffering in health, expenditure owing to illness and loss of business. The claim is for a lump sum and no attempt has been made to be preferred.[1] No special cause had been shown, since the case raised a pure question of fact. What amounted to "special cause," and whether, in the absence of special cause, an issue could be refused, were questions of law which the petitioner was entitled to submit for the judgment of the House of Lords. They were not questions of discretion.

Argued for the respondents;—There was no distinction between the present case and those in which similar applications had been made and refused.[2] The only matter that had been decided here was a matter of procedure, and it was within the discretion of the Court to say what amounted to "special cause," and what was the appropriate mode of procedure when special cause had been shown. Such questions were not appropriate for appeal to the House of Lords.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case in its present stage relates to procedure and to procedure only. We had an opportunity when the case was heard before us at considerable length, of considering the question whether we would interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary, who held that it was a case more suitable for a proof before himself than for a jury trial, and we were unanimous in deciding that we ought not to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in the matter.

I think it is an established principle that, except upon very strong grounds, the Court will not interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary in fixing the mode in which proof in the case is to be taken. It is quite certain that if the Lord Ordinary stated in his note some ground upon which he proceeded, which in no way gave reasons for exercising his discretion in substituting proof for jury trial, it would be the bounden duty of the Court to interfere in the matter. But we have been of opinion that that is not the case here. The Lord Ordinary has stated grounds which are sufficient to prevent us from interfering with the judgment which he has pronounced.

In those circumstances, the question is whether the pursuer is to be allowed to appeal to the House of Lords on the question whether we have properly exercised our discretion. I do not think this is a petition which ought to be granted, and, therefore, I am for refusing it.

Lord Dundas.—I quite agree. When this case was before us, I thought it seemed to be a very peculiar one. It seemed to me that the facts were very special, and that they might, probably would, raise difficult questions of law at the inquiry. The Lord Ordinary, in the exercise of a dis-put a figure upon the separate items of claim. A part of his claim is thus stated: 'On account of his long absence from business he lost various opportunities and commissions which he would otherwise have had, and it is not yet possible to ascertain precisely what the pursuer's total loss under this head will be.' An inquiry into such a claim seems to me to be of a special character and not well suited for determination by jury.

---

"I propose to refuse an issue and to allow a proof."

[1] Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 4.

[2] Scottish Rights of Way and Recreation Society, Limited, v. Macpherson, (1886) 14 R. 74; Pringle v. Dunsmure, (1877) 14 S. L. R. 498; Hope v. Hope's Trustees, (1898) 36 S. L. R. 220.

Nov. 26, 1913.

Frame v. Caledonian Railway Co.

Lord Dundas.

cretion which he thought he had, and which I think he had, thought fit to send the case to proof and refused an issue. We adhered to that interlocutor; and, as your Lordship has said, it is not the custom of either Division of the Court lightly to interfere with the discretion exercised by a Lord Ordinary in such matters. But it is now said by the learned Solicitor-General that we and the Lord Ordinary exercised our discretion wrongly, or rather that we and the Lord Ordinary assumed a discretion which we had not, because no special cause had been shown why the case should not be tried by a jury. I think there was ample ground for holding that there was special cause why that procedure should not be resorted to. I am against granting leave to appeal to the House of Lords from our interlocutor. The precedents are against our doing so; similar motions have been not infrequently made, and always refused. I do not think there is any general question of law raised, or indeed any question of law at all. I regard the matter as one of procedure and discretion. In some of the cases a consideration has been adverted to about the possibility of two appeals; and, for what it is worth, that element is here against the Solicitor-General, because if we were to grant him leave now to appeal, and he were unsuccessful, for aught we know there might be a second appeal at the end of the matter after proof had been taken. On the whole matter, I am of opinion that this is a petition which we ought not to grant.

Lord Salvesen.—I agree. One matter that was certainly in my mind when we adhered to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was that, assuming that the contract had been broken, a difficult question of law might arise as to what damages reasonably and naturally flowed from that breach of contract. A jury, of course, is quite unable to appreciate matters of that kind, and is in the habit of assessing damages in a very rough and ready way indeed. Apart from that specialty, which led me to concur in affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, there are other grounds upon which this may be treated as more or less a special case; indeed we were not referred to any case that was at all like it. The question we have to decide now is not whether we were right in affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, but merely whether we should give facilities to have the matter taken further.

If this be, as I think it is, a matter of procedure only, not touching any legitimate rights that the pursuer has, but merely the mode in which these rights are to be ascertained and, if ascertained, to be converted into money, then I think we should be stultifying ourselves and acting against the long-established practice of this Court if we granted leave to appeal. That practice has existed since 1866, and has been consistently followed since then. I think this Court is presumably as well able to judge of the procedure that is proper for dealing with cases before it as even the House of Lords. Accordingly, I agree with your Lordship that we should refuse this application.

Lord Guthrie.—I agree. I think the way in which the petitioner has stated his application is sufficient for its disposal. He says, "there being no special cause shown to the contrary." He does not deny that special cause is alleged. The Lord Ordinary has dealt with two matters which he thought amounted to "special cause," and we agree with him. If this motion were granted, such applications would be very frequent. The reports show that similar applications have come into Court raising exactly the same question—that is to say, whether the special cause that is alleged is or is not sufficient. These applications have all been refused, and refused by both Divisions, and I think we should follow the practice of the Court in this matter.

Nov. 26, 1913.
Frame v. Caledonian Railway Co.
Lord Guthrie.

THE COURT refused the petition.

DALGLEISH, DOBBIE, & Co., S.S.C.—HOPE, TODD, & KIRK, W.S.—Agents.

No. 13.

BRENES & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Constable, K.C.—Aitchison.
GEORGE DOWNIE AND ANDREW M'DOUGALL, Defenders (Respondents).—Cooper, K.C.—Normand.

Nov. 26, 1913.
Brenes & Co. v. Downie.

Company—Director—Personal liability—Breach of trust—Sums paid to company for specified purpose applied to another purpose.

A limited company, which consisted of two shareholders only who were also its sole directors, received from their foreign correspondents a sum of £1000 for the purpose, expressed in a covering-letter, of meeting three named bills drawn by them upon the company, which were shortly to become due. The company did not meet the bills on maturity, but the £1000 was applied, to the extent of £600, in repaying to one of the directors outlays averred to have been incurred by him on behalf of the company.

In an action by the foreign correspondents against the two directors personally, to which the company were not called as defenders,—

Held that the directors' actings constituted not merely breach of contract but breach of trust, for which they were personally liable, and decree pronounced against them, jointly and severally, for payment of the £600 claimed.

Observations (per Lord Johnston) on the difference in the matter of responsibility between directors of merely nominal companies consisting of two members and directors of ordinary companies consisting of a large number of members.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Hunter.

ON 26th May 1913 Brenes & Company, merchants in San José, Costa Rica, and C. S. S. Guthrie, merchant in London, their mandatary, brought an action against George Downie, coffee planter, and Andrew M'Dougall, solicitor, both in Edinburgh, for payment of the sum of £1550, 9s. 8d.

The following statement of the circumstances of the action is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Hunter):—

"In or about March 1912 the pursuers acted as representatives in the Republic of Costa Rica of a company called The Central and South American Land and Produce Company, Limited. Of that company the defenders were the sole directors and sole shareholders—the defender Downie being managing director, and the defender M'Dougall being secretary of the Company. The nominal capital of the Company was £25,000, divided into 25,000 shares of £1 each. Only £200 of the capital was subscribed, represented by the directors' qualification which was fixed by the articles of association at £100 each. The Company is now in liquidation, the First Division of the Court having, on 19th November 1912, pronounced an order for winding-up at the instance of the pursuers.

Nov. 26, 1913.

Brenes & Co. v. Downie.

"As representatives of the Company the pursuers were, under certain letters of credit, authorised to draw upon it for sums of money up to a fixed amount. In particular, a letter of credit, dated 1st April 1912," was in these terms:—"We hereby authorise you to draw upon us, at 90 d/sight, for any sum or sums, but not exceeding in all £10,000 (Ten thousand pounds) sterling, provided that you do not draw more than £1000—by any one mail, and that you send us cover for the drafts so drawn in first-class sight drafts on London, the said sight drafts to reach us at least seven days before the maturity of the drafts drawn by you under this credit. . . ."

"The pursuers say that in pursuance of these arrangements they, on 13th April 1912, drew on the Company three bills of exchange for £400, £200, and £400 respectively, all payable to the order of Herrero Hnos., at ninety days after sight, at the Bank of Scotland, Bishopsgate, London. One of the bills for £400 and the bill for £200 were, on 7th May 1912, accepted by the Company, payable at the Bank of Scotland, London, and they accordingly became due on 8th August 1912. The other bill for £400 was, on 9th May 1912, accepted by the Company, payable at the Bank of Scotland, London, and, accordingly, it became due on 10th August 1912.

"In article 6 of their condescendence the pursuers explain that, on 17th July 1912, they forwarded to the Company a sight draft, explaining the purpose of the remittance by letter to the Company in these terms—'to meet our drafts 002, 003, and 004 for £1000 in all which will shortly become due, we have the pleasure to enclose herein ch/ 0298 of this Banco Mercantil at sight on Messrs A. Rüffer & Sons, London, for the sum of £1000.' The defenders, or rather the Company, of which the defenders are sole shareholders and directors, failed to retire the bills, and the pursuers had to provide a second sum of £1000 for this purpose.

"The Company have paid to the pursuers £300 to account of this sum. The sum now sued for includes first the £700, being the balance of £1000 after credit for £300 paid to account being allowed, interest and expenses, and a sum of £750 as damages for the injury to the pursuers' credit occasioned by the dishonour of the bills."

In answer to Cond. 6, referred to above, the defenders stated:—"The letters of 17th July 1912 from pursuers to the Company and the draft, No. 0298, are referred to. Admitted that said bills were dishonoured at maturity. Quoad ultra denied, and explained that on 5th August 1912 the Company received from the pursuers draft No. 0299, dated 17th July, payable at sight drawn by the Banco Mercantil de Costa Rica, on A. Rüffer & Sons, London, for £1000, which draft was sent for collection on 6th August by the North of Scotland and Town and County Bank, and the amount thereof was credited to the Company in its account with said bank on 8th August. The pursuers were in breach of their agreement with the Company contained in the letter of credit of 1st April 1912 condescended on, which was the letter of credit upon which the said three bills of exchange for £400, £200, and £400 were drawn, in failing to send said draft to the Company on or before 1st August 1912. On 9th August the Company remitted the sum of £600 to the Bank of Scotland, London, with instructions to pay two of the said bills amounting to £600, and wrote to Messrs Baring Brothers & Company, Limited, requesting them not to present the other bill for £400 for payment until arrival of the next mail from Central America. The Bank of Scotland, London, to whom all the said bills had been presented, wrote to the Company that they could not pay the bills for £600 owing to uncertainty in their minds as to which bills the money was to be applied to, and had allowed them to go back on the drawers or holders. Messrs Baring Brothers & Company replied that the bill for £400 having passed out of their hands they could not do as the Company requested. The Company then made further efforts to find out in whose hands the bills were, with a view to paying the same, but their efforts were futile."

The following averments were also made upon record with reference to the transactions following upon the receipt by the Company, on 5th August, of the pursuers' draft for £1000:—(Cond. 7) "Up till 8th August 1912 the bankers of the Company were the Bank of Scotland, George Street Branch, Edinburgh. On that date, however, a new account was opened by the defenders in name of the Company with the North of Scotland and Town and County Bank, Limited, Edinburgh, when there was placed to the credit of the Company the sum of £1000, being the proceeds of the draft received by the defenders from the pursuers on 5th August as above mentioned. On the same day the defenders drew out of this new account two sums of £250 and £600 by cheque of the Company, and on 20th August a further sum of £500 was similarly drawn out." (Cond. 8) "The sum of £600 above referred to was, on 9th August 1912, remitted by the defenders to the Bank of Scotland, London. The pursuers believe and aver that it was not the intention of the defenders that the money so remitted should be applied in retiring the foresaid bills, and that they omitted to furnish the bank with such particulars regarding the bills as would have enabled them to be retired. The bank accordingly returned the remittance, and the said bills were dishonoured. Said sum of £600 so returned by the bank was received by the defenders, and on 16th August 1912 was lodged in the Company's account with the Bank of Scotland, George Street. On the following day the sum of £506, 19s. 1d. was placed to the credit of the Company in their account with the North of Scotland Bank, a corresponding sum being on the same day drawn out of the Company's account with the Bank of Scotland, George Street. On 20th August 1912 a sum of £500 was drawn out by the defender Downie from the North of Scotland Bank, and was debited to Downie personally in the Company's books. The sum of £250 drawn out on 8th August as above narrated was likewise debited to Downie. The defenders' statements in answer, so far as not coinciding herewith, are denied." (Ans. 7 and 8) "Denied under reference to answer 6. Explained that the Bank of Scotland, George Street Branch, Edinburgh, were the bankers of the Company to the date of liquidation, and that the Company also opened a new account with the North of Scotland and Town and County Bank, Limited, Edinburgh, on 8th August 1912. The respective bank accounts are referred to for the intromissions of the Company with these banks; and the books of the Company are referred to for the Company's transactions with the pursuers. The Bank of Scotland in London returned the sum of £600 which had been remitted to it by the Company for the express purpose of retiring pursuers' bills of £400 and £200, and said sum

Nov. 26, 1913.

Brenes & Co. v. Downie.

was lodged in the Company's account with the Bank of Scotland, George Street. Explained that the sums of £500 and £250 which were drawn out from the North of Scotland Bank by the Company and were debited to the defender Downie in the Company's books were due to the defender Downie from the Company. Downie had paid his travelling expenses in a journey to Central America on behalf of the Company out of his own pocket, and he was duly credited in the Company's books with these outlays. The payments so made to Downie in August and debited to him then, were paid to him in respect of the above-mentioned expenses. The defender M'Dougall was not lucratus by any of said transactions." (Cond. 11) "The defenders, as sole directors of the Company and as sole shareholders thereof, were aware of the specific purpose for which the said sum of £1000 was remitted to the Company by the pursuers, but failed to apply said sum to that purpose or to return the money when called upon. The defenders are liable to the pursuers for said sum of £700, in respect that to the extent of said sum the sum of £1000 remitted as aforesaid was converted either by the defenders, or by the Company with the defenders' privity and knowledge, to the use of the Company or of the defenders themselves. In so doing the defenders acted, or were privy to actings of the Company, in fraud of the pursuers' rights and in breach of trust. The defenders have received and still retain said sum of £700. The defenders are liable in damages to the pursuers for the loss, injury, and damage which the pursuers have sustained through their fraudulent acts."

The parties were also at issue (Cond. and Ans. 5) with regard to a sum of £100 represented by a bill for that amount drawn by the pursuers upon and paid by the Company on 14th May 1912. The defenders averred that this sum was still due to them by the pursuers, the pursuers maintaining that it had been granted in discharge of advances made by them to the Company.

On 21st October 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, before answer allows to the parties a proof of their respective averments on record, and appoints the same to proceed on a date to be afterwards fixed." *

---

* "OPINION.—[After the passage quoted above]—For the defenders it was maintained that the action ought to be dismissed as the person truly debtor to the pursuers is the Company, and as no averment is made that the Company is unable to meet the pursuers' claim. It was pointed out that if the defenders in their capacity as directors have misapplied or retained or become liable or accountable for any money or property of the Company, the Court may, on the application of the liquidator or of any creditor or contributory of the Company, examine into their conduct as directors and compel them to repay or restore the money of the company (sec. 215 of the Companies Act, 1908). On the other hand, the pursuers argued that if directors used or abused their position as directors to commit a wrong upon an individual they might be directly liable as wrongdoers. In the present case there are averments—which I need not go into in detail—to the effect that the defenders failed to employ the pursuers' remittance for the purpose of retiring the bills drawn upon the Company, and, on the contrary, used the money in meeting an alleged claim against the Company by the defender Downie, and that the pursuers have in consequence suffered damage. The averments made appear to me to make it advisable that there should be an inquiry before determining any of the pleas of

Nov. 26, 1913.

Brenes & Co. v. Downie.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 26th November 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong in allowing a proof of all the averments on record. The pursuers were entitled, on the record as it stood, to have decree de plano for the sum of £600 at least. That sum represented the unrefunded balance of the £1000, viz., £700, less the £100 dealt with in article 5 of the condescendence. As the parties were at issue on a question of fact with regard to this sum of £100 a proof should be allowed quoad it and also quoad the remaining items of the pursuers' claim. But as regarded the £600 there was no necessity for a proof, as there were admissions on record which entitled the pursuers to decree de plano. It was admitted (1) that in terms of the contract remittances were to be made for the purpose of retiring the bills; (2) that the remittance in question was made expressly for this purpose; and (3) that the defenders had not so applied the remittance, but had paid it into the pocket of one of themselves, for it was clear from the admissions and from the entries in the Company's bank account that what was paid to the defender Downie was part of the £1000 received from the pursuers. These circumstances distinguished the action from a mere claim for breach of contract; the appropriation of money remitted for a particular purpose and its application to other purposes was fraudulent.[1] In these circumstances it was not necessary for the pursuers to proceed against the Company, the party with whom the contract was made, for the defenders were liable, in respect of their fraudulent actings, jointly and severally with the Company. The pursuers might sue either or both of the joint wrongdoers, and the case of a company and its directors was no exception to this general rule of law.

Argued for the respondents;—It was only by establishing fraud against the defenders that the pursuers could make them liable in a question between themselves and the Company. But the Court would not pronounce decree in an action based on fraud without inquiry into the facts; it would always give the defenders an opportunity of showing that the averments were consistent with their innocence. If the pursuers were in a position to show that the Company was unable to meet the bills, and that its inability to do so was owing to the fraudulent action of the defenders, they might be entitled to succeed in the action. But the pursuers were not in this position: they had not taken any steps, either by claiming in the liquidation, as it was their duty to do, or otherwise, to show that the Company had no assets wherewith to meet the bills. Nor did their averments disclose fraud on the part of the defenders. The £1000 which they had remitted to the Company was not to be treated in law as earmarked for any specific purpose. The obligation of the Company parties. I cannot so read the record and admissions as to hold that I should be justified in the meantime in pronouncing decree for payment against the defenders for any part of the sum concluded for. I therefore allow a proof before answer."

---

[1] Palmer's Company Law, (9th ed.) p. 199; Pollock on Torts, (9th ed.) p. 75; Société Panhard & Levassor v. Panhard Levassor Motor Co., Limited, [1901] 2 Ch. 513; Blyth v. Maberly's Assignees, (1832) 10 S. 796, per Lord President Hope, at p. 801; Cullen v. Thomson's Trustees & Kerr, (1862) 4 Macq. 424; Macadam v. Martin's Trustee, (1872) 11 Macph. 33, per Lord Deas, at p. 37.

Nov. 26, 1913.

Brenes & Co. v. Downie.

was to meet the bills out of its general funds, not necessarily out of these particular funds. At the highest, the failure of the Company to meet the bills was a breach of contract by the Company for which the Company might be made liable in damages; it was not a breach of trust for which the directors could be made personally liable.[1] Where there was no fraudulent intention there could be no liability in respect of fraud, and the defenders were prepared to show, and were entitled to have the opportunity of showing, the absence of fraudulent intention. In any case, the situation was precisely that provided for by section 215 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), and the pursuers should have sought their remedy by claiming against the defenders in the liquidation.

At advising on 26th November 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pursuers ask decree now for the sum of £600 sterling, and I think they are entitled to have that decree, for I can find no averments in this record which require to be supported by parole evidence in order to establish the pursuers' case. In my opinion they require no parole evidence in support of their averments in order to secure a decree for £600. On the other hand, Mr Normand, who has said everything that could be said on behalf of the defenders, has been unable to point us to any averment in the defences which, if established by evidence, would enable him to resist decree for £600.

The pursuers' case, stated shortly, is this,—that they transmitted to this country a certain sum of money to be applied by the Company, of which the defenders are the only shareholders, to a specific purpose, that the money was received but that it was not applied to that purpose, but on the contrary that the defenders, or at all events one of the defenders, with the full knowledge and assent of the other, helped himself to the cash.

The facts are these: on 17th July 1912, the pursuers, who are apparently merchants in Central America, transmitted to this country a draft for £1000 sterling, which they specifically set forth in the letter in which it was enclosed was to be applied to meet three bills which are identified in the letter, bills of which the Company were acceptors and the pursuers were drawers. These bills matured at London and, at maturity, the sum contained in the draft was to be applied to retiring the bills. It is admitted that the transmission of the money was made in pursuance of an agreement which is expressed in a letter of credit, dated 1st April 1912; it is further admitted that the money was actually received in this country, and we have before us a minute of meeting of the Company at which the defenders, who are the sole shareholders and sole directors of the Company, were present, which recorded the receipt of the letter containing the £1000 and approved of the letter—in other words, the Company accepted the trust. It is further admitted on the record that the £1000 was placed to the credit of the Company in its account with its own bank on the 8th August. It is also admitted that not one penny of the £1000 was ever applied to retire the bills at maturity. It is admitted that, on the 8th August, one of the defenders, to wit Downie, drew upon the bank for £250 of the £1000 that was in the Company's account in order to be applied to the specific purpose I have mentioned, and that later in the month—on the 20th August—he drew a cheque for £500 upon the same account and received cash. It is further admitted upon the record that the £250 and £500 were applied by Downie to his own purposes, in other words in order to defray the expense which he had incurred during the year preceding in a visit to South America on the business of the Company.

[1] Wilson v. Lord Bury, (1880) 5 Q. B. D. 518, per Brett, L.J., at pp. 527-8.

It is not said in this record that M'Dougall, who was sole shareholder along with Downie and sole director of the Company along with Downie, was unaware of or disapproved of what was done. He does not, in short, separate himself from Downie. The defence given in is one given in for both defenders, and these are the facts plainly set forth in this record which are admitted and which require no parole proof to support them. There is, I think, a clear and unqualified admission on record for both defenders of misappropriation of this money.

I am of opinion that, inasmuch as there is a question of fact raised with regard to the balance of the money, mainly in connection with a bill which is set out in the 5th article of the condescendence and the 5th answer, we cannot give decree for the full sum which Downie drew from the bank and applied to his own purposes. But it appears to me that we are in a position now to give decree for the £600 which is claimed, without any parole evidence being required in support of the claim. I therefore come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor cannot be upheld, and that we should now give decree for £600 in favour of the pursuers, and quoad ultra affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor allowing a proof.

Lord Johnston.—I think that this case depends entirely upon the original contract between the parties as to the mode of conducting the credit out of which the whole question arises. On 1st April 1912 the defenders, through their managing director, George Downie, wrote authorising the pursuers to draw upon them at ninety days' sight for any sums, but not exceeding in all £10,000, provided that no more than £1000 should be drawn for by any one mail, and adding "and that you" (the pursuers) "send us" (the Company) "cover for the drafts so drawn in first-class sight drafts on London, said sight drafts to reach us at least seven days before the maturity of the drafts drawn by you under this credit." What followed was that a certain series of bills, to the amount of £1000, were drawn, were accepted, and fell due on certain dates in August 1912; that first-class sight drafts on London were, by letter of 17th July, forwarded and were received in London, but they were received a day or two too late to comply with the condition that they should "reach us at least seven days before the maturity" of the bills which had to be met.

Now, it seems to me that at that point the defenders were perfectly entitled to say, "We will dishonour these bills, because you have not complied with your obligation of putting us in funds to take them up." But if they had done that I cannot conceive that they could by any possibility have retained the drafts and placed the proceeds to their credit. What they did was neither to take up the bills nor to return the drafts. They therefore retained the money which had been sent to them for a definite purpose, and did not apply it to that purpose. At that stage they were considerably overdrawn with the Bank of Scotland in Edinburgh, and what they did was to open a new account with another bank, namely, the North of Scotland and Town and County Bank. They had no account there. They had had no transactions with that bank before, but they opened an account by placing to their credit the £1000 which belonged to the pursuers. I admit that at first they apparently intended to take up the bills, because they sent their cheque for £600 upon the North of Scotland and Town and County Bank to London pro tanto for that purpose. But then they sent it too late. The bills had been dishonoured; they could not be called in, and the proceeds of their cheque were returned to them, and replaced in their account. What is complained of is that, in that state of matters, Mr Downie, the defenders' managing director, drew for his own purpose upon an account which he knew contained nothing but the proceeds of drafts which had been sent to his Company under a definite contract to be applied to a definite purpose, and which had not been so applied. I cannot hold that that was anything other than misappropriating property which he had no right to touch.

Nov. 26, 1913.

Brenes & Co. v. Downie.

Ld. Johnston.

I wish to distinguish this case from any of the cases quoted to us. This is technically a registered Company, but it is one of those private companies which it is now possible to create, consisting of two gentlemen who themselves are the directors, and themselves are the shareholders, and therefore themselves are the Company. I cannot regard this sort of company as similar to those with which the cases to which we were referred were concerned. The directors of an ordinary limited public company cannot, of course, know the whole details of the company's banking accounts. I regard this case as one in which there is a company only in name; it consisted of two individuals knowing everything that was done in the company, and knowing, in particular, that the only sum that they had to draw upon was a sum placed in their hands for a definite purpose and under a definite obligation, and they actively and passively allowed it to be appropriated to the private purposes of one of them.

Under these circumstances I agree in the conclusion to which your Lordship has come.

Lord Mackenzie.—I am of the same opinion as your Lordships, and think that the pursuers are entitled to decree de plano for the sum of £600. I do so upon the ground that it sufficiently appears from the papers before us that the defenders have been guilty of a breach of trust, and not merely of a breach of contract.

I think that the fund of £1000, of which the £600 forms a part, was received by the defenders, Mr Downie and Mr M'Dougall, as trustees in order that it might be applied to a specific purpose. That purpose is defined by the letters of 1st April 1912 and 17th July 1912, in the latter of which it is distinctly stated that "the money is sent to meet our drafts." There is sufficient in the print to show that not only did the defenders not apply it to the purpose for which it was sent, but also that they never proposed or offered to return the draft which had been sent. Therefore the nature of the claim in the present case is that the pursuers come forward and say, pointing to the admission of the receipt by Mr Downie of two sums of £250 and £500, "that is our money."

The money never became the property of the defenders, and the pursuers are entitled to vindicate it and get a decree against the defenders personally for repayment. I am unable to see anything stated upon the defenders' side of the record which, if proved, would entitle them to resist the present demand. Further, I was unable, from the very able statement of Mr Normand, to gather any fact, whether appearing on the record or not, which if proved would avail his clients in the very least.

It was pointed out that there was a distinction between the position of Mr M'Dougall and that of Mr Downie, but there is really no difference between them in regard to this matter. The person who actually received the money of which Mr M'Dougall was a trustee was Mr Downie, but nowhere on the record does Mr M'Dougall dissociate himself from anything Mr Downie did. Accordingly, I think that the two defenders are liable jointly and severally for the money which was misappropriated, and therefore I agree with the judgment proposed by your Lordships.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I concur.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having considered the reclaiming note for the pursuers against the interlocutor of Lord Hunter, dated 21st October 1913, and heard counsel for the parties, recall said interlocutor: hoc statu decern against the defenders jointly and severally for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £600, being a portion of the sum concluded for: Quoad ultra, before answer, allow to the parties a proof of their respective averments on record and remit to the Lord Ordinary to take the said proof and to proceed as accords. . . ."

E. I. FINDLAY, S.S.C.—ANDREW M'DOUGALL, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 14.

Nov. 28, 1913.

Shedden's Trustee v. Dykes.

WILLIAM KENNETH (Miss Janet Shedden's Trustee), First Party.—Anderson, K.C.—Aitchison.

MRS MARGARET DYKES, Second Party.—Constable, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

THE ROYAL HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN, GLASGOW, Third Party.—Cooper, K.C.—A. Brown.

Trust — Exercise of discretionary powers — Delectus personæ — Assumed trustee.

A testatrix by her settlement appointed two persons to be her trustees and executors (the appointment of one of them being afterwards recalled by codicil), and conveyed to them her whole estate. The trust purposes included a direction to divide the residue among such charitable institutions in Glasgow, and in such proportions "as my trustees in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion shall decide." The deed was silent as to the assumption of new trustees. On the testatrix's death the sole nominated trustee accepted office and, after assuming a new trustee in virtue of the statutory power to do so, died without having taken any steps to distribute the residue.

Held on a construction of the terms of the settlement that, as there was no indication that the testatrix intended to limit the exercise of the discretionary power with regard to residue to the trustee nominated by her, that power could be validly exercised by the assumed trustee.

1ST DIVISION. ON 25th October 1912 a special case was presented for the opinion of the Court with reference to a question as to the powers of an assumed trustee, being the sole acting trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of Miss Janet Shedden. William Kenneth, the trustee, was the first party to the case; Mrs Margaret Dykes, the testatrix's sole next of kin, was the second party; and the Royal Hospital for Sick Children, Glasgow, was the third party.

Miss Shedden's will, which was dated 11th February 1904, was in the following terms:—"I, Miss Janet Shedden, . . . do hereby assign, dispone, and convey the whole means and estate of every description, heritable and moveable, wherever situated, that shall belong and be owing to me at the time of my decease, to Robert Scott Stewart, solicitor in Glasgow, and Andrew Stewart, solicitor in Glasgow, and the acceptor and survivor of them, as trustees and trustee for the purposes after specified; and I nominate and appoint the said Robert Scott Stewart and Andrew Stewart, and the acceptor and survivor of them, to be my executors and executor: But these presents are granted in trust always for the purposes following, videlicet:—(First) I direct my trustees to pay all my just debts, sickbed and funeral expenses, and the expenses of the trust hereby created: (Second) I give and bequeath the legacies following to the following persons and others respectively, and direct my trustees to pay the same accordingly, namely:—(Primo) £50 to each of my said trustees who shall accept office under these presents —[Here followed a number of other pecuniary legacies]—And said legacies shall all be paid as soon as possible after the lapse of six months from my decease, with interest from and after the lapse of such six months at the average rate of interest, if any, that my trustees shall have received from my estate, howsoever the same may be invested or wheresoever the same may be: And my trustees shall be the absolute judges as to what such average rate of interest is or shall be . . . and should there be any doubt as to the respective legatees, or any of them, whom it is my intention to favour, my trustees shall be the only judges in the matter . . . (Third) I give and bequeath the whole residue and remainder of my estate and all free proceeds thereof to my trustees, to be by them paid, divided, and distributed to and among such charitable and philanthropic societies, institutions, and objects in or connected with Glasgow, and in such sums and proportions to each, or the whole to any one of such societies, institutions, or objects, all as my trustees in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion shall decide; and I declare that the judgment and action of my trustees in such payment, division, and distribution shall be absolute and unchallengeable by or at the instance of any person or persons, or others whatsoever, and that the mere receipts of the respective secretaries, treasurers, or other officials of the respective objects that my trustees shall select as to take benefit under this present provision shall fully discharge and exonerate my trustees of all sums of money that my trustees shall actually pay bearing to be in virtue hereof: And further, I declare that I have not favoured those of my relatives, whom I might otherwise have been inclined to favour, because they have not made any attempt to show to me, nor did they attempt to show to my late sister any such affection or attention as I or she might have expected: And I empower my trustees to sell the whole or any part of my estate by public roup or private bargain, and to employ a law-agent or law-agents, who may be of my said trustees' own number, or any firm of which they or either of them may be the partners or a partner . . . and notwithstanding that I have bequeathed to each of my said trustees who shall accept the foresaid legacy of £50, I declare that my said trustees shall have and enjoy all the immunities and privileges of gratuitous trustees . . ."

By codicil, dated 5th April 1907, Miss Shedden recalled the appointment of Robert Scott Stewart as trustee and executor under the will.

Miss Shedden died on 3rd June 1910, and Andrew Stewart accepted office as trustee and executor, and proceeded to administer the estate in terms of the settlement. By deed of assumption dated 30th September 1910, he assumed William Kenneth as a trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement, and along with him continued to administer the trust-estate. Andrew Stewart died on 29th December 1910, and thereafter William Kenneth, as the sole trustee acting under the said trust-disposition and settlement, continued the administration of the estate.

The estate left by the testatrix consisted wholly of moveables, and amounted to £6000 or thereby. After fulfilling all the trust purposes except the provision dealing with residue, there remained a sum of £3937, 1s. 2d. representing the residue of the estate. No allocation had been made by the trustees up to the date of Andrew Stewart's death, but William Kenneth by minute, dated 22nd December 1911, bearing to be in exercise of the discretionary powers conferred by the third purpose of the settlement, allocated a sum of £500 to the third party, the Royal Hospital for Sick Children, Glasgow.

A question having arisen as to right of the assumed trustee to exercise the discretionary power with regard to the residue, this special case was presented for its determination. The contention of the first and third parties was that, as Andrew Stewart had by force of statute power to assume new trustees, the new trustee assumed

Nov. 28, 1913.

Shedden's Trustee v. Dykes.

by him had all the powers conferred by the testatrix on the original trustee, and accordingly had validly exercised these powers in allocating a share of residue to the third parties. The contention of the second party was that the discretionary powers conferred on Andrew Stewart were personal to him, and lapsed on his death, and accordingly that the residue had fallen into intestacy, and was payable to her as the sole next of kin of the testatrix. The second party also stated a contention that the residuary bequest was void from uncertainty, but this contention was not maintained at the debate.

The questions of law were:—"(1) Is the bequest of residue in the third purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement void from uncertainty? (2) If the preceding question is answered in the negative, (a) Is the first party, as assumed trustee foresaid, entitled to exercise the discretionary powers as to residue contained in the said purpose? or, (b) Did the residue of the estate of the testatrix fall into intestacy upon the death of the said Andrew Stewart without having exercised the discretionary powers conferred by the settlement?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 5th, 18th, and 19th November 1913.

Argued for the second party;—No power was conferred by the testatrix upon her trustees to assume new trustees, for the clause conferring the privileges and immunities of gratuitous trustees could not be so interpreted; it was clearly introduced only to provide for resignations. Where then a testamentary deed contained no power to assume new trustees, and also conferred on the original trustees not only a discretion to apportion but, as here, a discretion to select the objects themselves of the testator's bounty, the presumption was that this wide discretion was conferred only on the trustees selected by the testator himself, those with regard to whom he had exercised a delectus personæ. In such circumstances the Court would not authorise the exercise of this discretion by a judicial factor or by assumed trustees.[1] No doubt the testatrix might have contemplated administration by a succession of trustees in the event of the resignation or death of the single trustee whom she had appointed, but that succession was with regard to acts of administration only, and did not extend to the exercise of the personal discretion for which she had selected the original trustee. A distinction had been recognised in Scotland and also in England between powers of administration and powers of such wide discretion as had been conferred in the present case. The presence or absence of a power of assuming new trustees was an important element in testing which class of powers assumed trustees were intended to possess, and in the absence of a power of assumption ordinary acts of administration would alone be held to be within their competence.[2] The only apparent conflict with this principle in the [1] Dick v. Ferguson, (1758) M. 7446; Ireland v. Glass, (1833) 11 S. 626; Allan, (1869) 8 Macph. 139; Hill's Trustees v. Thomson, (1874) 2 R. 68; Simson, &c., (1883) 10 R. 540, Lord President Inglis, at p. 543-4; Robbie's Judicial Factor v. Macrae, (1893) 20 R. 358, Lord M'Laren, at p. 362; Grieve's Trustees v. Wilson and Others, (1904) 12 S. L. T. 347, Lord Low, at pp. 347-8.

---

[2] Simson, &c., 10 R. 540, Lord President Inglis, at p. 544; Robbie's Judicial Factor v. Macrae, 20 R. 358, Lord M'Laren, at p. 363; Cole v. Wade, (1807) 16 Vesey, 27, Sir W. Grant, M.R., at p. 44; Walter v. Maunde, (1810) 19 Vesey, 423, Lord Eldon, L.C., at p. 424.

English decisions arose from a case in which reliance had been placed on the judgment of three executors and only two were acting.[1] If, however, there was any difference now in English law it was in consequence of section 37 of the Trustee Act, 1893,[2] which did not apply to Scotland. But whatever might be the present rule in England, it was well settled in Scotland that, if discretionary powers were conferred upon trustees named, the burden lay on those who sought to overcome the implication of delectus personæ and to have it found that the discretionary powers conferred could be exercised by others.[3] If there had been no settled rule of law in Scotland the law of England might usefully have been referred to, but not if in Scotland the law was well settled.

Argued for the third party;—The true test was whether the terms of a settlement contained anything to indicate an intention that the powers conferred thereby should be exercised exclusively by the trustees therein named.[4] There was no such indication here; on the contrary, the settlement contained indications to the opposite effect. For example the testatrix's express declaration of her reason for not favouring her relatives made it clear that she desired the residuary clause of her settlement to be carried out by any holder of the office of trustee, rather than that it should fail and the residue be thrown into intestacy. Further, whenever she desired to refer to the individuals she had named as her trustees she spoke of them as "my said trustees," whenever she desired to refer merely to the holders of the office of trustee she spoke of them as "my trustees," and the latter was the expression used in conferring the discretionary power with regard to residue. Moreover, she had conferred upon her trustees the immunities and privileges of gratuitous trustees, and her settlement must be held to have been written in knowledge of the statutory effects resulting from that provision, including the powers of resignation and of assumption of new trustees.[5] Also there were various matters demanding the attention of the trustees before the residue could be disposed of, and accordingly the testatrix must have been aware that by that time the original trustees might have ceased to act, and that others would have uncontrolled discretion in the distribution of the residue. It could not therefore be maintained that this settlement gave any indication of delectus personæ with reference to the persons who were to exercise the discretionary powers conferred, or any indication that the testatrix intended to draw a distinction between ordinary powers of administration and these discretionary powers. In the absence of delectus personæ trustees assumed or appointed by the Court could exercise the discretionary powers conferred by the deed on the original trustees.[6]

---

[1] Crawford v. Forshaw, [1891] 2 Ch. 261, Bowen, L.J., at p. 268. Cf. Eastick v. Smith, [1904] 1 Ch. 139, Farwell, J., at p. 142; Lewin on Trusts, (12th ed.) 754; Sykes v. Sheard, (1863) 2 De G. J. & S. 6; Hibbard v. Lamb, (1756) Amb. 309; Farwell on Powers, (2nd ed.) 460.

[2] 56 and 57 Vict. cap. 53.

[3] Campbell & M'Intyre v. M'Intyres, (1824) 3 S. 126 (N. E.) 85; Laurie and Another v. Brown and Others, 1911, 1 S. L. T. 84.

[4] Hill's Trustees v. Thomson, 2 R. 68, Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, at p. 69; Grieve's Trustees v. Wilson and Others, 12 S. L. T. 347, Lord Low, at p. 347.

[5] Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84), sec. 1.

[6] Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), secs. 1 and 12.

Nov. 28, 1913.

Shedden's Trustee v. Dykes.

The Outer House decision in Blair v. Macfarlane's Trustees[1] was directly in point. The cases relied on by the second parties were distinguishable. Dick v. Ferguson[2] was an action of reduction arising under quite different circumstances, and the other cases[3] were instances where the deeds in question contained expressions which implied a delectus personæ. It was to be noted too that in England discretionary powers could be exercised by trustees whether named by the truster or not, unless there was a clear indication of personal confidence in the trustees named.[4] But if the law of England operated against what was manifestly the intention of the testatrix in the present case, viz., that the powers conferred by her should be exercised by any holders of the office of trustee, that law could not affect the decision of the case, because the testatrix could not be held to have known the law of England, or to have made her settlement with that law in view.

The first party adopted the argument presented for the third party.

At advising on 28th November 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question presented for our consideration in this special case is whether the assumed trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of Miss Janet Shedden may validly exercise a discretionary power which the testatrix confided to her original trustee. I am of opinion that he can.

As is not unusual the trust-disposition is silent here on the subject of the assumption of trustees, and, that being so, we must hold that the deed contains a power of assumption, the contrary not being expressed. That has been the law of Scotland by statutory enactment since the year 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 84, sec. 1). The precise effect of the statute is equivalent to an inscription in the deed of a power of assumption of new trustees. The trustee thus assumed derives his authority from the testatrix, and from the moment of his appointment is, I think, clothed with all the powers, discretionary and otherwise, confided to the original trustee, unless the testatrix has clearly indicated a contrary intention. No contrary intention is to be found in the deed before us, because the residuary clause runs as follows:—"I give and bequeath the whole residue and remainder of my estate and all free proceeds thereof to my trustees, to be by them paid, divided, and distributed to and among such charitable and philanthropic societies, institutions, and objects in or connected with Glasgow, and in such sums and proportions to each, or the whole to any one of such societies, institutions, or objects, all as my trustees in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion shall decide; and I declare that the judgment and action of my trustees in such payment, division, and distribution shall be absolute and unchallengeable."

---

[1] (1896) 4 S. L. T. 23.

[2] M. 7446.

[3] Hill's Trustees v. Thomson, 2 R. 68; Simson, &c., 10 R. 540, Lord Deas, at p. 545, Lord Shand, at p. 546; Robbie's Judicial Factor v. Macrae, 20 R. 358, Lord M'Laren, at p. 361.

[4] Cole v. Wade, 16 Vesey, 27, Sir William Grant, M.R., at p. 45; Byam v. Byam, (1854) 19 Beav. 58, Sir John Romilly, M.R., at p. 66; Crawford v. Forshaw, [1891] 2 Ch. 261, Kay, L.J., at p. 269; Eastick v. Smith, [1904] 1 Ch. 139.

It is impossible, I think, to spell out of the residue clause so expressed anything approaching delectus personæ. The powers are here conferred, as I read the deed, on "my trustees, whoever they may be," whether original, assumed, or, it may be, nominated by the Court. If they are lawfully in the saddle they are clothed with these discretionary powers. They are given to "my trustees" as trustees and not as selected individuals. The powers are no doubt wide; for they embrace not merely the apportionment of the residue among the charities but also the selection of the objects of the testatrix's bounty. But however wide they may be, inasmuch as the testatrix has virtually empowered her original trustee to assume a new trustee without placing any limitation upon the exercise of the powers conferred by the settlement, it would not be in our power, I think, even if we desired, to limit the powers of the assumed trustee.

There are more ways than one in which a testator may indicate an intention to deny to an assumed trustee powers confided to original trustees, but the question whether or no there is delectus personæ, it appears to me, cannot be determined, either solely or mainly, by an examination of the discretionary powers given or by the difficulty or delicacy of the exercise of these powers. If a testator desires to debar an assumed trustee from exercising discretionary powers it is very easy to say so; and, if it is not said either expressly or impliedly, I know no reason why the Court should assume that it is intended. To place an assumed trustee in a position of inferiority—to place an exceptional disability upon an assumed trustee—would, it appears to me, tend to defeat the object of the statute as well as the object of the testator, for the very type of man who would naturally be selected to be a trustee by the original trustee—or, it may be, by the Court—to exercise discretionary powers would, of course, refuse to take office if he were placed in an inferior position, a position of disqualification in contrast to the original trustees. And we can see very plainly in the present instance how entirely the intentions of this testatrix would be frustrated if we sustained the contentions of the second party.

In expressing this opinion I have had fully in view all the Scottish authorities which were quoted to us, and I am satisfied that my opinion is not in conflict, but on the contrary is in harmony, with all the prior cases. It is no doubt satisfactory to find that the law of England, in this chapter, runs parallel with the law of Scotland. But the similarity between the two systems of jurisprudence ought not, in my opinion, to affect our judgment here. Both sides of the bar maintained that the law of England was in favour of their contention, but both sides of the bar very frankly acknowledged that, had it been otherwise, they would have invited us to reject the law of England. And we would have done so, for after all in these will cases the sole object of the Court is to ascertain and to give effect to the intention of the testator; and I cannot, for my part, hold that a Scotch testatrix, or her man of business, in framing a Scotch settlement is bound to know and to have in view the law of a foreign state.

I am therefore for answering the first question, as we were invited to do, in the negative, the first alternative of the second question in the affirmative, and the second alternative of that question in the negative.

Nov. 28, 1913.

Shedden's Trustee v. Dykes.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur in the result at which your Lordship has arrived. We have had in this case a very able and anxious argument on the general question, as well as the special question raised in this case; but I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, I treat the case entirely as a case with special circumstances, enabling one to arrive at a conclusion without any consideration of the more general questions, on which I desire to reserve my opinion.

I agree with your Lordship that the trust-settlement in question must, from its terms, be taken to be written in view of the statutory provisions which admit of the assumption of new trustees. It is very probable that the testatrix did not fully appreciate the distinction between original and assumed trustees, or know anything about the provisions of the Trusts Acts, but all this was certainly before those who drew her will, and their understanding must be held to be her understanding if she puts her signature to the deed which they prepared.

That being so, what I find is that there is in the settlement a marked distinction between the expressions which apply solely to the trustees nominated and the expressions which apply to trustees generally. Where she refers solely to the two trustees nominated, Mr Robert Scott Stewart and Mr Andrew Stewart, she carefully distinguishes them as "my said trustees." Where she refers to her trustees generally she refers to them as "my trustees." I think that she meant to distinguish, and that the distinction is perfectly sufficient for the decision of this case, because when she comes to bequeath the residue of her estate for such charitable objects and in such proportions, "all as my trustees in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion shall decide," she does not use the special term "my said trustees," but the general term "my trustees."

I am by no means desirous of touching upon the more general question, because I am not satisfied that, given terms different from what we have here, such a discretion given to trustees would not be properly confined to the trustees nominated. And I am moved a good deal in that direction by the consideration that it was only with very great difficulty that the Courts came to hold that a bequest such as this—to charitable societies to be selected by someone else—was not a delegation of the power of testing which could not be supported at law. This seems to me to be a considerable extension of these decisions, because it is not merely the delegation to persons named to select the objects of the testator's testamentary intention, but the delegation to persons named to choose other persons to choose the objects of the testator's testamentary intention.

I therefore desire to reserve my opinion upon the general question, and still more so upon the question whether such powers can be competently transferred to the nominees of the Court, whether trustees or judicial factors.

LORD MACKENZIE.—The question in this case is whether an assumed trustee is entitled to exercise the discretionary powers contained in the settlement. The duty of the Court is to carry out the intention of the testatrix as expressed by her. The determination of the question, therefore, depends, in my opinion, upon the construction to be put upon the terms of the settlement. If from the language used it appears that there was a special delectus personæ the discretionary power will not transmit. If, however, there is no reason for holding that the testatrix intended there should be any special delectus personæ, there is no reason why the powers should not be exercised by an assumed as well as by the original trustees.

The position of matters was that at the date of the death of the testatrix there was only one trustee nominated by her, the appointment of the other having been revoked by codicil. That she contemplated that this trustee might resign sufficiently appears from the declaration that the original trustees, notwithstanding they were legatees under the settlement, should have and enjoy all the immunities and privileges of gratuitous trustees. This included power to resign, which was only conferred by statute. Although no express power to assume new trustees is given by the settlement, this, to my mind, is not of importance, because there must be read into it the statutory power of assumption, and the testatrix must be presumed to have known the law in regard to this. It must therefore be held that the testatrix did not intend the trust purposes to fail through failure of the original trustees.

It was argued, however, that the powers conferred under the third purpose are so wide, being powers of selection and not mere administration, that this afforded ground for holding that they were only to be exercised by the original trustees. The fact that the testatrix conferred this power on "my trustees," and not on "my said trustees" (the expression used in other parts of the settlement), shows that she did not limit the exercise to the trustees nominated by herself only. Further, I cannot leave out of view that there is in the settlement an express declaration of her reason for not favouring her relatives, which I think goes to support the argument against the claim of the next of kin. It was not contended that the third purpose was void from uncertainty, nor do I think in view of recent authorities that there was room for argument on this point.

It is not necessary to review the authorities in Scotland as the question is one of construction. We are not here concerned with the question whether discretionary powers such as these could be exercised by a judicial factor, who is an officer of Court. Therefore the case is not the same as that of Robbie's Judicial Factor.[1] The decisions in the Outer House by Lord Kincairney in the cases of Blair (John Macfarlane's Trustee) v. Malcolm David Macfarlane's Trustees, and Blair and Another (Malcolm Macfarlane's Trustees) v. Helen Macfarlane's Trustees and Others,[2] appear on all fours with the present. The observations of Lord Low in the case of Grieve's Trustees[3] were made with reference to purposes of a very peculiar character. We were referred to a number of cases in England, the more recent of which certainly contain nothing contrary to the conclusion at which I arrive. If I may say so, it appears to me that what Bowen, L.J., says in the case of Crawford v. Forshaw,[4] might well be taken as applicable to the case in hand: "I regard this case as purely one of construction—one

[1] 20 R. 358.
[2] 4 S. L. T. 22 and 23.
[3] 12 S. L. T. 347.
[4] [1891] 2 Ch., at p. 267.

Nov. 28, 1913.

Shedden's Trustee v. Dykes.

Lord Mackenzie.

in which, therefore, we may well be guided, and in which I am personally very glad to be guided, by the reasoning in previous cases, and by general principles of law, but in which we are not concluded by authority." It was argued that the law as regards assumed trustees in England was statutory, and we were referred to the Act 56 and 57 Vict. c. 53, sec. 37. This, however, only applies to trustees appointed by the Court.

I am therefore of opinion that question 2 (a) should be answered in the affirmative, and the other questions as proposed by your Lordship.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree for the reasons explained by your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT answered question 1 in the negative and question 2 (a) in the affirmative and 2 (b) in the negative.

DOVE, LOCKHART, & SMART, S.S.C.—E. A. & F. HUNTER & Co., W.S.—MARTIN, MILLIGAN, & MACDONALD, W.S.—Agents.

No. 15.

Nov. 28, 1913.

J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.

JOHN & CHARLES MURRAY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Horne, K.C.—MacRobert.

WALLACE, MARRS, & COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Murray, K.C.—Macmillan, K.C.—Lippe.

Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Subjects arrestable—Accountability—Sum in hands of bank—Bank not liable to account directly to common debtor.

Personal bar—Arrestment—Obligation to pay "nett cash"—Cash paid to bank for payee—Right of payer to arrest in hands of bank.

A London firm sold to a Glasgow firm a quantity of iron, which was to be shipped to Scottish ports and to be paid for "nett cash against shipping documents." When the iron had reached the ports of destination the sellers handed the shipping documents to their bank in London with instructions to obtain payment of the price from the purchasers, and the bank sent on the documents to their correspondents, a bank in Glasgow, with instructions to carry through the transaction. The Glasgow bank accordingly, in exchange for the documents, obtained payment from the purchasers of the price, and entered it in their books to the credit of the London bank. An hour afterwards the purchasers arrested this money in the hands of the Glasgow bank to found jurisdiction against the sellers in an action of damages.

Held that, as the Glasgow bank were under no duty to account for this money to the sellers, but only to the London bank who had employed them, the arrestments were inept to found jurisdiction.

Held further (rev. judgment of Lord Dewar, diss. Lord Mackenzie) that the purchasers were not barred by the terms of their contract with the sellers from attempting to arrest the cash payment which they had themselves made.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Dewar.

ON 6th August 1912 John & Charles Murray, metal merchants, Bothwell Street, Glasgow, brought an action of damages for failure to implement the terms of a contract against Wallace, Marrs, & Company, metal merchants in London.

The following narrative is quoted from the opinion of the Lord President:—

"This case relates to the validity of an arrestment to found jurisdic-

Nov. 28, 1913.

J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.

tion. The facts are as follows. The pursuers are iron merchants in Glasgow, the defenders iron merchants in London. A contract for the sale of a quantity of iron bars was entered into between the parties—the pursuers being the buyers and the defenders the sellers of the iron. A portion of the goods was shipped to Grangemouth, another portion to Glasgow. The terms of settlement, as expressed in the contract, were 'nett cash against shipping documents.' Accordingly, on the 31st of July 1912 the defenders, the sellers, instructed their bankers in London, viz., the London County and Westminster Bank, to collect cash from the pursuers in exchange for the shipping documents, which they had transmitted to their London Bank. At the same time they directed the London Bank when the cash (£890, 7s. 11d.) was received to place it to their, the defenders', credit in their account with the London Bank. On the following day the London Bank proceeded to carry out these instructions by in turn transmitting the shipping documents to their correspondents in Glasgow, the Commercial Bank, with instructions to collect the cash from the pursuers, and to hand over to them the bills of lading. The Commercial Bank on 2nd August fulfilled these directions. They received the cash at two o'clock on the afternoon of the 2nd; they handed over the shipping documents (the bills of lading) to the pursuers; and in due course they placed the cash received, £890, 7s. 11d., to the credit of the London Bank, and intimated that they had done so. About an hour later the pursuers laid on an arrestment to found jurisdiction by virtue of letters of arrestment obtained from the Sheriff of Lanarkshire. It is the validity of that arrestment which is now in question."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) In respect that the defenders are not subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, the action should be dismissed.

On 27th February 1913, after a proof, the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders and dismissed the action.*

---

* "OPINION.—The question for decision here is whether jurisdiction has been competently founded against the defenders—a firm of London metal merchants—in respect of arrestments laid on by the pursuers jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

"In December 1911 and January and February 1912, the pursuers, who are metal merchants in Glasgow, entered into several contracts with the defenders, whereby the defenders agreed to deliver a large quantity of Continental iron bars. The pursuers allege that the defenders failed to implement their contracts, and they have brought this action of damages against them, having laid on arrestments to found jurisdiction.

"It appears from the evidence that in July 1912 the defenders undertook to ship a consignment of bars to Scotland, provided the pursuers agreed to pay cash against presentation of bills of lading. The pursuers having agreed to do so, the defenders shipped the goods to Grangemouth, and on 1st August sent the bills of lading, together with an account (No. 28 of process), to their bankers, the London County and Westminster Bank, with instructions to deliver the documents in exchange for the money—a sum of £890, 7s. 11d. On the same day the London bankers forwarded these documents to their Glasgow correspondents, the Commercial Bank, with instructions to carry out the transaction. On 2nd August the pursuers, having received an order notice from the Commercial Bank, paid over the money and received the bills of lading in exchange. But they had previ-

Nov. 28, 1913.

J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 22nd and 23rd May 1913.

On 7th June the Court pronounced an interlocutor allowing the defenders to amend the record, and allowed the parties a proof with regard to the amendments.

The defenders accordingly amended their answers by adding an averment in the following terms:—"Explained . . . that in any event the pursuers were not entitled to arrest the funds alleged to have been attached in respect of a special obligation undertaken by them to pay over to the defenders the said funds in exchange for shipping documents handed to the pursuers thereagainst. The alleged arrestment was contrary to the good faith of the pursuers' said undertaking and in breach of the said obligation."

They also added the following plea:—(2) The alleged arrestment being in breach of the obligation undertaken by the pursuers and ously arranged with their solicitors that, when the money was paid over, it should immediately be arrested to found jurisdiction. The money was paid at two o'clock, and the arrestments were laid on at three. The parties had been in correspondence for some time previously regarding this transaction, and the letters show that the defenders were careful to stipulate that they should receive the cash in exchange for the documents, and the pursuers agreed to these terms but they did not disclose to the defenders that they had arranged to arrest the money when they had obtained possession of the documents.

---

"The defenders' name appears both on the account and on the bills of lading, but it appears that in a banking transaction, such as this, no notice is taken of this. The practice is for the collecting bank to account only to the instructing bank.

"In these circumstances the pursuers maintained that the arrestment was valid: that, although the Commercial Bank may have considered itself accountable to the London bank alone, yet it was truly accountable to the defenders, whose names were disclosed on the account and bills of lading. To this the defenders replied that there was no contract between the arrestees and the defenders, and they were not accountable to them. If they were not identified with the defenders then they were not directly debtors to the common debtors, and the arrestment was invalid. If, on the other hand, they were in reality identified with the defenders, then there was not such independent possession as could be the foundation of an arrestment. And further, and in any case, they argued that the pursuers were personally barred from using arrestment, in respect that they had agreed to transmit the money if they got possession of the documents, and to prevent the transmission of the money in such circumstances was contrary to good faith.

"In the view I take of the case, I do not think that I require to determine what the true position of the bank was in the transaction, because I am of opinion that the defenders are right in their contention that the pursuers are, in the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, barred by their actings. They agreed that if they obtained possession of the documents they would immediately transmit the money to the defenders. They got the documents and they did not transmit the money, and the evidence shows that they never intended to do so. They instructed their solicitors to lay a nexus on it to prevent that very transmission which they had promised and on the faith of which they had obtained the documents. I do not think that they were entitled to do that. I was not referred to any case where a point precisely similar had been considered; but there are a number of decisions which show that the Court will not sanction an arrestment where the arrester has not treated his opponent quite frankly or fairly. Thus when an arrestment is made possible by illegal use, or mala fides, or negligence contrary to the good faith of their undertaking as condescended on, the pursuers are barred personali exceptione from maintaining that jurisdiction has been constituted against the defenders.

After further proof before Lord Mackenzie, the import of which is set forth in his Lordship's opinion, the case was further heard before the First Division on 14th and 15th November 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The test of whether money was arrestable was whether the arrestee was bound to account for the money to the common debtor. Here the Glasgow Bank was bound to account to the defenders, and the interposition of the London Bank was immaterial. Although the Glasgow Bank was primarily bound to pay over the money to the London Bank, the London Bank was merely the hand of the defenders in the matter; the defenders could have brought a direct action against the Glasgow Bank for payment, and (as it was not suggested that the defenders were overdrawn with their London Bank) could have interdicted the Glasgow Bank from paying over the money to the London Bank. Accordingly, if a direct right of action was necessary, that condition also was fulfilled here.[1] Further, the Glasgow Bank could not have set off this money against any claim they might have against the London Bank, nor could a creditor of the London Bank have arrested the money in their hands. The money was not credited to the defenders by the London Bank until it had reached their hands, and if it had been lost on the way the loss would have fallen on the defenders. Further, there was clearly privity of contract between the Glasgow Bank and the defenders, because when the defenders employed the London Bank to collect the money in Glasgow, that bank quite legitimately delegated the duty to the Glasgow Bank, and delegated it in terms which disclosed the names of their principals and the whole nature of the transaction.[2] Accordingly, all the requisites of accountability on the part of the Glasgow Bank to the defenders were present here, and the money had been validly arrested.[3] (2) The pursuers were not barred by the terms of the contract, or by the correspondence, from exercising their undoubted right of arrestment. The cases founded on by the Lord Ordinary[4] were cases where there of the arrester, the arrestment is held ineffectual. In the case of Rintoul, 1 Macph. 137, where the arrester had wrongfully withheld a delivery-order for goods till arrestments could be used, the arrestments were recalled on the ground that 'this is a style of practice which cannot be sanctioned, and ought not to be encouraged . . . just a trick, and the parties who played it should not get the benefit of it.' See also Heron, 22 R. 182; Trowsdale's Trustee, 9 Macph. 88; Campbell, 21 D. 63.

---

"In the present case I think the use of arrestment was contrary to the good faith of what passed between the parties. I accordingly sustain the first plea in law for the defenders and dismiss the action."

[1] Mitchell, &c. v. Burn, &c., (1874) 1 R. 900, Lord President Inglis, at p. 905.

[2] Blackwood Wright on Principal and Agent, (2nd ed.) 167.

[3] Lindsay v. London and North-Western Railway Co., (1860) 22 D. 571; Leggat Brothers v. Gray, 1908 S. C. 67, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 71; Baines & Tait v. Compagnie Generale des Mines d'Asphalte, (1879) 6 R. 846; Shankland & Co. v. M'Gildowny, 1912 S. C. 857, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 866; Graham Stewart on Diligence, 255; Heron v. Winfields, Limited, (1894) 22 R. 182; Young v. Aktiebolaget Ofverums Bruk, (1890) 18 R. 163.

[4] Rintoul & Co. v. Bannatyne, (1862) 1 Macph. 137; Trowsdale's Trustee v. Forcett Railway Co., (1870) 9 Macph. 88.

Nov. 28, 1913.

J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.

was something in the nature of a trick, and there had been nothing of that kind on the part of the pursuers here. On the contrary, the situation which rendered arrestment possible was entirely the creation of the defenders. If they had forwarded the shipping documents to the pursuers in ordinary course they would have been paid by cheque. It was their unusual method of employing a bank as intermediary that made the money arrestable.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) When the bills of lading were handed by the defenders to the London County and Westminster Bank, with a request to credit them with the cash to be obtained in exchange for them, no directions and no authority were given by the defenders as to the employment of any agent in Glasgow, and as far as appeared they were unaware of the employment of an agent or even of the existence of the Commercial Bank, and there was accordingly no privity of contract between them and that bank. In employing the Glasgow Bank the London Bank acted on its own responsibility, and it was liable to the defenders for the actings of the Glasgow Bank with the cash.[1] Accordingly it was to the London Bank alone that the Glasgow Bank was accountable, and the defenders could have had no direct action against the latter bank. The mere fact that the money belonged to the defenders and that the arrestees were aware of this was insufficient; the test was accountability, and there was no accountability here between the Glasgow Bank and the defenders.[2] (2) By their contract to pay "nett cash against shipping documents," especially when read in light of the subsequent correspondence, the pursuers had barred themselves from taking any steps to prevent the cash from reaching the defenders. It could not therefore be intercepted by them consistently with good faith.

At advising on 28th November 1913,—

Lord President.—[After the narrative quoted supra]—If my recital of the material facts of the case is correct, then I think it is obvious that the arrestment was inept, because on the afternoon of the 2nd the Commercial Bank in Glasgow was not under any obligation to account to the defenders. There was no direct obligation arising ex contractu or quasi ex contractu on the part of the Commercial Bank towards the defenders. There was no privity of contract between the defenders and the Commercial Bank. There was no legal relationship, so far as I can see, at all between the defenders and the Commercial Bank. And in these circumstances I think it is almost too plain for argument that the arrestment attached nothing. The relationship of the Commercial Bank to the defenders was, I think, quite clearly and quite correctly expressed in the evidence given by their agent in the proof led before the Lord Ordinary, where he says: "At the date that arrestment was laid on there was nothing standing in the books of the Bank at the credit of Wallace, Marrs, & Company. The Bank at that date held no money belonging to them." That seems to me to be the correct expression of the lack of legal relationship between the Commercial Bank and the defenders. It is nothing to the purpose to say that the Commercial Bank knew, when the shipping documents reached them, that the defenders were the customers of the London and Westminster Bank, and that their customers, to wit, the defenders, had intimated plainly to the pursuers that the cash was to be transmitted to them, the defenders, directly or through their bankers. That was no doubt true; but knowledge of these facts does not constitute a legal relationship which otherwise did not exist.

[1] Mackersy v. Ramsay, Bonars, & Co., (1843) 2 Bell's App. 30.

[2] Bell's Com. ii. 70-71; Heron v. Winfields, Limited, 22 R. 182, Lord M'Laren, at p. 185; Shankland & Co. v. M'Gildowny, 1912 S. C. 857, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 866.

I think it unnecessary to cover familiar ground relating to the effect of arrestment to found jurisdiction, because the whole subject was so recently and so exhaustively explored in this Court in the cases of Heron,[1] Leggat,[2] and Shankland.[3] I only say that I desire respectfully to concur with the views of Lord President Dunedin and the other learned Judges who gave opinions in those cases; and applying the doctrine as there laid down, I cannot but come to the conclusion that this arrestment attached nothing, and that, accordingly, the plea of no jurisdiction must be sustained.

Now the Lord Ordinary reached exactly the same conclusion, but on a totally different ground. He found it unnecessary, he tells us, to consider the question on which I have just expressed an opinion, because he found in the case material to enable him to sustain the plea of no jurisdiction apart altogether from the question of the validity of the arrestment itself. The Lord Ordinary said that he was of opinion that the defenders were right in their contention that the pursuers, in the circumstances disclosed in the evidence, were barred by their own actings from founding on the arrestment; and his Lordship came to the conclusion that the use of the arrestment was contrary to the good faith of what passed between the parties. I must own that I cannot understand on what ground the Lord Ordinary reached that conclusion. There are no actings averred, and none are proved, which would in my opinion bar the pursuers from exercising their legal right. No doubt a party may expressly contract not to exercise his legal rights, and if he so contracts he will be held to his bargain. And at the first discussion before this Division of the Court, I understand it was maintained on the part of the defenders that the pursuers had contracted not to exercise their legal right to lay on the arrestment, and that they had undertaken that the whole £890 should reach the defenders, if the bills of lading were handed over. Indeed, an amendment of the record was allowed in this Division of the Court for the purpose of giving effect to that contention. It runs as follows:—(I am reading now from the amendment made on the first answer)—". . . the pursuers were not entitled to arrest the funds alleged to have been attached in respect of a special obligation undertaken by them to pay over to the defenders the said funds in exchange for shipping documents handed to the pursuers thereagainst. The alleged arrestment was contrary to the good faith of the pursuers' said undertaking, and in breach of the said obligation." In my opinion that is a hopelessly irrelevant statement, because it simply repeats in other language the express [1] 22 R. 182. [2] 1908 S. C. 67. [3] 1912 S. C. 857.

Nov. 28. 1913.

J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.

Ld. President.

terms of the contract "nett cash against shipping documents"; and it seems to me to be idle to contend that the consignee who has paid cash in exchange for the documents into the bank of the consignor is not entitled, immediately after he has paid in the money, to arrest to found jurisdiction. There is no bad faith; there is no breach of any contract in so doing; and accordingly an averment that an express obligation was undertaken to pay over the funds to the defenders in exchange for the shipping documents does not seem to me to lead to the conclusion that there was any breach of contract in laying on the arrestment.

In any event, the arrestment which is here challenged is not an arrestment on the dependence or in execution. It is an arrestment to found jurisdiction. Now, an arrestment to found jurisdiction creates no nexus; it attaches no property. It is now, I think, well-established law that an arrestment to found jurisdiction does not disentitle the arrestee immediately after to part with the subjects arrested. And accordingly the arrestment to found jurisdiction did not prevent, and could not prevent, the defenders from receiving their cash. No doubt the test of the validity of an arrestment to found jurisdiction is exactly the same as the test of the validity of an arrestment on the dependence or in execution. But the effect is entirely different. That has, I think, been well settled law for forty years. Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in Trowsdale[1] thus expresses the law:—"It is perfectly true that in point of fact an arrestment ad fundandam does not fix the subject arrested within the jurisdiction, for the arrestee may safely part with it, and it so far differs from an arrestment in execution; but it does not follow, and is not in my opinion the law, that there is any difference between the two kinds of arrestment in regard to the subjects arrestable." Lord President Dunedin in the case of Leggat Brothers[2] expresses the doctrine equally clearly. His Lordship says:—". . . the doctrine, which after a certain amount of doubt, especially, I think, as shown in the case of Malone & M'Gibbon v. The Caledonian Railway Company,[3] may now be held to be firmly established by the case of North[4]—the doctrine, namely, that an arrestment ad fundandam does not create a nexus as against the arrestee which prevents him from parting with the subjects—that doctrine is perfectly consistent with the other doctrine that the origin of the process was the idea that there should be property which could be taken in execution; and consequently, when you are considering whether a subject is arrestable to found jurisdiction, as was being considered in the case of Trowsdale's Trustee,[1] the true criterion is whether the subject is something which, if it were arrested in execution and the diligence were worked out, could be made available by the creditor in the debt." And Lord Kinnear in the same case says this:—"I, of course, keep in view what your Lordship has explained—the distinction between arrestments in execution or on the dependence and arrestments for founding jurisdiction, and we must take it as now settled in law that an arrestment for founding jurisdiction really attaches nothing. But then, it does not follow that such an arrestment will be

---

[1] 9 Macph. 88, at p. 92.
[2] 1908 S. C., at p. 72.
[3] 11 R. 853.
[4] 17 R. (H. L.) 60.

good if, in fact, there is nothing to attach."[1] Accordingly, the conclusion I reach is that it was an irrelevant averment to say that an arrestment to found jurisdiction prevented the defenders from receiving their cash. It did not, and could not.

Now that would be sufficient for this case; but evidence was given in support of the amendment, I presume on the footing that the averment in the terms which we see on the amended record was really meant to allege that the pursuers had made a contract with the defenders, by which they debarred themselves from exercising their legal rights and undertook an absolute obligation that the cash should actually reach the defenders. I have examined the evidence led before Lord Mackenzie on the amendment, and I can find nothing in it to support the view that the defenders came under any such contract, or, if they did, that they broke it. No doubt at one stage the arrangement was that the shipping documents should go to the defenders in Glasgow without passing through the bank, and that in turn the pursuers should send the cash to the defenders. I think that if that mode of settlement had been ultimately resorted to the pursuers would not have been entitled to retain any part of the money against their counter claim, nor to arrest in their own hands. But I can find nothing in the evidence which supports the averment.

I therefore come to the conclusion that the arrestment was inept, that jurisdiction was not constituted, and that accordingly we should affirm the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, although on totally different grounds.

Lord Johnston.—I concur with your Lordship. There are two grounds of decision—(1) that upon which the Lord Ordinary proceeded, and (2) that on which the case can and ought to be determined. On the first question I shall say very little except this that I think that the proof which was led was entirely incompetent and entirely ineffectual. I do not see that any change in the conditions of the contract for delivery of and payment for the goods in question was made by anything which occurred in the correspondence of July 1912. The original contract was "nett cash against bills of lading"; and I cannot find, in any of these letters, that anything was done which varies that contract one iota. The whole proof has therefore gone for nothing.

Taking, then, the case upon the footing of "nett cash against bills of lading," there was nothing to prevent the attachment of the cash by anyone, including the purchasers, if they were smart enough to do so before the cash was put beyond their reach, and I am quite unable to see that there was anything done by the purchaser here to which bad faith could be attributed. I say so much, because it is only fair to the purchaser to point out that, in the opinion of the Court, he has done nothing to have any imputation of bad faith attributed to him.

I do not, however, think that the case ought to be determined on this ground. The question really is, Was there attachment by arrestment? Now the course which was followed was that the bills of lading were

[1] 1908 S. C., at p. 76.

Nov. 28, 1913.
J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.
Ld. Johnston.

handed by the sellers to their own bankers in London for collection, and by their bankers in London were sent to the latter's agents in Glasgow, and the transaction was carried out in Glasgow by the exchange of cash for the bills of lading. Now the London and Westminster Bank were clearly agents of the sellers, but the Commercial Bank in Glasgow were not; they were only the agents of the sellers' agents. And I think it has often been laid down that the agent of my agent is not my agent. There is no privity of contract between me and my agent's agent, and therefore no direct accountability on his part to me. I therefore agree with your Lordship in thinking that as arrestability depends on accountability there was here no valid arrestment.

Lord Mackenzie.—The question whether the arrestments to found jurisdiction attached anything depends upon whether there was, at the time they were used, any privity of contract between the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, Glasgow, and the defenders. If there was not, then there was not a present accountability of the former to the latter. Unless the defenders could have brought an action against the Commercial Bank founded upon a direct personal obligation, arising ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, the arrestments are bad. An action of the nature of rei vindicatio would not, for this purpose, be sufficient. It would not be enough, to make the arrestments good, that the defenders had the ultimate right of property in what was arrested. These principles are laid down in the case of Heron v. Winfields, Limited,[1] and Shankland & Company v. M'Gildowny.[2]

The application of these principles to the present case appears to me plain. The money arrested was money paid by the pursuers into the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, at Glasgow. The Commercial Bank was accountable for this money to the London County and Westminster Bank, Limited, in London. The latter had selected and employed the former as their agents. The defenders had nothing to do either with this employment or this selection, and were not parties to the contract. There is no evidence that they knew anything about the Commercial Bank. The defenders' contract was with the London bank, to whom they wrote on 31st July 1912, "Please present to Messrs J. & C. Murray, 53 Bothwell Street, Glasgow, and hand them in exchange for the amount of our statement enclosed, £890, 7s. 11d., the attached 4 Bills of Lading in duplicate and credit the amount to our a/c." The London bank were free to select any agent they chose. They chose the Commercial Bank, Glasgow, to whom they wrote on 1st August 1912, "Please present to Messrs J. & C. Murray, 53 Bothwell Street, Glasgow, and hand them in exchange for amount of statement enclosed (£890, 7s. 11d.), the attached 4 B/Lading in duplicate. Please wire fate, for which we enclose stamped form." On the principle laid down in Mackersy v. Ramsay, Bonars, & Company[3] the London bank was liable for the actings of the Commercial Bank, their agents, and the Commercial Bank was accountable to them. The fact that the account, No. 28 of process, was transmitted by the defenders to the London County and Westminster Bank with their letter of 31st July, and then sent on by the latter to the Commercial Bank in Glasgow on 1st August, was founded upon by the pursuers. They referred to the docquet on the account, "All payment to be made direct to Wallace, Marrs, & Co., London, or through their bankers," and maintained that this was certioration to the Commercial Bank of the fact that the defenders were the consignees. I do not think so. The notification was to the people who owed the money, viz., the pursuers, not to the Commercial Bank. Whatever effect the docquet might have had if the defenders had brought an action against the Commercial Bank on the ground that the money arrested belonged to them, it has no effect in the present case. On this ground, therefore, I hold the arrestments to be invalid.

[1] 22 R. 182. [2] 1912 S. C. 857. [3] 2 Bell's App. 30.

This is sufficient to dispose of the case, and the further question does not arise except on the assumption that something was attached. An argument founded on the specialties was, however, addressed to us, and as the Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeds upon the special circumstances of the case, it is right I should state shortly my opinion upon it. In the first place, I wish to say that in so far as the Lord Ordinary's opinion is founded on authorities which lay down that an arresting creditor cannot retain the benefit of a trick, I do not think there is any warrant for imputing to the pursuers any motive to get the better of the defenders by a trick. The pursuers considered that consistently with the special bargain they had made by correspondence with the defenders they were entitled to arrest. I think they were wrong in this view. The defenders were entitled, in my opinion, to construe the pursuers' letters and telegram as meaning that if and when the bills of lading were received by them in Glasgow payment would be made by them to the defenders, that is to say, that there was an implied undertaking that the pursuers would themselves take no action to prevent the money reaching the hands of the defenders. Now whatever view may be taken of the effect of arrestment to found jurisdiction, whether it creates a nexus or not, its practical result when followed by arrestment on the dependence of the action would be effectually to defeat in this case what I consider the legitimate expectation of the defenders.

The facts of the case are that the pursuers considered themselves badly treated by the defenders in regard to the contracts for delivery of iron, and were unable to get from them bills of lading for 70 tons shipped to Grangemouth, and 100 tons shipped to Glasgow. Even though they had received (by arrangement with the shipping agents) the Grangemouth consignment, they had not, without the bills of lading, a proper title to the consignment. They were pressing the defenders to send on the bills of lading. The defenders delayed doing so. The pursuers had made counter claims, not of great amount—£26, 5s. 11d.—the price of the two consignments being £890, 7s. 11d. On 12th July the pursuers wrote, "We shall send you our cheque whenever you produce the B/L." Now no doubt the terms of the original contract were "cash against bills of lading," but it is one thing to make a contract "Terms Cash," it is another matter to write and induce the sellers to send something by saying, "Whenever you send what I bought I will pay you." Dealing for the present solely with the Grangemouth consignment, the letters and evidence show that the parties had in view that the bills of lading might be sent (1) to the pursuers in Glasgow; (2) to the shipping agents at Grangemouth; or (3) to the bankers in Glasgow. Mr Murray says in his evidence, "On 12th July 1912 it was a matter of complete indifference to me whether the bills were sent to me direct or to the Shipping Agents, or presented to me by the bank, or by someone on behalf of the defenders. I did not intend by that letter that there should be any alteration of the previous course of dealing which had been to present the Bills of Lading through the bank." On 16th July the pursuers wrote, "If you will hand the Bills/lading to the shipping Co., at Grangemouth instructing them to advise us when they had received them payment will be sent to you in course of post." In his evidence Mr Murray says, "I did not mean by that to make it a condition that the bills should be sent to the Shipping Company. I put that remark in because of a remark they made. If they had come on that date in reply to that letter of 16th July there would have been no trouble, and I would have been perfectly content that they should have been sent through the bank at that date." There was thus no indication that the receipt of the money by the defenders depended upon whether the bills of lading came to the pursuers through one channel or another. Mr Murray admits that up to the 17th of July he did not care through what channel the bills of lading came, but that on that day he changed his mind; and that thereafter his promise to pay applied only to the contingency of the bills of lading being sent either (1) direct to his firm; or (2) to the shipping agents at Grangemouth. If they were sent to a bank in Glasgow he was to use his own phrase "absolved." The unfortunate thing is that the pursuers did not make plain to the defenders what was in their minds. On 20th July they sent this telegram—"101 Canon Street, B.O., E.C., 20 Jy. 12—received here at 10.58. Glasgow X 13 10/22.—Wallimars, Lrd. We undertake pay Invoices less credit on receipt B. Ladings here. Atacama." It is too narrow a construction to read "here" as limited to the pursuer's office. The defenders were entitled to read it as meaning Glasgow. The defenders accordingly wrote on 22nd July—"With reference to yours of the 20th inst., we thank you for your undertaking to pay us the above amount less our Credit Note for £3, 0s. 3d. in exchange for the Bills of Lading, as per your telegram of the 20th inst. reading as follows:—'We undertake pay invoices less credit on receipt B. Ladings here.' On this understanding we are therefore handing the Bills of Lading to our Bankers for transmission to you with instruction to present same in exchange for your cheque for £353: 2/4." In his original examination Mr Murray said with reference to this letter, "(Q.) Do you agree there was no dubiety about your position—that you contracted to pay them the money for those invoice goods against presentation of the bills of lading? (A.) Yes." I think the pursuers should have seen that the defenders were not drawing any distinctions as to the channel through which the bills of lading were to go, and that they were proceeding on an undertaking to pay "us," the mode of payment being by cheque. The unchallenged receipt by the pursuers of the letter of 22nd July taken with the previous letters in my opinion operates as a bar to using arrestments to found jurisdiction. Just as the pursuers would not have been entitled to stop payment of a cheque drawn by them in favour of the defenders, so they were, in consequence of the terms of the correspondence, not entitled to stop the money being transmitted to the defenders.

Nov. 28, 1913.

J. & C. Murray v. Wallace, Marrs, & Co.

Lord Mackenzie.

So far the Grangemouth consignment only has been dealt with. The Glasgow consignment is brought into the same position by the letter of 25th July from the pursuers, which says "we shall of course pay for the goods immediately on presentation and in exchange for the Bill of Lading, and would advise you to have this document presented immediately. . . . Why don't you send your Bills of Lading through a Bank or through your agent here?"

I am therefore of opinion that if the arrestments attached anything, the pursuers were barred by their special bargain from using them.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair and Lord Johnston on both branches of the case.

THE COURT adhered.

A. C. D. VERT, S.S.C.—W. CROFT GRAY, S.S.C.—Agents.

MRS AGNES TURNER OR FRASER, Appellant.—A. M. Mackay.
JOHN RIDDELL & COMPANY, Respondents.—Horne, K.C.—Aitchison.

No. 16.

Nov. 29, 1913.

Fraser v. Riddell & Co.

Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Driver of traction-engine falling from engine while drunk.

The driver of a traction-engine, while driving the engine, fell from the footplate and was run over and killed. In an application for compensation at the instance of his widow the arbitrator found that the accident did not arise out of his employment, in respect that the man was under the influence of drink and unfit for his work at the time of the accident.

Held that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, between the widow of the late James Fraser (for herself and as tutor and curator for her children) and John Riddell & Company, the interim Sheriff-substitute (Macdonald) refused to award compensation, and, at the request of the applicants, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth:—

"(1) On 26th March 1913 the deceased James Fraser was a traction-engine driver in the employment of the respondents, John Riddell & Company. (2) About 11.30 P.M. on said date, while driving a traction-engine belonging to the respondents in Bilsland Drive, Maryhill, Glasgow, he fell off the footplate on to the roadway. (3) One of the wheels of a wagon attached to the engine passed over him. (4) As the result of the injuries he received he died on the following day. (5) When he commenced his duties on the said date, and when

Nov. 29, 1913.

Fraser v. Riddell & Co.

Ld. President.

Now I do not think it is pressing the arbitrator's finding too far to say that this clearly indicates that the evidence disclosed to the arbitrator that the deceased did not jump off and was not shoved off the footplate. He simply fell. If an engine driver falls off the footplate while driving his engine it appears to me that that is an accident which is incidental to the employment in which he is engaged. It is not what has been called in the cited cases "an added peril." It is just such an accident as might happen to him if he slipped his foot accidentally while perfectly sober and fit for his work. And accordingly the arbitrator finds that he was in the course of his employment at the time that the accident befell him.

But then, he further finds that, at the time of the accident, he was under the influence of drink and unfit for his work. It was argued to us to-day by Mr Aitchison that the finding that the deceased was unfit for his work comes into conflict with the finding that he was engaged in the performance of his duty of driving the engine at the time when the accident befell him. It appears to me that there is no necessary contradiction at all between these two findings. A man may be engaged in the performance of his work and an accident may occur incidental to his work, and therefore "out of" his employment, even although he is in a state of intoxication so great as to be, in the opinion of ordinary people, unfit for the performance of his work. If an accident befalls him under these conditions it appears to me that, owing to his intoxicated condition, it is rightly called an accident due to serious and wilful misconduct; but it is none the less an accident arising "out of" his employment, because it is incidental to it.

I think it unnecessary to review the authorities which have been so amply cited to us at the discussion to-day. I agree with the Master of the Rolls in the case of Watkins,[1] when he says that "it is not very easy to put cases on either side of the line," that is, to say whether the injury is accident arising "out of" the employment but brought about by serious and wilful misconduct, or whether it is more correctly denominated an injury which has not arisen "out of" the employment but is due to an "added peril." And I still more agree with what I observe Lord Justice Moulton says in the same case, where he points out that "Although serious and wilful misconduct does not prevent the workman recovering compensation in these cases, it does not make a thing within the Act that otherwise would not be; and so we have the difficulty of finding out a line between something that takes the accident entirely out of the employment and something which within the employment is a serious and wilful misconduct which leads to the accident. It is a difficulty which I do not think will ever be solved by phrases." I entirely agree with that opinion.

This case, it seems to me, it is not difficult to place on its proper side of the line. I think the facts found by the arbitrator lead necessarily and inevitably to the conclusion that the accident occurred not only while the man was "in the course of" his employment but arose "out of" his employment. Accordingly I propose that we should answer the question put to us in the stated case in the negative.

[1] 5 Butterworth's W. C. C. 307.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I agree with your Lordship and have nothing to add. Nov. 29, 1913.

Fraser v. Riddell & Co.

LORD HUNTER.—I also agree.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

HILL MURRAY & BRYDON, S.S.C.—STEEDMAN & RICHARDSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 17.

Dec. 2, 1913.

THE FARMERS' MART, LIMITED, Pursuers (Respondents).—Sandeman, K.C.—W. Mitchell.
JOHN MILNE, Defender (Reclaimer).—Murray, K.C.—Wilton.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Contract—Pactum illicitum—Trustee in bankruptcy—Agreement to share fees.

A firm of land-agents agreed with their manager that all fees which he earned from any appointment which he might obtain as trustee or factor on any estate should be pooled with all fees which they derived as salesmen or valuators in connection with that estate, and that the fees so pooled, after payment to the firm of the balance of any debt due to them by such estate, should be divided equally between the parties.

In an action by the firm against their manager to recover, under this agreement, a proportion of fees alleged to have been earned by him as trustee or factor on various estates and, inter alia, as trustee in a sequestration, held (rev. judgment of Lord Hunter) that, although there was no suggestion that the defender had acted improperly in the conduct of his trusteeships, still the agreement necessarily placed him in the position of having conflicting interests, and was therefore illegal and unenforceable, and action dismissed.

2D DIVISION. Lord Hunter.

ON 12th May 1913 the Farmers' Mart, Limited, Brechin, brought an action against John Milne, auctioneer, for an accounting in regard to all fees derived by him between 1st April 1907 and 19th August 1908, as factor or trustee on any estate, and for payment of the proportion of such fees due by him under an agreement between him and the pursuers dated 9th April 1907.

The pursuers averred that they carried on business in Brechin and elsewhere as live-stock salesmen, agents, auctioneers, appraisers, and land-surveyors. The defender was appointed manager of the pursuers' business in 1899, and continued to act as such till 19th August 1908. After 1st April 1907 he was employed on the terms contained in an agreement dated 9th April 1907, to which the pursuers were the first parties and the defender was the second party, and which provided, inter alia :—"(Fifth) The second party shall be entitled but shall not be bound, to undertake any factorship or trusteeship on, or other office involving the management of, any estate, provided always that before undertaking any such factorship, trusteeship, or office, he shall first obtain the consent of the first parties, unless in the case of a testamentary or other gratuitous trusteeship, executorship, or factorship, any of which he shall be entitled to accept without the consent of the first parties. The fees or other remuneration derived by the second party from any such factorship, trusteeship, or office as aforesaid, accepted by the second party after the commencement of this agreement, shall (after deduction therefrom of all charges and other out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the second party in connection therewith, and that whether by way of legal, clerical, or other assistance or otherwise) be pooled with all fees and commissions, including fees for measurements derived by the first parties from any sales or valuations in connection with any such estate under the management of the second party as aforesaid, and the proceeds thereof shall be divided in the portion of one-half to the first parties, and the other half to the second party, provided always that, before any such division shall take place, there shall out of said proceeds be paid to the first parties the balance of any debt remaining due to them from such estate, after giving credit for all sums received, or falling to be received, on account of such debt, and that whether from the principal or any subsidiary or collateral obligant therefor, or from the respective estate of any such obligants. . . ."

Dec. 2, 1913.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

The pursuers also averred that between 1st April 1907 and 19th August 1908 the defender had acted as trustee or factor on several estates, and in particular as trustee under a trust-deed for behoof of creditors granted by John Fairweather, and as trustee on the sequestrated estates of Stewart Dick, and that the defender refused to account to the pursuers for the proportion of fees derived from his trusteeships, as he was bound to do under the fifth clause of the agreement of 9th April 1907. There was no averment by either party which suggested that the defender had in any way acted improperly in the discharge of his duties as trustee.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender being bound under and in terms of the said agreement of 9th April 1907, and in particular article fifth thereof, to account to the pursuers for all fees or other remuneration derived by him (a) from his said trusteeship on the trust-estate of the said John Fairweather, and (b) in connection with the office of factor, trustee, or other office involving the management of any other estate undertaken by the defender during the period up to 19th August 1908, the pursuers are entitled to decree of accounting as concluded for, and, on the balances due to the pursuers being ascertained in terms of said agreement, they are entitled to decree for the same.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The averments of the pursuers being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor. (3) The agreement founded upon by the pursuers being void in respect it is corrupt and illegal, the pursuers cannot maintain the present action, and the same ought to be dismissed.

On 29th October 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Hunter) pronounced an interlocutor repelling the 1st and 3rd pleas in law for the defender, and ordaining him to lodge the accounts called for.*

* "OPINION.—[After a narrative of the facts]—In support of his case the defender's counsel referred me to several cases. In Laughland v Millar, Laughland, & Company, (1904) 6 F. 413, one of the directors of a company entered into an agreement with the managers of the company that if they received a bonus of £700 from the company on the sale of its business he should receive £200 from them. The contract was held to be illegal, and the managers were assoilzied in an action for the £200 raised against them by the director. The ground of that decision was that the managers and the director had entered into a combination to get into their possession a sum of money belonging to the shareholders, and, in the evidence given by the director, he admitted that but for the agreement he would have done what it was his duty to do, i.e., he would have had the £700 divided among the shareholders. In Harrington, (1878) 3 Q. B. D. 549, it was decided, as put by Cockburn, C.J., 'that when a bribe is given, or a promise of a

Dec. 2, 1913.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 2nd December 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—A trustee in bankruptcy acted in a fiduciary capacity. He represented the interests both of the creditors and of the bankrupt, could be removed if he did not perform his duty faithfully, and could take no benefit from his office except his commission.[1] It was accordingly incumbent on him not to put himself in any position where his interest conflicted with his duty. This was just what he had done in the present case, for, under the fifth clause of the agreement, he had a direct interest to employ his firm as valuators, to deal leniently with their charges, and to look favourably on their claims as creditors. This was very different from the kind of agreement in Sleigh v. Sleigh's Judicial Factor,[2] and was a pactum illicitum which the Court would not countenance in any way.[3] Moreover, the agreement to pool fees was an offence against the Prevention of bribe is made, to a person in the employ of another by some one who has contracted, or is about to contract, with the employer, with a view to inducing the person employed to act otherwise than with loyalty and fidelity to his employer, the agreement is a corrupt one, and is not enforceable at law, whatever the actual effect produced on the mind of the person bribed may be.' The defender's counsel founded strongly on the case of Macgown, 13th December 1808, F. C., where it was held that a bargain by a competitor for the office of trusteeship upon a bankrupt estate to hand over a proportion of his commission as trustee to other competitors was corrupt.

---

"I have not been able to satisfy myself that the decision in any of the cases to which I was referred would justify me in dismissing the action, as I was asked to do by the defender's counsel. As regards the pooling arrangement, I do not see that there is anything corrupt in the manager of a business arranging for his remuneration as trustee being shared by the members of the firm whose business he manages. It is quite a usual arrangement that one of the partners in a law-agents' or an accountants' business should communicate the fees earned by himself individually for discharging such duties as those of trustee on a sequestrated estate. If a partner may so communicate his fees I do not see why the manager of a business may not make a similar arrangement. What is communicated are fees actually earned, and the agreement entered into does not involve any failure of duty on the part of the trustee towards those whose interests he must protect. It is maintained, however, for the defender that the arrangement between the parties in this case enables the pursuers to get an undue preference over the other creditors of a bankrupt. The stipulations as to the pursuers receiving payment in full of any debt due to them by the bankrupt out of the fees of the defender as trustee appears to me to be an unfortunate condition, but I have not been able to satisfy myself that it is corrupt or of such a character as to justify me in sustaining the defender's plea to the effect of wholly disregarding the agreement between the parties. The creditors on the estate have not in any way suffered, and I do not think there is anything illegal in one creditor receiving more than the others as long as he does not receive a preference out of the bankrupt estate on which all ought to rank equally. As regards the provision that the pursuers are to pool fees received by them for measurement work with the fees earned by the defender as trustee, I do not think that the averments are of such a character as to justify my hold-

---

[1] Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 74, 125, 159; Goudy on Bankruptcy, (3rd ed.) pp. 244, 365 seq.

[2] 1908 S. C. 1112.

[3] Macgown v. Tod, Dec. 13, 1808, F. C.; M'Taggart's Reps. v. Roberton, (1834) 12 S. 338; Mann v. Dickson, (1857) 19 D. 942.

Dec. 2, 1913.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Corruption Act, 1906.[1] The parties had acted "corruptly," in the sense explained by Blackburn, J., in Bewdley Election Petition.[2] It was no defence to say that in fact the defender had not acted improperly in his capacity as trustee. If the agreement was corrupt, the irrefutable presumption was that his mind had been influenced.[3] The result was that, as the agreement was on the face of it illegal and unenforceable, the only course was to dismiss the action.[4]

Argued for the respondents;—If this contract were illegal and unenforceable, which was denied, it could only be because it was contrary to public policy, and it was only in very special circumstances that the freedom of contract was interfered with on this ground.[5] There were no such circumstances in this case. The whole question turned on the construction of the agreement, since it was not alleged that any illegality had in fact been committed. There was nothing in the agreement itself which of necessity implied that its execution involved, or might involve, any impropriety. It did not necessarily place the defender in a position of double interest, for there was nothing in the agreement binding him either to accept the trusteeship on an estate on which the pursuers were creditors, or to give employment to the pursuers. Seeing that the agreement could be fulfilled in a perfectly legal manner, it could not be set aside ab ante without proof of some actual illegality.[6]

Lord Justice-Clerk.—[After narrating the facts and the terms of the agreement]—Now that is an arrangement by which, quite plainly, the Mart was to get the benefit of carrying out sales or valuations in connection with estates under the management of the defender, in those cases where the defender had employed the Mart to carry out such sales or valuations, and that then their profits and his remuneration as trustee were to be pooled and halved between the parties. It seems to me quite clear that that was an arrangement which might lead to double interest, since it would be to the advantage of the defender to employ the Mart as sales-ing that the whole agreement is illegal, and the defender freed from the obligations under which he has voluntarily come. It may be that as regards certain of the fees pooled it may be established that there was an improper stipulation which renders it against public policy to give effect to the provisions of the agreement; but I do not think that on a mere construction of the terms used I should be justified in sustaining without inquiry a plea which would free the defender from obligations deliberately undertaken by him. I shall therefore meantime order an account by the defender—a course which will allow him, if he can, to state and prove any illegality in connection with any of the particular items in the accounting."

---

[1] 6 Edw. VII. cap. 34, sec. 1; Graham v. Hart, 1908 S. C. (J.) 26.

[2] (1869) 19 L. T. 676, at p. 678.

[3] Harrington v. Victoria Graving Dock Co., (1878) 3 Q. B. D. 549; Hovenden & Sons v. Millhoff, (1900) 83 L. T. 41; Shipway v. Broadwood, [1899] 1 Q. B. 369.

[4] Laughland v. Millar, Laughland, & Co., (1904) 6 F. 413; Scott v. Brown, Doering, M'Nab, & Co., [1892] 2 Q. B. 724; North Western Salt Co., Limited, v. Electrolytic Alkali Co., Limited, [1913] 3 K. B. 422.

[5] Pollock on Contracts, (8th ed.) p. 332; Printing and Numerical Registering Co. v. Sampson, (1875) L. R., 19 Eq. 462, per Jessel, M.R., at p. 465.

[6] Thwaites v. Coulthwaite, [1896] 1 Ch. 496.

men or valuators in preference to others, and also to his advantage that their charges should be as high as possible, since 50 per cent of the fees would ultimately find their way into his own pocket.

I do not think that the proper way to look at this case is to consider merely what has happened or what has been done in working out the arrangement. The question is not whether the defender has taken an improper advantage of his office, but whether he was in such a position as to be tempted to do so, that is to say, whether he was placed in such a position that his duty conflicted with his interest. In my opinion he was. A contract of this kind may be innocent in the sense that it may be possible to carry it out without committing any illegality. But that is not the right way to look at the contract in this case. Is the agreement one under which there may be a corrupt use of the defender's position? If so, and if under the agreement that may be done which the law strikes at, then I think the law strikes at the agreement itself because of what may be done and not because of what has been done.

Holding this view of the proper reading of the contract, I have come to the conclusion that the pursuers are not entitled to found on this contract, and that we ought to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

LORD GUTHRIE.—I am of the same opinion.

The Lord Ordinary has repelled the third plea in law which is to the effect that the agreement is corrupt and illegal. But he has made a reservation in his opinion which was admitted not to be consistent with the terms of his interlocutor, because he says, "It may be that as regards certain of the fees pooled it may be established that there was an improper stipulation which renders it against public policy to give effect to the provisions of the agreement."

It is averred by the pursuers, and it is not denied, that in several instances the defender acted as factor and trustee on sequestrated estates, but it is not said that he ever acted improperly. The question raised in this case is thus a pure question of construction of the agreement, seeing that there are no averments of corrupt conduct under any of the three heads which Mr Wilton founded on as involving Milne in a position of double interest. It was said by Mr Wilton, first, that the defender had an interest to employ the firm, whose servant he was, for valuations and other purposes. Secondly, Mr Wilton said that he had an interest to allow his firm to pile up their charges, if they were so employed. And, thirdly, Mr Wilton said that he had an interest to deal favourably with his firm's claims as creditors.

I agree with your Lordship in thinking that, in all these particulars, Mr Milne had a direct and necessary double interest which the law will not allow. As was said by Mr Mitchell, almost any contract may involve the possibility of a double interest, but that is not to say that in every case a question of double interest necessarily or directly arises. Here, seeing that, under the arrangement between him and his firm, the defender might participate in the results of any of those three things that I have

Dec. 2, 1913.

Farmers' Mart, Limited, v. Milne.

Lord Guthrie.

mentioned, the case does come within the category of direct and necessary double interest. Take the last of them—the interest that he had to deal favourably with his firm's claims. It appears that, under the 5th clause of the contract, before a division was made out of what had been pooled, "there shall out of said proceeds be paid to the first parties the balance of any debt remaining due to them from such estate." That was to be deducted. Therefore, as much as possible should, in order to suit Milne, be charged against the estate, leaving as little as possible to be paid out of the fund of which he was to get a certain proportion.

Accordingly, I think, applying the words of Chief Justice Cockburn in the case of Harrington,[1] this is a case, where a payment, or a promise of payment—whether you call it a bribe or not—was given to this man in the cases where he acted as a factor or trustee which put him in the position of having a direct and necessary inducement to act otherwise than with loyalty and fidelity to the creditors whom he represented. In that case, as the Lord Chief Justice puts it, "the agreement is a corrupt one and is not enforceable at law, whatever the actual effect produced on the mind of the person bribed may be."

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, sustained the first and third pleas in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

TAIT & CRICHTON, W.S.—JOHN C. BRODIE & SONS, W.S.—Agents.

No. 18.

Dec. 3, 1913.

Costin v. Hume.

MARY CATHERINE COSTIN, Pursuer (Appellant).—Carmont.
ANDREW HUME, Defender (Respondent).—A. A. Fraser.

Title to sue—Donation—Title of donee to sue for recovery of gift sent in error to third party.

The pursuer in an action for payment of a sum of money averred that the money was a charitable donation intended for her which had been sent in error to the defender, and that the defender fraudulently refused to part with it though informed by the donor that the gift was not for his benefit but for that of the pursuer.

Held that the pursuer had relevantly averred a title to sue the defender for recovery of the gift.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

ON 7th July 1913 Mary Catherine Costin, Dumfries, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries against Andrew Hume, music teacher there. The pursuer craved the Court "to find and declare that defender has no right of property or any other right, title, or interest in a sum of £67, 2s. which was remitted to him on or about 2nd January 1913 out of the 'Titanic' Relief Fund by the committee in charge thereof, through Mr Percy F. Corkhill, the Town Hall, Liverpool; that the said sum was remitted to defender for the benefit of pursuer and her pupil child who was born on 18th October 1912, and to be paid over by him to pursuer; and that defender is bound to pay said sum and all interest accrued thereon to the pursuer"; and concluded against the defender for payment of £67, 2s.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 1) "The late John Law Hume, who was one of the bandsmen on the White Star Liner 'Titanic,' was drowned in the wreck of that vessel in mid Atlantic on or about 15th April 1912. He was a son of the defender, and resided with him." (Cond. 2) "At the date of the death of the said John Law Hume the pursuer was engaged to be married to him." (Cond. 3) "Immediately after the wreck of the 'Titanic,' public subscriptions were opened for the benefit of the dependants of those who had perished in the disaster, including a fund known as the Mansion House Fund, which was administered by a committee under the Lord Mayor of London. As the pursuer was about to become the mother of a child of which the said John Law Hume was the father, she, through her agent, Mr G. T. Hendrie, solicitor, Dumfries, lodged an application for a grant from the said fund on or about 28th June 1912 . . ." (Cond. 4) ". . . On the 18th October 1912 the pursuer's child, a daughter, was born, and intimation was, on same date, sent to the Public Trustee. By letter dated 21st October 1912, the Public Trustee wrote to Mr Hendrie—'I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of 18th inst. informing me that an infant child has now been born in the Costin case. This child has now been entered on the schedule of dependants, and her mother will receive consideration for relief in respect of herself and the child in due course.'" (Cond. 5) "By decree dated the 2nd and 3rd, both days of December 1912, in an action in the Sheriff Court at Dumfries at the instance of the pursuer against the defender and others as representatives of the said deceased John Law Hume, the Sheriff-substitute found and declared (first) that the said John Law Hume was the father of the female child of which the pursuer was delivered on Friday 18th October 1912, and (second) that the pursuer was entitled to recover out of any estate left by the said John Law Hume" inlying charges and aliment to the amount of £67, 2s. (Cond. 6) "On 11th December 1912 Mr Hendrie sent a copy of said decree to the Public Trustee, and in reply received a letter dated 16th December 1912 stating that he had forwarded the copy decree to Mr P. F. Corkhill, honorary secretary of the Liverpool 'Titanic' Fund, whose committee was dealing with the case, and Mr Hendrie was requested to communicate direct with Mr Corkhill in future at the Town Hall, Liverpool. Mr Hendrie accordingly did so, and received a reply from Mr Corkhill dated 18th December 1912 that the claim was having attention." (Cond. 7) "As Mr Hendrie did not hear further from Mr Corkhill for several months, he caused inquiries to be made and ascertained that Mr Corkhill's committee had considered the pursuer's claim with the copy decree before them, and had resolved to make a grant for the benefit of the pursuer and her child out of the funds at their disposal of £67, 2s., being a sum equal to the total amount of aliment and inlying expenses awarded under said decree. This sum was remitted by Mr Corkhill to the defender on 2nd January 1913. It was acknowledged by the defender by letter dated 3rd January 1913, in which he said—'I note that the cheque you enclose corresponds in value to the claim which I am given to understand has been put forward on behalf of Miss Costin.' The defender, prior to that date, had been in correspondence with Mr Corkhill making and urging claims on his own behalf, and urging that the pursuer's claim should not receive consideration by the committee. But Mr Corkhill made it clear to the defender that the committee did not and could not regard the defender as in any way dependent on the deceased, and that the pursuer's claim was a good one, as the committee believed it was the intention of the deceased to marry the pursuer, in which case he would have had the obligation of a wife and child. . . ." (Cond. 8) "The said remittance of £67, 2s. was made to the defender under the erroneous impression that the foresaid decree was binding upon him personally, and that he either had implemented or would implement the same by payment of the full sum down. He had, in fact, alleged to the committee that the pursuer's claim had been settled. . . ." (Cond. 9) "Having ascertained the foregoing facts regarding the remittance of £67, 2s., Mr Hendrie, on 25th April 1913, applied to the defender for payment, and in answer the defender wrote on 26th April 1913—'I have not received any sum of money to be paid to your client; had it been otherwise I would have adopted one of two courses, viz., either sent the sum to you or returned it to the sender. The sum to which you refer was sent me as a full payment of my own personal claim of which I have full confirmation thereof.' This was duly communicated to Mr Corkhill who, after making thorough inquiry, wrote to defender on 18th June 1913, informing him definitely that the money was intended for the benefit of pursuer and her child, and not in any sense for defender's own benefit. But, in face of that intimation, the defender still lays claim to the money, and his agents, Messrs Whitelaw & Edgar, solicitors, Dumfries, on 28th June 1913, wrote to Mr Hendrie as follows—'We have seen Mr Hume, and are instructed by him to say that the £67, 2s. which he received was intended for him, and he is therefore not prepared to pay over any part of that sum to your client (the pursuer).' The defender is thus fraudulently attempting to appropriate the said money, and the pursuer has been compelled to raise the present action. . . ."

[1] 3 Q. B. D. 549.

Dec. 8, 1913.

Costin v. Hume.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The sum of £67, 2s. having been remitted to defender for the benefit of the pursuer and her child, and not to any extent for the personal benefit of the defender, and the defender having laid claim thereto as his own personal property, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and payment in terms of the prayer of the writ. (2) The defender having fraudulently laid claim to said money after direct intimation from the sender that it was not for defender's personal benefit, should be ordained forthwith to consign the amount in Court pending the final disposal of this action. (3) *The defender having fraudulently laid claim to said money after direct intimation from the sender that it was not for the defender's personal benefit, the pursuer is entitled to declarator and payment as craved.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The action is incompetent, and should be dismissed, with expenses. (3) The averments being insufficient to support the conclusions of the writ, the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

On 21st October 1913 the Sheriff-substitute (Campion) sustained the first plea in law for the defender and dismissed the action.

The pursuer appealed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 2nd and 3rd December 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The pursuer had averred a relevant title to sue the defender for recovery of the money. The money had been sent to the defender for behoof of the pursuer. If in such circumstances the sender had become bankrupt, his trustee could not have claimed the money.[1] The "Titanic" Fund Committee had abandoned all right to or interest in the money, and the only person who could vindicate a right of property therein was the pursuer.

* Plea (3) was added by amendment during the debate in the Court of Session.

Argued for the respondent;—The pursuer's averments disclosed neither a title to sue nor a relevant ground of action. She had suffered no pecuniary loss and therefore had no interest.[2] Even if she were considered to have an interest, that per se did not give her a title.[3] There might be a relationship of a contractual nature between the "Titanic" Fund Committee and the defender, but the pursuer could not found on the existence of such a contract.[4] The pursuer had no assignation from the Committee, and mere acquiescence or concurrence on their part did not cure the defect in the pursuer's title.[5]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been thrown out in the Court below on the ground, as stated by the Sheriff-substitute,—who treats the case as a condictio indebiti,—that there was no title to sue. I cannot agree in that judgment. We cannot deal with the merits of the case at this stage, but it appears to me that the pursuer has set out a good title to sue. Her case is simply this, that a certain sum of money was sent by A to B to be delivered to her, and that B declines to deliver it. In those circumstances, it appears to me that the proper course is to remit the case back to the Sheriff to allow a proof.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree, and if I add a few words it is only because the case is rather a peculiar one. The Sheriff-substitute, as your lordship has pointed out, sustained the plea of no title to sue, and when the case came here we also heard an argument by the respondent's counsel to the effect that the pursuer's case was irrelevant. That contention is not very artistically stated on the record, but I think the third plea for the defender was meant to raise it. So that there are before us pleas to relevancy and to title to be considered. The second plea for the defender was (no doubt quite rightly) abandoned by counsel at our bar.

Now I agree with your lordship in thinking that, as regards the plea to title, the Sheriff-substitute has fallen into error. He says in his opinion: "It is a case of a gratuitous contribution granted by the committee of the 'Titanic' Relief Fund for the benefit of pursuer and her child. But the pursuer would not have been in the position of having a title to sue said committee for the sum in question. If so, she cannot have now a better title to sue anyone in whose hands the sum awarded may, through some misunderstanding, be deposited." I think there is a [1] Brierly v. Mackintosh, (1843) 5 D. 1100, aff. 5 Bell's App. 1.

[2] M'Donald v. M'Call, (1890) 17 R. 951; Hunter v. Hunter, (1904) 7 F. 136.
[3] Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 126, commenting on Pyper v. Christie, (1878) 6 R. 143, per Lord Young, at p. 145.
[4] Pollock on Contracts, (8th ed.) p. 223; Tweddle v. Atkinson, (1861) 1 B & S. 393.
[5] Hislop v. MacRitchie's Trustees, (1881) 8 R. (H. L.) 95.

Dec. 8, 1913.

Costin v. Hume.

Lord Dundas.

non sequitur involved in that statement. Be it that the pursuer could not have sued the donor, the charitable fund, if they had not paid her, surely it does not follow that, if the charitable fund places the money intended for the pursuer and her child in the hands of a third party, the pursuer may not perfectly well, so far as title goes, sue that party for the money. Suppose the fund had chosen to deposit the money in a bank for behoof of the pursuer and her child, could the bank possibly have disputed liability to pay the money upon her due demand? I think not. The Sheriff-substitute also talks about condictio indebiti. I cannot see that condictio indebiti arises here at all. It is not a case where the donor is endeavouring to get repayment of money which he had paid under error. It is a case of this pursuer seeking, not repayment, but payment from the defender who, she says, has got money belonging to her in his hands. I think, therefore, with your Lordship, that the pursuer's averments are quite relevant to support her title and also, if substantiated, to support her case upon the merits. But I agree in thinking that we cannot go further than that at present, and that the case must go back to the Sheriff-substitute for proof, because the respondent's counsel is not in a position to admit the documents upon which obviously the case to a large extent depends. We cannot, therefore, repel even the plea to title in the meantime, and it is not worth while to repel the plea to relevancy. The pursuer's averments bearing upon her title to sue must go to proof along with her averments on the merits. All that we now say is that her record is relevant, as regards both title and merits; but the documents and other matters requiring substantiation will have to be proved.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff-substitute, although he has found that the pursuer has no title to sue, has pretty clearly indicated that he has no sympathy, so far as the facts have been brought before him, with the defender's position, because he says, "The defender however denies that he has any funds belonging to the pursuer, though if there ever could be any misapprehension on that point it must surely have been effectually removed by the letter of 18th June 1913 from Mr Corkhill, the secretary of the fund, to the defender Hume."

In dealing with the title to sue he has not mentioned or adverted to the case of fraud which the pursuer makes in her condescendence. The case of fraud against the defender comes out in condescendence 7. She says, "Mr Corkhill made it clear to the defender that the committee did not and could not regard the defender as in any way dependent on the deceased, and that the pursuer's claim was a good one." Then in condescendence 9 she says, "The defender is thus fraudulently attempting to appropriate the said money."

The Sheriff-substitute, on the other hand, deals with the case as one where there has been some misunderstanding. He says, "If so she cannot have now a better title to sue anyone in whose hands the sum awarded may through some misunderstanding be deposited." Then he says, "The sum in question may have been remitted to the defender Hume under the erroneous impression that the defender had already settled with the pursuer." As I read the pursuer's case, it is not a case of misunderstanding or erroneous impression at all, but that the defender was not only bound to know but did actually know that he was getting this money for Miss Costin and not for himself. A plea in law has now been added appropriate to the averments of fraud.

Dec. 3, 1913.
Costin v. Hume.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor appealed against, allow to the parties before answer a proof of their respective averments."

BEVERIDGE, SUTHERLAND, & SMITH, W.S.—R. F. CALDER, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 19.

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

MISS ELIZABETH BIRNIE COUPER, Pursuer (Respondent).—Cooper, K.C.—Wilton.

RIGHT HONOURABLE ALEXANDER HUGH BRUCE, BARON BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Defender (Reclaimer).—Clyde, K.C.—J. H. Millar.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Sufficiency of averments of malice—Report by ratepayer to local authority as to management of a public hospital.

The matron of a hospital belonging to certain local authorities brought an action of damages against a ratepayer for defamatory statements regarding her conduct, contained in letters addressed by him to the County Council and to the Local Government Board, reporting information which he alleged he had received with regard to the management of the hospital, and demanding an inquiry. The pursuer averred that the defamatory statements were deliberately invented by the defender, although he had information in his possession which disproved them; that they were made maliciously and with the intention of injuring her; that the defender, although he stated in his letter to the County Council that certain information as to the hospital had been given to him, had in point of fact received no such information; and that the letter to the Local Government Board was accompanied by a private letter from the defender to a member of the Board, designed to influence him against the pursuer in considering the charges as to her management of the hospital, and that the defender declined to produce this letter although it had been returned to him.

Held that, while the defender's letters were privileged, facts and circumstances sufficient to infer malice were averred; and issues allowed.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo.

A ratepayer having made certain charges against the matron of a hospital, an inquiry was held in which evidence was given by the matron and by other members of the hospital staff. The commissioner who conducted the inquiry reported adversely on the credibility of certain members of the staff, but stated his belief in the truthfulness of the matron, and exonerated her from the charges made against her. On this report being sent to the ratepayer, he acknowledged receipt of it in a letter in which he said: "I have but a languid interest in the question of which member of the staff lied the most." In an action of damages for defamation brought by the matron against the ratepayer, the pursuer sought to innuendo these words as representing that she had lied in giving evidence at the inquiry.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Dewar) that the words would not bear this innuendo; and an issue disallowed.

(SEE report of previous action between the same parties, 1913 S. C. 492.)

2D DIVISION. Lord Dewar.

On 26th July 1912 Miss Elizabeth Birnie Couper, matron of

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

the Clackmannan Combination Infectious Diseases Hospital, Alloa, brought an action of damages for defamation against Lord Balfour of Burleigh, residing at Kennet, Alloa. On 15th January 1913, by interlocutor of the Second Division, that action was dismissed, in respect that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.*

Thereafter, on 4th April 1913, Miss Couper brought the present action of damages for defamation against Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

In this action the pursuer, after setting forth that the hospital was administered by a committee of management who were nominated by the County Council of Clackmannan and the burghs of Alloa, Alva, Tillicoultry, and Dollar, averred:—(Cond. 2) "On 15th July 1911 two children, Rose and Carlos Forbes, aged respectively six and three years, were admitted to the hospital, being notified by Dr James Robertson, Clackmannan, their family medical attendant, as suffering from scarlet fever, and were placed in the scarlet fever ward. On 31st July a Mrs Comrie was admitted to the hospital suffering from scarlet fever, and died next day in the hospital. Carlos Forbes died in the hospital on 21st August 1911." (Cond. 3) "On or about 1st September 1911 the defender, without communicating in any way with the said Hospital Committee, addressed the following letter to James Whitehead Moir, solicitor, Alloa, clerk to the County Council of Clackmannanshire, namely:—

'Kennet, Alloa, Sept. 1, 1911.

'Dear Mr Moir,—I desire to lay before you the following statement of facts, and beg the favour that a stringent inquiry will be made into the whole circumstances, which seem to me to reflect very seriously on the management of the County Fever Hospital.

'On Saturday, July 15th, two children of my overseer, Mr R. Forbes (Rose and Carlos being the Christian names), were taken to the hospital. They were both suffering from scarlet fever of a very mild type. Both were out of bed and progressing to a favourable recovery when seen by their parents on August 5. On August 11th Rose was sent home said to be cured, but on the following day or on the 13th she developed serious fever, and had to be again taken to the hospital. This time the fever was most severe. I understand it was of the type known as "Septic." The little boy also developed the severe type of fever about the same or an earlier date.

'The serious part of the case is this, that on or about July 30th, a woman from Sauchie with the most malignant type of fever was put into a bed in close proximity to the children, almost the next bed to one of them. This woman died within a few hours. The dates would seem to show that both children were infected from this poor woman with the malignant fever, and as I have said, the little boy died. I am told that a lad Norval from Clackmannan, who entered the hospital about May 22nd suffering from the same mild form of fever as these two children, also got the serious type of fever in the hospital, but recovered. So far the facts are not, I think, susceptible of contradiction. I am told, but this is hearsay, that the matron was responsible for putting the Sauchie woman into the close proximity to the two Forbes children, and that she did it in spite of remonstrances from at least one other member of the staff. If this is the case it points in my opinion to criminal conduct.

* Reported 1913 S. C. 492.

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

'In any case the whole circumstances should in my opinion be made the subject for a most rigid and circumstantial inquiry. I am confident you will agree with me, and that the County Council will see that such an inquiry is made.

'I add that I reserve my right to carry the matter further by appeal to the Local Government Board, or otherwise as may seem right.—I am, faithfully yours, 'BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH.

'J. W. Moir, Esq.'

The defender on any matters affecting the hospital had previously communicated with the said Hospital Committee, and in regard to such matters it was his duty, and he knew it, if he had any complaint to make against the hospital staff, to make such complaint to the said Hospital Committee." (Cond. 4) "The statements in the said letter, namely:—[The portion of the letter from "The serious part" to "criminal conduct." was here quoted]—are of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, calumnious, and malicious. The woman referred to was put in the bed in which it is customary to put female patients on their admission. If the defender had made any inquiry he would have found this to be the case. It was not true that the defender had received any information, hearsay or otherwise, that the pursuer had put the woman into the bed mentioned in spite of remonstrances from at least one other member of the staff. No such remonstrances had been made, and the defender was never told that they had. Further, it was not true that the defender had been told that a lad Norval had entered the hospital suffering from the same mild type of fever as the two children, and had got the serious type in the hospital. A boy Norval was admitted to the hospital, but he was suffering on admission from a very bad type of fever. The statements referred to were made by the defender recklessly and without regard to whether they were true or false. These statements were intended to represent and convey, and did represent and convey, the meaning that the pursuer was responsible for the death of Carlos Forbes mentioned in the letter by reason of her criminal conduct as matron in putting a patient suffering from the most malignant type of fever into close proximity to the said Carlos Forbes. There was absolutely no foundation for any imputation upon the character of the pursuer." (Cond. 5) "The defender had no right or duty to make the said statements complained of, and in any event he had no right or duty to make the said statements to the said James Whitehead Moir. The said James Whitehead Moir was not an official of the hospital, nor concerned in its management. The County Council of Clackmannanshire, to which body the said James Whitehead Moir was clerk, was not the proper authority to receive or deal with complaints against the hospital, and the defender knew that it was not. Any complaint should have been addressed to the Hospital Committee, and the defender knew that. The defender addressed the said letter to the said James Whitehead Moir instead of to the said Hospital Committee for the purpose of prejudicing the said committee and their servants, and in particular the pursuer, in the eyes of the County Council, who elect four out of thirteen members of the said committee, and with a view to getting the County Council to influence its representatives on the said committee to support his false accusations when the matter was considered by the said committee, who, alone, as he well knew, could investigate them. Further, with the object of forcing both the County Council to use pressure upon the said committee and of compelling the said committee to make a report substantiating his false accusations, he intimated in the said letter that he reserved his right to appeal to the Local Government Board, by way of threat, believing that he would thereby coerce the said committee into making a report bearing out his accusations rather than have a Local Government Board inquiry into their administration. . . ." (Cond. 6) "The said letter of 1st September 1911 was transmitted by the said James Whitehead Moir to the said Hospital Committee. Neither he nor the County Council of Clackmannan had power to investigate the accusations made therein, and the defender knew that they had not. After inquiry the said committee found that the allegations of the defender against the management of the hospital were not supported by any evidence, and in particular with regard to the said statements complained of by the pursuer as affecting her, the said committee found that they were (as they were in fact) groundless. The said committee further recorded their opinion that the defender should either substantiate his said complaint in regard to her by evidence or withdraw it. In particular the committee found (1) that the lad Norval had come into hospital suffering from a severe attack of scarlet fever, and that his illness was not contracted there; (2) that the woman referred to in the defender's letter of 1st September was put into the bed into which it was customary to put new patients; and (3) that the members of the nursing staff on duty at the time in question repudiated the statement to the effect that any remonstrance had been made by them. Further, it appeared from reports by the physician who had charge of the hospital that it was extremely doubtful, in view of subsequent developments, whether the diagnosis of the said Dr Robertson, that the said two children were suffering from scarlet fever when they went to the hospital, was correct. The said Dr Robertson is a personal friend of the defender." (Cond. 7) "By letter dated 5th October 1911, the clerk to the hospital intimated to the said James Whitehead Moir the decision of the said committee of management, and reference is made to this letter for its terms. On 12th October 1911 the decision of the said committee of management was communicated to the defender. Copies of signed statements from (1) Dr John Crawford, the medical superintendent; (2) Dr R. Cramb, principal officer of Govan Combination Hospital, Shieldhall, Glasgow, and who had acted as locum tenens for the said Dr John Crawford during the first fortnight of August 1911; (3) the pursuer; and (4) the nurses of the hospital, together with a copy of the said letter of 5th October 1911, were also transmitted to the defender." (Cond. 8) "The defender, although invited by the said committee to withdraw his said charges against the pursuer, declined to do so. On the contrary, the defender openly expressed his dissatisfaction with the conclusions of the said committee, impugned without the slightest ground therefor the impartiality of the said committee, and, in spite of his knowledge that there were no grounds in fact for the imputations he had made against the pursuer, he did not withdraw his charges, but determined to press for further inquiry. The defender intimated this resolution upon his part by letter, dated 17th October 1911, to the said James Whitehead Moir. The defender was very angry that the said committee had not yielded to the pressure he had tried to put on them by his said letter of 1st September 1911, and by his threat of appealing to the Local Government Board. He was in particular annoyed that his accusations had been found baseless, that it had become generally known among the public in Alloa and Clackmannanshire (as it had) that he had been found in the wrong in his allegations, and that the accuracy of his friend's, Dr Robertson's, diagnosis had been doubted. The defender had no right or duty to demand any further inquiry on the part of anyone into the statements made by him in the said letter of 1st September 1911. No one with any legitimate interest disputed the conclusions reached by the said committee, or complained of these conclusions in any way, and the defender in particular had no information of any kind warranting his pressing for any further inquiry into the said charges upon the personal conduct of the pursuer. Moreover, the defender had then received information which showed that these charges were false and ought not to have been made in his said letter of 1st September 1911. He determined, however, upon getting an additional inquiry into the whole of the statements in his said letter of 1st September 1911, not in the interests of the father of the said children or on public grounds, but solely in the hope that he might get some sort of report which would relieve him of the public discredit he had incurred by making charges which had been found baseless, and which would remove the doubts cast on the diagnosis of Dr Robertson." (Cond. 9) "On or about 18th October 1911, the defender addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Local Government Board for Scotland in the following terms:—

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

'October 18th 1911.

'Sir,—I beg to submit the accompanying correspondence relative to the Combination Fever Hospital in Alloa for the information of the Local Government Board for Scotland.

'I have numbered them 1 to 6 in chronological order.—I am, &c.,

'BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH.'

The correspondence sent with this letter consisted, inter alia, of (1) copy of the defender's said letter of 1st September 1911 to Mr Moir; (2) the said letter dated 5th October 1911 by the clerk to the said Hospital Committee to Mr Moir; (3) copy of the said signed statements by the medical superintendent, the pursuer, and others, referred to in said last-mentioned letter; (4) Mr Moir's letter to the defender dated 12th October 1911, transmitting the said letter of 5th October 1911, and relative signed statements; and (5) copy of the defender's said letter of 17th October 1911 to Mr Moir. The defender also at the same time communicated privately in writing with the legal member of the said Board. The defender had no right to communicate privately with the said legal member or any member of the Board in reference to the matter, and he did so solely with the view of improperly influencing the consideration by the said legal member of the said Board of the said letter of 18th October 1911 and its other enclosures to the prejudice of the pursuer. It is believed that the Board returned the said private letter to the defender, who is hereby called upon to produce the said letter or a copy thereof." (Cond. 10) "Although the defender did not in his said letter of 18th October 1911 expressly ask for a further inquiry, his object and purpose in writing that letter and in writing the said private letter to the legal member of the said Local Government Board for Scotland was to get the Board to cause an inquiry to be made with reference to the whole allegations made by him in the said letter of 1st September 1911. The defender was well aware that there were no grounds, public or otherwise, for any such inquiry. He had been a former president of the Board, and he thought that the fact of his previous official connection with the Board would influence the Board to order such an inquiry. No other person, upon the information which he placed before the Board, could have obtained such an inquiry. The Board, relying on the defender's eminent position, believed that he must have grounds for the said allegations which he made. In point of fact, he had no grounds whatever, and he was moreover in possession of information completely disproving such allegations." (Cond. 11) "The Local Government Board therefore appointed their medical inspector, Dr Frederick Dittmar, to inquire into the said allegations made by the defender. Dr Dittmar is not only a highly experienced official of the Board, but a medical man of the best reputation and character, and conducts any investigations committed to him by the Board with scrupulous care and impartiality. After making his investigations he reported to the said Board that in his opinion the said Rose and Carlos Forbes probably did not suffer from scarlet fever when admitted to the hospital, that it was impossible to say from whom the said Carlos Forbes obtained his infection after admission to the hospital, that it was not likely that he was infected by the said woman patient, and that in any event that matter was of secondary importance. In connection with the discharge of her duties by the pursuer no blame was in any way attached to the pursuer by the said Dr Dittmar." (Cond. 12) "On or about 27th December 1911 the said Local Government Board communicated to the defender the report of the said Dr Dittmar. The said report contains, inter alia, careful statements of the evidence given to Dr Dittmar by all the persons who could give any information on the matters of the charges made by the defender. The defender was very angry at the result of this second inquiry. It was well known in Alloa and Clackmannanshire generally that the inquiry was taking place, and the defender was extremely annoyed that this second inquiry, like the first, resulted in showing the baselessness of his accusations and casting great doubt on Dr Robertson's diagnosis. The defender attributed, without any cause, this result to the partisanship of the said Dr Dittmar. He refused to accept the inquiry held by him as final. The defender resolved, regardless of all truth and considerations, to bring the hospital management and those who had anything to do with the hospital into disrepute, and in furtherance of this resolve he determined to renew the charges he had already made, and to make further charges against, inter alios, the pursuer, without having the slightest ground therefor." (Cond. 13) "On or about 11th January 1912 the defender, in pursuance of his said resolution, addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Local Government Board in the following terms:—

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

'11th January 1912.

'Sir,—I duly received your letter of the 27th, with a copy of Dr Dittmar's report. I regret to have to say that neither the method of the inquiry nor the result seem to me, according to my humble judgment, to be at all satisfactory.

'I think it was a grave error of judgment on the part of Dr Dittmar to be driven about the country by Dr Crawford, in regard to whose administration at least one part of his inquiry had reference. I do not wish to use harsh terms, but I think the result achieved is little less than a farce. Medical terms are used in such a way as to confuse, rather than to enlighten, people of even average intelligence. This

I can see, ignorant as I am, from such knowledge as I have acquired during my thirty years' presidency of the London Fever Hospital.

'Taking the report itself, let me refer you to the following points:—

'On page 29 in the twentieth line Dr Dittmar commits himself to this statement:—"The responsible officials in hospital do not appear to have been absolutely certain that the cases had scarlet fever when admitted to hospital, but Dr Crawford's opinion was that, though not typical cases, on the whole they were probably suffering from the disease. It was perhaps natural to leave them in the scarlet fever ward in the circumstances, but from what occurred, I think it will be generally admitted that it was a pity they were not moved to one of the observation wards within a few days of admission to hospital."

'I do not think many people will agree with him, and in my opinion, if those in authority really entertained any doubt, the course taken is enough in itself to condemn the whole administration of the hospital. Either the authorities had suspicion at the time that the children had not scarlet fever or they had no such suspicion. If they had no such suspicion they cannot found upon it now. If they had, no words of mine can be too severe for the folly of leaving children in a ward of the kind under the circumstances then existing. I may say that it was both illegal as a matter of administration, and cruel as a matter of conduct.

'On page 31, on the third line from the bottom, Dr Dittmar again refers to the observation wards. May I ask if he saw them, and if he has anywhere recorded his candid opinion about them?

'Page 32, the seventeenth line. It may be of no importance in Dr Dittmar's opinion how the child got his second attack of fever, but even Dr Dittmar cannot gloss over the fact that the boy did get it and that he died of it.

'In the third line from the bottom of the same page Dr Dittmar says, "the idea that Carlos was infected by this woman has probably arisen from the circumstance that her case and that of Carlos both ended fatally." This seems to me a perfectly fatuous and entirely silly remark, for which no shade or shadow of foundation is given. If the poor child died of septic infection and not malignant fever it only makes the case for the hospital worse.

'With regard to the two last lines on page 33, Dr Dittmar may belittle the incident as much as he likes, but it seems to me harsh treatment for a baby fever patient, notwithstanding Dr Dittmar's opinion. But are the nurses to be relied on?

'With regard to the last four lines of page 34, I suggest that the state of circumstances therein revealed is not in accordance with the Public Health Act, and yet, so far as I can see, there is no real condemnation of the state of matters admitted to exist.

'All along I have been afraid that a much worse state of things existed than has been revealed.

'I understand now that events have occurred since I left home some days ago which throw a lurid light on the whole matter under discussion. I understand from a source on which I think I can rely that two or three of the hospital nurses have resigned their places, and that the matron has also gone, and that they realise the grave responsibility of their position and some of the things that have occurred. A further inquiry would throw a good deal more light upon the actual state of matters and on what happened, but that inquiry would have to be conducted by a gentleman who really desired to find out the truth. I understand these nurses went to a medical man in Alloa and informed him that the original charts and registers in the case of the Forbes boy had been wilfully destroyed, either with the knowledge or under the direction of the matron, and that those submitted to Dr Dittmar were fabricated for the purpose.

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

'I am going to Switzerland to-morrow, and shall be away for about ten days, but the Local Government Board and Dr Dittmar may rest assured that the matter will not rest where he has left it.—I am, &c.,

'BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH.'"

(Cond. 14) "The statements in the said letter of 11th January 1912 are in part of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, calumnious, and malicious. They were made by the defender recklessly and without any cause, in the knowledge that they were false, and in gross disregard for the interests of the pursuer, and not for the purpose of having the circumstances of the illness of the said Rose and Carlos Forbes investigated, but to gratify his resentment and ill-will at his said charges having been found baseless, and at the reflections which had been cast on the said Dr Robertson's diagnosis. So far as any of these statements were based upon alleged information supplied to the defender by the said Dr Robertson, the defender was not entitled to rely on its accuracy. The defender was aware that Dr Robertson's diagnosis had been doubted, that Dr Robertson was very angry at this, and that Dr Robertson, like himself, was anxious to get the hospital, its committee and servants, discredited in public estimation. The defender himself represented in the said letter of 11th January 1912 that certain nurses examined by the said Dr Dittmar were not trustworthy persons, and yet some of the grave charges against the pursuer made by the defender in the said letter were based, as he knew, on information said to have been furnished by these nurses. The defender further knew when he wrote the said letter of 11th January 1912 that one of the said nurses had been summarily dismissed by the medical superintendent with the approval of the convener of the Hospital Committee on 8th January 1912. Notwithstanding these facts, and that the said Dr Robertson had invited the defender before taking any further action in the matter to see the said nurses, the defender declined this opportunity and immediately wrote his said letter of 11th January 1912. The defender had no information before writing his said letter of 11th January 1912, other than a letter dated 9th January 1912, addressed to him by the said Dr Robertson. The information in the said letter did not justify him in writing the said letter of 11th January 1912. The statement at the end of said letter that 'the Local Government Board and Dr Dittmar may rest assured that the matter will not rest where he has left it,' was made with the view of forcing the Local Government Board to make a report, regardless of truth, which might appear to justify the accusations which the defender had made. The said letter was written, not with the bona fide object of getting an impartial inquiry into the matter, but with the object of getting a report which might, regardless of truth, establish a false reputation of the defender as a public-spirited ratepayer." (Cond. 15) "Further, the defender deliberately invented the statements in the said letter, namely—'that the matron' (meaning thereby the pursuer) 'has also gone, and that they' (meaning thereby the said nurses and the pursuer) 'realise the grave responsibility of their position, and some of the things that have occurred.' For these statements in particular affecting the pursuer the defender had absolutely no ground whatever. Neither the said Dr Robertson nor any one else had ever made any statements to the defender to any such effect, and he had no information of any kind, hearsay or otherwise, warranting his making such statements. In fact, from the information then in his possession he knew that it was untrue to suggest or assert that the pursuer had surrendered her position as matron, that she had gone from the hospital, that she had left Alloa, and also that she had realised her position, and had acknowledged or confessed by her conduct in leaving the hospital her guilt of the charges he imputed to her in the said letter of 11th January 1912. Prior to the adjustment of the record in this action it was admitted, on behalf of the defender, that the sole information upon which he proceeded in writing the said letter of 11th January 1912 was the said letter of 9th January 1912 written to him by the said Dr Robertson." (Cond. 16) "The said statements complained of in the said letter of 11th January 1912, and, in particular, the statements contained in the second last paragraph thereof, were intended to represent and convey, and did represent and convey, that the pursuer was responsible for the death of the said Carlos Forbes by reason of her criminal conduct while acting as matron of the hospital in putting a patient suffering from the most malignant type of fever into close proximity to the said Carlos Forbes; that the pursuer had given false evidence to the said Dr Dittmar at the inquiry before him; that she had procured nurses acting under her to give false evidence thereat; that she had wilfully destroyed, or caused to be destroyed, original charts and registers in the case of the said Carlos Forbes; that she had fabricated or caused to be fabricated other charts and registers in their place; that she had uttered and submitted these fabricated charts and register to the said Dr Dittmar as true and genuine documents, and to defeat the ends of justice; that, realising her guilt, she had deserted her said post as matron, and left Alloa as a person guilty of grave crimes; that but for the partiality of the said Dr Dittmar her guilt as alleged by him would have been discovered; and that she was not fit to be matron of the said hospital, or of any hospital." (Cond. 17) "The purpose of the defender in writing the said letter to the said Local Government Board of 11th January 1912 was to force a third inquiry, because of his displeasure and disappointment with the result of the said two previous inquiries, and in particular because the result of the said two inquiries proved that he had made baseless charges against the management of the hospital and against the pursuer. The defender wished to get another inquiry not in order to substantiate the charges he had made, which he knew to be groundless, but in the hope of obtaining some finding that would free him from reproach for the false charges he had made, and would make him appear to be a public-spirited citizen. The defender had no right as a citizen or otherwise to address the said letter of 11th January 1912 to the Local Government Board. Further, in pursuance of his said policy of compelling the Board to accept his views, he improperly threatened the Board in the said letter that he would bring their position in the matter before Parliament. The Board ordered a fresh inquiry in respect of his attack upon the said Dr Dittmar, his threats if the Board did not comply with his request, and his fresh and groundless allegations against the pursuer. The Board appointed James A. Fleming, K.C., then Sheriff of Dumfries

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

and Galloway, as their commissioner, to hold this inquiry." (Cond. 18) "The result of the inquiry, held on three days in February 1912 by the said Commissioner, was that he, on 18th March 1912, also reported to the said Local Government Board that all the charges made against the pursuer by the defender were without foundation. The witnesses adduced at this inquiry were all examined on oath. The pursuer was a member of the staff of the said hospital, and as such she was one of these witnesses so examined.* On 25th April 1912 the Local Government Board transmitted to the defender a copy of the report of the said Commissioner." (Cond. 19) "On or about 29th April 1912 the defender, who refused to accept the findings of the said Commissioner, addressed a letter to the secretary of the said Local Government Board in the following terms:—

'29th April 1912.

'Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th with above reference number, and enclosing a copy of the report, dated the 18th March, by Sheriff Fleming, on the allegations made to the Board that certain evidence submitted to their medical inspector in regard to the Clackmannan Combination Hospital had been found to be false. It bears all the marks of a careful and conscientious investigation, but for that Sheriff Fleming's reputation is a sufficient guarantee.

'I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have but a very languid interest in the question of which members of the staff lied the most. The point in which I was interested was that into which Dr Dittmar was originally appointed to inquire, namely, as to the treatment of the Forbes children, and as to the attempts on the part of the hospital authorities to allege that they had never had scarlet fever, as a sort of quasi justification for the treatment they received in the hospital, and as a palliation of their responsibility for the melancholy results which followed. I have already expressed my view of Dr Dittmar's inquiry and of his report, and really these are the only matters about which I have either any real interest or any claim to express an opinion.

'I see nothing in this report to lead me to modify the views which I then expressed, and in regard to which it would be of prime interest to me if I could have the judgment of the Local Government Board.

—I am, &c., BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH.'

The statements in the said letter of 29th April 1912 are in part of and concerning the pursuer, and are false, calumnious, and malicious, and were intended to represent, and did represent, that, notwithstanding that the said Commissioner had reported to the said Local Government Board that the said charges made by the defender in his said letter of 11th January 1912 against the pursuer were without foundation, these charges were nevertheless true; that his original charges against the pursuer first made in his said letter of 1st September 1911 were also true; that in particular she was responsible for the improper treatment the said Forbes children received, and for the death of one of them in consequence of such treatment; that she was a deliberate liar, and had no regard for truth; and that she had given false evidence in the said inquiries conducted by the said Dr Dittmar and by the said Commissioner; and that in the inquiry before the said Commissioner she had been guilty of perjury. Without any justification the defender, by writing the said letter, sought to induce the said Local Government Board to support his unwarrantable persistence in his said accusations against the pursuer, and to issue a judgment differing from the findings of the said Commissioner. On 31st May 1912 the said Local Government Board, by letter of that date written by their secretary, informed the defender that 'they entirely agree with Sheriff Fleming's conclusions that no fault is proved against the administration of the hospital, so far as regards the Hospital Committee, the medical officer, the matron, or the sisters.' The said Board at the same time characterised the defender's said attack upon Dr Dittmar, which he renewed in his said letter of 29th April 1912, as unjustifiable, and it was in fact unjustifiable. On or about 29th June 1912 the said Board, by their secretary, informed the clerk to the said committee that they concurred in the findings of the said Commissioner. It is believed and averred that in further correspondence with the said Board, after receipt by him of the Board's said letter of 31st May 1912, the defender has adhered to and persisted in the imputations made by him upon the pursuer and the said Dr Dittmar. The defender is called upon to produce said further correspondence." (Cond. 20) "On or about 13th May 1912 the pursuer, by her agents, requested the defender to withdraw the said charges and insinuations which he had made against her in the said letters complained of, and to make such reparation to her as he might consider right and proper in the circumstances. Again, on 22nd May 1912, failing to obtain a satisfactory reply from the defender, the pursuer's agents, by letter of this date, urged the defender to accept the findings of Sheriff Fleming, and to grant the pursuer the fitting reparation of an apology. The pursuer then offered that the whole matter, in so far as regards herself, might be so honourably closed. The defender declined to accept Sheriff Fleming's report, and insisted upon the Local Government Board giving their judgment thereon before he would consider the pursuer's said request for an apology. The Board intimated their judgment as aforesaid to him on 31st May 1912. Thereafter the defender still declined to withdraw any of his allegations against the pursuer, or to give any apology to the pursuer, and intimated by letter from his agents, dated 4th June 1912, to the pursuer's agents, inter alia:—'If the report of Sheriff Fleming, which followed that inqury, seems to exoner the matron from much of the blame which Dr Robertson's letter seems to cast upon her, we think the matron has cause to thank rather than to blame his Lordship for the opportunity which that inquiry has given her of clearing herself of the stigma thrown upon her conduct as matron by several of the nurses serving under her.' The said statements in the said letter of 4th June 1912 are of and concerning the pursuer, are false, calumnious, and malicious, and were made because the defender was very angry at the Local Government Board not having made a report which justified his action in bringing the matter before them. By the said letter of 4th June 1912 he admitted that he had thrown a stigma upon the pursuer and her conduct as matron. He falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented by the said letter that the pursuer was unfit for her position as matron, although she was not so bad as he had represented her to be. The said letter of 4th June 1912 is produced. The defender has refused to express regret for the imputations cast upon the pursuer, and he has further refused to supply the pursuer with the names of his alleged informants in regard to the statements made by him in his said letter of 1st September 1911."

* In his report the Commissioner, after commenting adversely on the credibility of the evidence of some of the nurses, stated:—"On the other hand, the matron impressed me very favourably. I think she is a woman anxious to do her work, truthful in her whole account of what she has done, even of the faults she has committed, and full of zeal and desire to have the hospital work done as smoothly as possible."

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (3) In respect that the letters of the defender libelled and the statements therein contained and complained of by the pursuer were privileged, the action should be dismissed.

On 15th July 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) approved of five issues for the trial of the cause.* The first was based on the letter of 1st September 1911, printed ante, p. 140, and the second on the letter of 11th January 1912, printed ante, p. 144. The third, which was based on the letter of 29th April 1912, printed ante, p. 148, was in these terms:—"Whether the statements in the said letter are in whole or in part of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, maliciously, and calumniously represent, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer had lied in giving evidence in inquiries conducted by Dr Dittmar and Sheriff Fleming, K.C., or make similar false, malicious, and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?" The two other issues (which were based on the letter of 29th April 1912 and on subsequent letters) were withdrawn by the pursuer's counsel in the Inner House and, accordingly, are not dealt with in this report.

---

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the facts averred by the pursuer]—These, I think, are the material facts upon which the pursuer founds. She makes a number of averments which I shall notice presently, but the substance of the case she presents is this. The defender is a man in a very prominent position, whose utterances and opinions carry great weight. He has recklessly and maliciously preferred grave charges against her, which have affected, and still most seriously affect, her character and reputation. These charges have been investigated at the defender's request on three separate occasions by three impartial tribunals. She has been declared innocent on all three occasions. Yet the defender will not acknowledge her innocence, but persists in accusing her still. She has made every effort to induce him to assist in removing the stigma from her character which he has placed upon it, and to restore her to the position she occupied in public estimation before he attacked her. All her efforts have failed, and she now appeals as a last resort for a trial by jury. The defender's answer to this is, that he made the statement complained of in the public interest, on a privileged occasion, and without malice, and is therefore under no legal obligation to withdraw anything he said. Assuming that the occasion was privileged—and I think it was—the question whether the pursuer is entitled to a jury trial depends upon whether she has stated on record facts and circumstances sufficient, if proved, to show that the defender abused the occasion, and displayed such reckless disregard of the pursuer's feelings and interests that a jury might reasonably infer that he was acting not in the public interest, but from some improper motive. Before proceeding to consider this question it is necessary to recall the circumstances in which a jury trial has already been refused.

"When the case was previously before me the only letters I was asked to consider were the first two. I decided that they contained defamatory

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 20th, 22nd, and 29th November 1913. Dec. 6, 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—All the issues should be disallowed in respect that, the occasion being privileged, malice was not relevantly averred; and, in any event, the third issue should not be allowed, as the letter on which it was founded contained no issuable matter. The present case was similar to cases of judicial slander,[1] and fell within the rule applicable in such cases, viz., that to overcome the privilege it is not enough to aver that the statements complained of were false, and known by the defender to be false, but facts and circumstances inferring malice must be set forth.[2] No such circumstances were averred here. In the former action between these parties it was held that the pursuer's averments were irrrelevant; and the only additional material averment in the present case was that the defender deliberately invented the statements he made. But an averstatements; but that the occasions on which they were written were privileged, and that the pursuer must therefore aver upon record facts and circumstances from which malice might reasonably be inferred. Their Lordships of the Second Division agreed with me in this. I further decided that the averments made by the pursuer on record were sufficient, if proved, to entitle the jury, if they thought fit, to infer malice and to decide in the pursuer's favour. The considerations which weighed with me in reaching this conclusion were these:—(1) It appeared to me that the defender had used language of unnecessary violence, and had prima facie not treated the pursuer's interests and feelings with that consideration which the law expects and requires of one who is protected in discharging a public duty. While the defender was privileged in laying facts before the authorities sufficient to induce them to institute an inquiry into the management of the hospital, he appeared to have gone beyond what was necessary for that purpose in suggesting that the pursuer had been guilty of criminal conduct. (2) The pursuer averred, and offered to prove, that the charges were made without any inquiry as to whether they were true or false. (3) They were repeated after her innocence had been established. (4) The defender refused to withdraw them although, as the pursuer averred, he knew that there were no grounds in fact for imputing criminal conduct to her at all. I thought that if these things were proved to the satisfaction of the jury, they might quite reasonably reach the conclusion that the defender had permitted his mind to be influenced by some improper motive, and had gone beyond the region of privilege, and I accordingly allowed the issues. But my interlocutor was recalled by the Inner House. That decision is, of course, binding on me, and the question now is whether the averments which the pursuer has made on this record are sufficient to distinguish the present case from that which has already been decided. I think they are.

---

"In the former case, although it was held that the pursuer's averments fell short of what was relevant to infer malice, I gather from the opinions expressed that they were not considered very far short. Lord Dundas said: 'It may be that the defender could, in the circumstances, without any sacrifice of principle or of dignity, have expressed some measure of regret that statements made by him in the bona fide discharge of a duty . . . should have cast unmerited reflection upon the pursuer's character and caused her pain and inconvenience. It may be that such an expression would have been a kind and handsome act on his part.' Lord Salvesen agrees with this and says: 'It is to be regretted that the defender should

---

[1] Ingram v. Russell, (1893) 20 R. 771, per Lord M'Laren, at p. 778.

[2] Campbell v. Cochrane, (1905) 8 F. 205; M. v. H., 1908 S. C. 1130; Stevenson v. Wilson, (1903) 5 F. 309; A v. B, 1907 S. C. 1154.

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

ment of this kind without specification of any circumstances supporting it was not in the present instance enough to displace the privilege. In some special cases it might possibly be sufficient; but, as the letters here showed that the defender had proceeded on some information given to him, the pursuer was bound to disclose the facts which enabled her to say that the defender had invented the statements. Moreover, as the pursuer in condescendence 10 alleged that the defender had information in his possession which disproved his statements, the pursuer ought to have stated what that information was.[1] The third issue in any case was not admissible, as the letter on which it was founded would not bear the innuendo put on it. In deciding the case the Lord Ordinary had misapprehended the import of Clark v. Molyneux.[2]

Argued for the respondent;—Sufficient facts and circumstances inferring malice were set forth on record.[3] Not only were some of

---

have lent such a credulous ear to the statements of the doctor.' And Lord Guthrie says: 'It is impossible not to feel sympathy for a person like the pursuer who has been subjected to the anxiety, pain, and expense of three inquiries into charges which these inquiries have proved unfounded, and to regret that these charges should ever have been made.' Now when a man lends too credulous an ear to the voice of the slanderer and makes unfounded charges which should never have been made, and which cause anxiety, pain, and expense, and when he refuses to do anything at all—even to say a word which could be said without sacrifice of principle or dignity—to assist in repairing the injury which his credulity and rashness have caused, I think he must be assumed to have come very near that point when one may reasonably ask whether he has acted in this way in the honest belief that it was all necessary in the public interest, or whether he has not permitted himself to be influenced at some stage by some improper motive. I do not, therefore, think that much additional averment is necessary. But the pursuer has put a good many new averments on record, and the following, I think, are the most important:—(1) It is averred that it is not true that the defender had received any information, hearsay or otherwise, that the pursuer had put the woman into a bed in close proximity to the children in spite of remonstrances from at least one of the other members of the staff. No such remonstrance had been made, and the defender was never told that it had. These statements were made by the defender recklessly and without due regard to whether they were true or false; (2) that although the defender knew that the Hospital Committee was the proper authority to address, yet he wrote to the clerk to the County Council for the purpose of getting the County Council to influence its representatives on the committee to support his false accusations; (3) when the Hospital Committee delivered its report the defender impugned, without the slightest grounds therefor, the impartiality of the committee, and in spite of his knowledge that there were no grounds for the imputations he had made against the pursuer, determined to press for further inquiry, not on public grounds, but because he was angry that he had been found in the wrong, and hoped that a fresh report might relieve him from the public discredit he had incurred by making charges which had been proved baseless; (4) that the defender 'deliberately invented' the statements in the letter of 11th

---

[1] Webster v. Paterson & Sons, 1910 S. C. 459, per Lord Guthrie, at p. 463.

[2] (1877) 3 Q. B. D. 237.

[3] Royal Aquarium and Summer and Winter Garden Society v. Parkinson, [1892] 1 Q. B. 431; M. v. H., 1908 S. C. 1130; Clark v. Molyneux, 3 Q. B. D. 237; Shaw v. Morgan, (1888) 15 R. 865.

the defender's statements alleged to be false to his own knowledge, but malice further appeared from the facts that the statements (1) were made without inquiry [1]; (2) were made recklessly and without regard to whether they were true or false [2]; (3) were repeated, and no apology was offered for them [3]; (4) were couched in violent terms [4]; and (5) were submitted to the wrong local authority.[5] In regard to the third issue the pursuer was entitled to have the decision of the jury as to whether the letter was not intended to convey the meaning set forth in the innuendo.

At advising on 6th December 1913,—

Lord Dundas.—This case is the sequel of an action of damages for slander raised by the present pursuer against the present defender which

January that the pursuer had surrendered her position at the hospital and had left Alloa, and that he knew from the information then in his possession that it was untrue to suggest that she acknowledged by her conduct in leaving the hospital her guilt of the charges he imputed to her; (5) that the defender wrote a private letter to a member of the Local Government Board (which was returned to him) with the view of improperly influencing the Board to the prejudice of the pursuer. Some of these averments may be very difficult to substantiate, but at this stage I must assume that they are true and can be proved, and on that hypothesis there can, I think, be no doubt that they are relevant and sufficient to entitle the pursuer to have her case laid before a jury. 'If a man is proved to have stated that which he knew to be false, no one need inquire further. Everybody assumes thenceforth that he was malicious, that he did do a wrong thing for some wrong motive. So if it be proved that out of anger, or for some other wrong motive, the defendant has stated as true that which he does not know to be true, and he has stated it whether it is true or not, recklessly, by reason of his anger or other motive, the jury may infer that he used the occasion, not for the reason which justifies it, but for the gratification of his anger or other indirect motive.'—Clark v. Molyneux, (1877) 3 Q. B. D. 237, at p. 247. I think this dictum covers the pursuer's case. She offers to prove that the defender made some of the accusations against her knowing them to be false. That he made others recklessly without caring whether they were true or false—and did so, not in the public interest, but because he was angry that he had been found in the wrong. The only question I have to consider is whether these averments are relevant and sufficient. I think they are. It will be for the jury to decide, after hearing evidence, whether they are true or false. I therefore approve of the first two issues.

"The third, fourth, and fifth issues were not before the Court in the previous action and therefore require separate consideration. They are

[1] White & Co. v. Credit Reform Association and Credit Index, Limited, [1905] 1 K. B. 653, per Collins, M.R., at p. 658; Elliott v. Garrett, [1902] 1 K. B. 870; Shaw v. Morgan, 15 R. 865, per Lord Young, at pp. 870, 871.

[2] Forteith v. Earl of Fife, (1821) 2 Murray, 463; M'Donald v. Fergusson, (1853) 15 D. 545, per Lord President M'Neill, at p. 548.

[3] Ingram v. Russell, 20 R. 771, per Lord M'Laren, at p. 778; Currie v. Weir, (1900) 2 F. 522, per Lord Moncreiff, at p. 524; Folkard on Slander and Libel, (7th ed.) p. 212. Hulton & Co. v. Jones, [1910] A. C. 20, per Loreburn, L.C., at p. 23, and Wragg v. Thomson & Co., Limited, 1909, 2 S. L. T. 409, were also referred to.

[4] Gall v. Slesser, 1907 S. C. 708; Torrance v. Leaf, (1835) 13 S. 1146.

[5] Hebditch v. MacIlwaine and Others, [1894] 2 Q. B. 54, per Esher, M.R., at p. 59, Davey, L.J., at p. 64.

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

Lord Dundas.

was before us some time ago.[1] In that case the Lord Ordinary allowed issues; but we reversed his judgment and dismissed the action, because we held that, the occasions being admittedly privileged, the pursuer had not relevantly averred malice on the part of the defender. The pursuer in this new action has greatly amplified her condescendence. The Lord Ordinary has held it to be relevant, and has approved of five issues for the trial of the cause. The fourth and fifth of these were (rightly and properly, I think) abandoned by the pursuer's counsel at our bar. I have come to the conclusion that of the remaining three issues the first and second must be allowed, and that the third should be refused.

In support of the first and second issues the pursuer in her new record makes a series of averments which I cannot doubt are relevant to infer malice. Some of them amount to very grave allegations indeed, importing as they do that the defender has been guilty of deliberate falsehood and fabrication. I do not disguise my impression that the pursuer will have the greatest difficulty in proving them at the trial, when one looks at the documents which are in process, quite apart from one's public based upon the letter which the defender wrote to the Local Government Board on 29th April, and the two letters which his solicitors, on his instructions, wrote to Messrs Wood & Robertson on 4th and 25th June. The first question raised is whether the occasions on which these letters were written were privileged. [After examining the circumstances]—I am therefore of opinion that all three occasions were privileged, and the word 'maliciously' must be inserted in all the issues.

---

"The next question is whether the words complained of in the third issue will bear the innuendo which the pursuer seeks to put upon them. The words occur in the letter dated 29th April, and are:—'I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have but a very languid interest in the question of which members of the staff lied the most.' The innuendo proposed is whether these words were intended to represent that 'the pursuer had lied in giving evidence in inquiries conducted by Dr Dittmar and Sheriff Fleming.' The defender maintained that the words are not reasonably capable of bearing that meaning; that they only refer to the fact that a considerable portion of Sheriff Fleming's report dealt with the unsatisfactory nature of the evidence given by some of the nurses, and were not intended to refer to or reflect on the pursuer at all. That may be so. But it must be kept in view that the defender had already accused the pursuer of wilfully destroying documents and fabricating others to deceive the Commissioner, and it was largely on account of that accusation that Sheriff Fleming had been appointed, and that, I think, was the chief question to which he directed his attention. He found, after a very careful analysis of the evidence, that the accusations were without foundation, and that some of the nurses had given false evidence, and that the pursuer had spoken the truth. In these circumstances, the defender cannot be surprised that his comment—which is certainly not generous—should be open to misconstruction. If he did not mean to suggest that the whole staff—including the pursuer—lied, he should have made that clear. It may be that he was not thinking of the pursuer at the time. That is quite possible. But, on the other hand, he may have intended to include her, and if he did, I think the words used are capable of bearing the innuendo. It will be for the jury to say, after they have heard any explanation the defender may have to offer, whether he intended or did not intend to accuse the pursuer of having given false evidence. [His Lordship then dealt with the fourth and fifth issues.]"

[1] 1913 S. C. 492.

knowledge of the defender's character and position. But I assume, as I am bound to assume, that the record has been framed by learned counsel with a full sense of their great responsibility, and upon what they have reason to believe are reliable instructions. In cond. 4 it is averred, with regard to certain statements in the defender's letter of 1st September 1911, that it is not true that he had received any information, hearsay or otherwise, that the pursuer had put the Sauchie woman into the bed mentioned in spite of remonstrances from at least one member of the staff; that no such remonstrances had been made, and that the defender was never told that they had been made; and that the defender made the statements recklessly and without regard to whether they were true or false. Again, the pursuer alleges (cond. 8) that, when the defender moved for an inquiry by the Local Government Board after he had received the report of the investigation by the hospital authorities, he had then received information which showed that there was no ground for the imputations against the pursuer contained in his said letter of 1st September 1911; that he was influenced, in moving for the second inquiry, by oblique motives; and (cond. 10) that "in point of fact he had no grounds whatever, and he was moreover in possession of information completely disproving such allegations." Then, as regards the defender's letter of 11th January 1912, the pursuer avers (cond. 14) that the statements in it, so far as of and concerning her, were made by the defender recklessly and without any cause, in the knowledge that they were false, and to gratify his resentment and ill-will; and that the letter was written "not with the bona fide object of getting an impartial inquiry into the matter, but with the object of getting a report which might, regardless of truth, establish a false reputation of the defender as a public-spirited ratepayer." The pursuer further avers (cond. 15), with reference to the same letter, that the defender "deliberately invented" certain of the statements made in it; that he had "absolutely no grounds whatever" for making them; that neither Dr Robertson nor anyone else had ever made any statements to the defender to any such effect, and he had no information of any kind, hearsay or otherwise, warranting his making them; and that in fact, from the information then in his possession, he knew it was untrue to suggest what is said or suggested in his letter. However startling the averments I have summarised may be, they are deliberately made upon the pursuer's record by responsible counsel, and I cannot doubt that they are relevant, because, if they can be substantiated, they would afford amply sufficient grounds for attributing malice to the defender. There is another topic which, as it is averred by the pursuer, seems to me to raise matter for inquiry. It is alleged (cond. 9) that on 18th October 1911, when the defender wrote to the Local Government Board, after the hospital committee's report had been issued, he at the same time sent a private letter to the legal member of that Board in reference to the matter. The pursuer alleges that this private letter was written solely with the view of improperly influencing the legal member's consideration of the subject-matter of inquiry, and that it was returned to the defender by the Board; and she calls upon the defender to produce the letter. The defender does not produce it. If we had the letter

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

Lord Dundas.

before us, it may be that its contents would turn out to be harmless enough as regards the matters at issue. But in its absence I must say that I cannot be judicially satisfied, having regard to the pursuer's averments, that its contents may not be such as to afford ground for some reasonable inference of malice or oblique motive on the defender's part. The incident is, I think, one calling for inquiry and explanation.

I agree, therefore, with the Lord Ordinary that the first and second issues must be allowed. The third issue stands, I think, in a different position. I am for refusing it, upon the ground that the words complained of could not, in my judgment, upon any reasonable or legitimate construction, be held to have been used of and concerning the pursuer. The issue is based upon a passage in a letter, dated 29th April 1912, by the defender to the secretary of the Local Government Board, where he says, "I wish to say that, so far as I am concerned, I have but a very languid interest in the question of which members of the staff lied the most." The proposed issue puts the question whether the statements are in whole or in part of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely, maliciously, and calumniously represent, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer had lied in giving evidence in inquiries conducted by Dr Dittmar and Sheriff Fleming, K.C.? The hospital staff consisted of a visiting physician, a matron (the pursuer), a sister, and four probationers. If the passage complained of is isolated from its context and taken quite by itself, it might be open to read it as meaning or implying that, as all the staff had lied, the defender was not concerned with the question which of them had lied the most. But the passage must be read along with its immediate context. The opening sentence of the letter discloses that the defender was acknowledging receipt of Sheriff Fleming's report, which he characterises as bearing all the marks of a careful and conscientious investigation. Then follow the words complained of. Now, the learned Sheriff's report, which is produced, and must at this stage be considered so far as is necessary for the fair understanding of the defender's letter, makes it plain that he had carefully expressed his opinion in regard to the truthfulness, or the reverse, of the witnesses examined before him; and, while commenting in very unfavourable terms upon the evidence of certain nurses, stated that, on the other hand, the pursuer impressed him favourably, and was, in his opinion, truthful in her whole account of what she had done, even of the faults she had committed. I think it would be a wholly unreasonable construction, in these circumstances, if a jury were to hold that the passage in the letter which is complained of was intended to refer to or include the pursuer. Her counsel frankly admitted that, upon his reading of the words, they might be held to refer to any member of the staff, including the visiting physician, quite as well as to the matron.

For these reasons, I think we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor; refuse the third, fourth, and fifth issues; approve of the first and second issues; and appoint these to be the issues for the trial of the cause.

LORD SALVESEN.—I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion of Lord Dundas and am unable to resist the reasoning with which he supports his conclusions. I cannot, however, refrain from saying that I concur with reluctance and regret. Apart from the position which the defender holds in public esteem, I think that the averments made by the pursuer that he deliberately invented defamatory stories with regard to a woman with whom he had never come in contact are so improbable as to be almost incredible, and it is these statements alone which contain relevant material from which malice may be inferred. We are, however, not at liberty to consider at this stage of the cause whether the pursuer's averments are capable of proof, but only whether, if proved, they would support the charge of malicious defamation which is now made. There is no better evidence of a slander being malicious both in fact and in law than that it was uttered in the knowledge of its falsity. This was conceded by the defender's counsel, but his main ground in support of the plea of irrelevancy was that the averments were lacking in specification. I fail to see, however, how the only serious averments of the pursuer can be made more specific without disclosing the evidence upon which they are presumably based, and this she is not bound to do as a condition of obtaining an inquiry.

Lord Guthrie.—In view of the opinions delivered in this Division, when the previous case between the parties was before the Court, the only question which arises on the first two issues is whether, the circumstances being, on the face of the pursuer's own averments, privileged, facts and circumstances have now been averred by the pursuer sufficient, if proved, to infer malice on the part of the defender. Under the previous record we had to deal with averments which charged the defender with the circulation of defamatory statements about the pursuer, but we construed these averments as admitting that the defender passed on the statements as he got them. In my opinion I said: "The pursuer founds on statements passed on by the defender to the proper authorities as hearsay requiring investigation, but she does not suggest that he in any way originated these statements, or even altered them." The pursuer now avers, in connection with the letters which form the subject of the first and second issues, that, instead of passing on statements reported to him by others as these statements reached him, the defender invented material statements defamatory of the pursuer contained in these letters. Obviously such conduct, if proved, might reasonably be held to infer malice. In regard to the third issue, I agree that, taking the letter of 29th April 1912, along with Sheriff Fleming's report to which it refers, the statements in the letter are not reasonably capable of bearing the innuendo which the pursuer seeks to put upon them, and therefore that the third issue should be disallowed.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—When the former case between these parties was considered by the Court it was decided that upon the record as presented no issue could be allowed, there being a case of privilege disclosed, and there being no averments of fact from which malice could be implied. There is now, in this second action, a record presented to the Court in which very grave charges are made against the defender, many in number, and expressed in very strong terms—stronger than in the course of a long experience I have ever seen in a case of the kind. Lord Dundas, in an opinion which I have had the opportunity of perusing, has given a full statement of the charges now made against the defender, and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them. They include accusations of deliberate and wilful falsehood, statements that the defender said he had received information regarding the conduct of hospital officials when, in point of fact, he had received no such information—that neither by hearsay or otherwise had he been informed of things as to which he asserted that he had been so informed; that he made statements knowing them to be false, and it is even said that he "invented" accusations which he knew to be untrue, and that he endeavoured to induce a public authority to give a decision contrary to what he knew to be the fact.

Dec. 6, 1913.

Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

All these things are stated in the condescendence by the pursuer, and maintained as fact by her counsel, who must be presumed to have well considered what allegations were to be made as stating matter of fact, and at this stage the Court must take the statements pro veritate and, on the assumption that they do relate facts, consider whether they are such as to give ground for an issue based on malice. I agree with your Lordships that they do supply such ground. If they can be substantiated by evidence, then beyond doubt a case of malice would be made out. I therefore agree that the first and second issues should be allowed to go to trial.

I think it right to notice that there is another averment relating to a letter said to have been written to a member of the Local Government Board by the defender, when he was endeavouring to induce the Board to take up the inquiry regarding the matters of which he complained. It is said that the letter was one in which he endeavoured unjustifiably to bring pressure to bear upon the Board, taking advantage of his distinguished position. It is alleged that the Local Government Board returned the letter to him. If so, it is in his possession, and is not as yet produced. If such a letter, written with such intent, was sent as alleged, I cannot doubt that it might be a question of fact for the consideration of a jury, whether it afforded evidence of malice. At present when the contents are not revealed, I think the allegations regarding it may be taken into consideration in the question whether malice is sufficiently averred.

As regards the third issue, I concur with your Lordships in thinking that it ought to be disallowed. I am unable to see that reading the part of the letter in the schedule in any reasonable sense it can be held that there is any accusation made against the pursuer. The defender is referring to Mr Fleming's report, which speaks of the pursuer only in terms of approbation, but speaks somewhat strongly in regard to the want of truthfulness of some of the nurses in the hospital. When the defender in his letter speaks of "those who lied the most" the expression cannot be extended beyond those of whom Mr Fleming spoke, except upon the footing that it was intended to include the whole staff, for there is certainly no allusion to the pursuer individually. There is no indication that allusion is being made to any other persons than those whom the reporter had indicated as having prevaricated and so not spoken the truth. It therefore does not seem to me that the words quoted can bear the innuendo which the pursuer endeavours to put upon them. I am in favour therefore of disallowing the third issue and, the fourth and fifth having been withdrawn, the result will be that the first and second issues only will be approved of for the trial of the cause. Dec. 6, 1913. Couper v. Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary; disallowed the third issue; and, the fourth and fifth issues having been withdrawn, approved of the first and second issues for the trial of the cause; and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therein.

G. M. WOOD & ROBERTSON, W.S.—W. & J. COOK, W.S.—Agents.

CHARLES HOWATSON, Appellant.—Chree, K.C.—Macquisten.
JOHN M'CLYMONT, Respondent.

No. 20.

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

Lease—Small holdings—Exceptions—Permanent grass park held for business not "primarily agricultural or pastoral"—Pasture tenanted by dairykeeper—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), sec. 26 (3) (g).

The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, enacts, sec. 26 (3), "A person shall not be held an existing yearly tenant or a qualified leaseholder under this Act in respect of . . . (g) Any land . . . being permanent grass park held for the purposes of a business or calling not primarily agricultural or pastoral, including that of butcher, cattle-dealer, and the like."

A dairykeeper was the yearly tenant of two fields of permanent pasture which he used for grazing and feeding five cows, whose milk he sold in his dairy business along with the milk, which he purchased, of ten other cows belonging to neighbouring farmers.

Held (diss. Lord Ormidale) that the subjects were held by him for the purposes of a business or calling which was "primarily pastoral," and accordingly did not fall within the provisions of section 26 (3) (g) so as to exclude him from the benefit of the Act.

ON 24th January 1913, John M'Clymont, dairykeeper, Kirkburnhead, Muirkirk, in the county of Ayr, applied to the Scottish Land Court to be declared a statutory small tenant in respect of a holding known as Toll-parks, Kirkburnhead, in the parish of Muirkirk and county of Ayr, belonging to Charles Howatson of Glenbuck, Ayrshire, and to have the period of renewal of his tenancy and a first equitable rent fixed in terms of section 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911. 1ST DIVISION. Land Court.

The landlord objected to the competency of the application on the ground that the holding, being permanent grass park used for the purposes of a business not primarily agricultural or pastoral, was excluded from the Act by section 26 (3) (g) * thereof.

After hearing evidence and inspecting the holding, the Land Court issued an interlocutor which, inter alia, repelled the objection, found the applicant to be a statutory small tenant, and fixed the period of the renewal of his tenancy and the equitable rent.

* Section 26 (3) (g) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49) is quoted in the rubric.

Section 32 (1), which defines a statutory small tenant, enacts that such tenant must be, inter alia, "a tenant from year to year, or leaseholder, not otherwise disqualified in terms of the Act."

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

At the request of the landlord a case was stated for the opinion of the First Division.

The case set forth:—"The holding in respect of which the application was made consists of two fields, one extending to ten acres, and the other to three and a half acres, held by the applicant on yearly tenancy at a rent of £20. He became tenant of the first field about eighteen years ago, and of the second field some years later. There was no written lease. The tenant was not at liberty to break up any part of these fields without the landlord's consent. A part of the holding extending to about one acre had been formerly broken up by him with such consent, but at and since the commencement of the Small Landholders Act, these fields have been in permanent pasture. The fences are maintained by the tenant. There are no buildings on the holding. The holding is used by the applicant for the grazing and feeding of his stock. His regular stock consists of five cows and a horse. He cuts hay on the field of three and a half acres, and feeds his stock with it. The applicant is, and has for the last twenty-two years been, a dairykeeper, supplying the village of Muirkirk with milk. In his dairy business he sells milk produced by his own five cows, and the milk of other ten cows belonging to neighbouring farmers which he buys from them. His horse is used for the purposes of his holding, and also for conveying the milk to the village of Muirkirk."

The question of law was:—"Whether on the facts above set forth, the Scottish Land Court was bound to hold that the said subjects were permanent grass park held for the purposes of a business or calling not primarily agricultural or pastoral within the meaning of section 26 (3) (g) of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, and therefore excluded from the operation of the Act?"

The case was heard before the First Division (consisting of the Lord President, Lord Skerrington, and Lord Ormidale) on 4th December 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—The business of the applicant was primarily commercial, viz., that of selling milk, and could by no stretch of language be described as "primarily agricultural or pastoral." The only purpose for which he held the grass parks was in order to supply milk for this business. That he had no other purpose in view was clearly shown by the fact that he not only used all the milk produced on his holding in the course of his business, but had also to buy a large quantity—in fact the greater part of the total amount he required—from outside sources. "Primarily" meant "chiefly" or "mainly," and even if a dairy business could in any sense be described as pastoral it could not be described as "mainly" or "chiefly" pastoral; especially a business such as the applicant's, in which the major portion of the milk was purchased and was not produced upon his holding. The applicant was in exactly the same position as the butcher or cattledealer, mentioned in the section under consideration, who rented a park to feed the beasts which he sold to his customers. If the word "primarily" referred to time, then undoubtedly the applicant's business was not primarily pastoral, because he had been a dairykeeper selling milk several years before the date at which he became tenant of the parks.

There was no appearance for the respondent.

At advising on 12th December 1913,—

Lord President.—The question in this case is whether the applicant is a statutory small tenant within the meaning of the Scottish Small Landholders Act, 1911.

He is a tenant from year to year of two fields extending to 13½ acres. These fields are now and have for some time back been laid down in permanent pasture. He uses them for the purpose of feeding five cows, the milk of which he sells. It is contended that he does not come within the meaning of this Act, and that he cannot be denominated a statutory small tenant, in respect that he holds the fields for a business which is not primarily pastoral, and that he is, therefore, excluded from the benefit of the Act by virtue of the provisions contained in section 26 (3) (g).

I am of opinion that this contention is unsound, that the applicant is exactly in the position of a small dairy farmer who grazes cows upon his fields and sells the milk from a dairy situate on his farm, and therefore that the business which he carries on is not merely primarily pastoral but is exclusively pastoral.

The contrary is maintained on the ground that he not only sells milk which is yielded by the five cows fed in these two fields, but also the milk from ten cows which are grazed elsewhere. In my opinion that circumstance has no bearing on the question which we have to consider. He is, as I think, none the less engaged in a business which is purely pastoral, so far as the tenancy of these two fields is concerned, because he also sells milk given by cows that are fed on other fields. It appears to me that we have really nothing to do with the destination of the milk yielded by the cows that are fed upon the fields in question, and that we have before us a typical case of a small dairy farmer.

The exception to which section 26 (3) (g) applies is, I think, the case of a man carrying on the business of butcher, who hires grass fields in the vicinity of his slaughter-house into which he temporarily turns cattle on their way from the grazing to the slaughter-house, for custody or keeping, or feeding, as the case may be—a purpose which is strictly subordinate to and incidental to his business as a butcher. But when a man grazes cows upon a field and sells the milk, whether it be from a dairy on or off the holding, and whether he sells milk from cows grazed elsewhere as well as from cows grazed on the holding, it appears to me that he is using his field for a purely pastoral purpose.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the final order pronounced by the Land Court in this case was correct, and that we ought to answer the question of law put to us in the negative.

Lord Skerrington.—The respondent is a dairykeeper at Kirkburnhead, Muirkirk, and he was, on 1st April 1912, tenant under the appellant of two fields of 10 and 3½ acres respectively, which were then and have since been in permanent pasture. The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), is declared by section 26 (3) (g) not to apply to a person who is tenant of "any land . . . being permanent grass park held for the purposes of a business or calling not primarily agricultural or pastoral, including that of butcher, cattle-dealer, and the like." The Land Court has decided that the respondent's holding does not fall under this exception, and has accordingly found that he is a statutory small tenant, and, as such, entitled to have an equitable rent fixed and his tenancy renewed in terms of section 32 of the Act. The appellant contends that, on the facts set forth in the case, the Land Court was bound to hold that the permanent grass parks in question were held by the respondent for the purposes of a business which was not primarily agricultural or pastoral.

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

Lord Skerrington.

The milk which the respondent retails in the village of Muirkirk comes from two sources. He buys the milk of ten cows from neighbouring farmers, and he owns five cows which graze on his holding, and which are also fed on the hay which he cuts on the 3½ acre field. In addition to the five cows the respondent has a horse which is grazed and fed on the holding. It is used for the purposes of the holding, and also for conveying "the milk," which I understand to mean the produce of the whole fifteen cows, to the village of Muirkirk. Nothing, in my opinion, turns upon this point. From the foregoing statement it will be seen that the respondent carries on what may be regarded as two businesses, though I prefer to regard them as two branches or departments of the same business. One department is purely commercial, and consists in the purchase of milk and its resale at a profit. So far as appears, the respondent does not separate the cream from the milk which he buys, nor does he churn any part of it into butter. The other department is akin to the business of a dairy farmer, and consists in the production and sale of milk obtained from cows which belong to the respondent, which graze upon the holding, and which also eat the hay grown and cut upon one of the parks. I should not describe the respondent as a dairy farmer, because on such farms there are generally buildings for the accommodation of the tenant and his live stock, and also ground which can be cultivated in order to produce food stuffs other than meadow grass. But this distinction does not seem to me to be material so far as regards the present question.

The appellant's counsel argued that the respondent's business was not "primarily agricultural or pastoral," in the first place because the commercial part of it was of older standing than the other department, and in the second place because two-thirds of the milk sold in the business was procured by purchase and not by anything akin to farming. In my view the word "primarily" as used in this part of the statute does not refer either to the date at which a particular branch of a business was established, or to the special manner in which the owner of the business chooses to conduct it. The statute, in my opinion, regards certain businesses as not being primarily agricultural or pastoral because they are not ordinarily so regarded, and because they do not ordinarily involve the occupation of land for agricultural or pastoral purposes. For example, the business of a butcher is not generally regarded as either agricultural or pastoral, although a butcher may find it convenient to rent a field as a resting-place for his stock on their way from the market to the slaughter-house. Again, a village butcher might sell no meat except what came from animals which he himself had kept or bred upon a small holding. In such a case the time and capital expended on the keeping or breeding of live stock might much exceed that expended upon their slaughter and the sale of their meat. I do not think that considerations of this kind would be relevant for the purpose of showing that the business of a particular butcher was primarily pastoral. On the other hand, it would not necessarily follow that a grass park was held for the purposes of a butcher's business merely because the tenant happened to be a butcher and occasionally slaughtered a beast which he had kept on his holding. The question would be one of fact for the Land Court.

Applying this view of the meaning of the statute to the facts of the present case, I am of opinion that the grass parks tenanted by the respondent are held by him for the purposes of a business which is primarily pastoral, viz., the sale to the public of milk obtained from cows pastured and fed upon the holding. This business, as ordinarily conducted, does not make it necessary for the tenant to buy and sell milk not produced upon the holding. It is, therefore, primarily a pastoral business, and I do not think it material to inquire whether the milk produced upon the holding is sold along with or even mixed with other milk purchased by the tenant, or whether a separate account is kept of the price of the milk produced on the holding. Further, I do not think it necessary to inquire whether the respondent would continue to produce milk upon his holding if he did not see his way to increase his profits by buying and selling a much larger quantity of milk which had no connection with the holding. For these reasons I think that the question of law should be answered in the negative.

It would be improper to express an opinion upon different cases which may in the future come before the Land Court for decision, but obviously everything must depend upon the special facts of each particular case. Different considerations might apply if a tenant did not sell the milk produced upon his holding, but consumed it in some business not primarily pastoral which he carried on elsewhere, e.g. as an hotel-keeper or as a manufacturer; or again, if the tenant being the owner of a large herd of cows did not allocate to the holding a stock suitable to its size but used the holding as a supplementary food supply for the whole of his herd.

LORD ORMIDALE.—The question submitted for the opinion of this Court arises out of an application by John M'Clymont, who is designed in the case stated by the Land Court as a dairy-keeper, to be declared a statutory small tenant in terms of section 32 of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911. The answer to the question depends on the construction or meaning to be given to section 26 (3) (g) of that Act, which provides:—[His Lordship quoted the section].

From the facts set forth in the special case it is clear that the holding of the applicant consists of permanent grass park. There is no dispute about that. Can it be predicated of this permanent grass park that it is held for the purposes of a business or calling not primarily agricultural or pastoral? If it can, then the applicant shall not be held an existing yearly tenant. What are the other facts stated in the case? There are no buildings on the holding. The holding is used by the applicant for the grazing and feeding of his stock, which consists of five cows and a horse. "The applicant is and has for the last twenty-two years been a

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

Ld. Ormidale.

dairykeeper, supplying the village of Muirkirk with milk. In his dairy business he sells milk produced by his own five cows, and the milk of other ten cows belonging to neighbouring farmers which he buys from them. His horse is used for the purposes of his holding and also for conveying the milk to the village of Muirkirk."

Now from these facts it appears to me that the applicant has a business or calling, and only one business or calling, that, namely, of selling milk. Does he hold the permanent grass park for the purposes of that business or calling? In my opinion he does. The only purpose for which he grazes the permanent grass park with cows is to obtain from them milk to be sold to the customers of his dairy.

Can it be said that this business or calling of selling milk as carried on by the applicant is primarily pastoral? In my opinion it cannot. The greater part of the milk which he sells is purchased by him in the first instance, and then resold to his customers. It seems to me that with respect to that milk his business is a purely commercial or mercantile undertaking or venture, and cannot be described in any sense as primarily agricultural or pastoral, and certainly not in any other sense than the business of the butcher or cattle-dealer referred to in the statute can be so described. If so, does the fact that in addition to the milk which is bought in the first instance from other people he sells milk which is the produce of cows belonging to himself and grazed on the permanent pasture held by him make any difference? In my opinion it does not. It seems to me that it is a mere accident that some of the milk retailed by him to his customers is the produce of cows belonging to the applicant, provided that the true inference from the facts stated is that the milk is disposed of by him along with other milk in the course of a business which is, to borrow a word from the statute, primarily mercantile or commercial—and such is the only inference which it seems to me is warranted by the circumstances disclosed in the present case. I do not read the facts set forth as instructing that the applicant is a dairy farmer, and I offer no opinion one way or another as to the applicability of the section to such. I am prepared to answer the question of law submitted to this Court in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

CONNELL & CAMPBELL, S.S.C., Agents.

No. 21.
Dec. 5, 1913.
Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

REVEREND HENRY COWAN, D.D., AND OTHERS (Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland), Pursuers (Respondents).—Constable, K.C.—D. M. Wilson.
THE PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF LONDON, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Chree, K.C.—Lippe—Dykes.

Contract—Constitution—Right in security—Ground-annual—Contract by a party purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself.

Held that a contract, entered into by a proprietor of lands as first party and himself as second party, purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself was ineffectual, in respect that a man cannot by any deed constitute a debt by himself to himself.

Right in Security—Real burden—Ground-annual—Constitution—Assignation of invalid ground-annual—Disposition in security—Absence of express personal obligation.

By a deed in the form of a contract of ground-annual (containing a personal obligation) the owner of land purported to dispone it to himself in consideration of the payment by himself to himself of a ground-annual, which was declared to be a real burden on the land and in security of which he reconveyed the land to himself. By subsequent recorded deed he disponed for value to third parties the ground-annual and security-subjects specified in the prior deed. The later deed contained no personal obligation.

In an action by the disponees under the later deed against the proprietors of the land, who were the singular successors of the original owner, the pursuers, while admitting that no ground-annual was created by the prior deed, maintained (1) that the later deed, though intended to transfer a ground-annual which in fact did not exist, was sufficient by its terms to constitute a ground-annual as a real burden in their favour over the land in question; or otherwise (2) that, by the later deed, they were validly infeft in the land in real security of an annual payment by the granter and his heirs, which, the deed being onerous, he must be held to have warranted, and which was also binding on him in respect that he had impliedly adopted in the later deed the personal obligation in the prior deed.

Held that the pursuers were entitled to succeed on both of the grounds stated.

Observed per Lord Dundas: "Ground-annual is not a vox signata; I think it simply means a perpetual rentcharge secured in some effectual fashion as a real burden on land."

2D DIVISION. Lord Skerrington.

ON 10th May 1912 the Rev. Henry Cowan, D.D., and others, Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, brought an action against the Provident Association of London, Limited, and others. The summons concluded for declarator "that under and in terms of (1) contract of ground-annual between Peter Simpson, S.S.C., Edinburgh, heritable proprietor as therein mentioned, of the one part, and the said Peter Simpson, of the other part, dated 3rd, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Edinburgh 6th, both days of December 1883, and (2) disposition and assignation by the said Peter Simpson in favour of Thomas Graham Murray, W.S., convener; the said Reverend Henry Cowan, vice-convener; and George Baillie Wilson, treasurer; all of the said Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and their respective successors in office, as trustees for behoof of the said Committee, dated 8th, and recorded in

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

Ld. Ormidale.

dairykeeper, supplying the village of Muirkirk with milk. In his dairy business he sells milk produced by his own five cows, and the milk of other ten cows belonging to neighbouring farmers which he buys from them. His horse is used for the purposes of his holding and also for conveying the milk to the village of Muirkirk."

Now from these facts it appears to me that the applicant has a business or calling, and only one business or calling, that, namely, of selling milk. Does he hold the permanent grass park for the purposes of that business or calling? In my opinion he does. The only purpose for which he grazes the permanent grass park with cows is to obtain from them milk to be sold to the customers of his dairy.

Can it be said that this business or calling of selling milk as carried on by the applicant is primarily pastoral? In my opinion it cannot. The greater part of the milk which he sells is purchased by him in the first instance, and then resold to his customers. It seems to me that with respect to that milk his business is a purely commercial or mercantile undertaking or venture, and cannot be described in any sense as primarily agricultural or pastoral, and certainly not in any other sense than the business of the butcher or cattle-dealer referred to in the statute can be so described. If so, does the fact that in addition to the milk which is bought in the first instance from other people he sells milk which is the produce of cows belonging to himself and grazed on the permanent pasture held by him make any difference? In my opinion it does not. It seems to me that it is a mere accident that some of the milk retailed by him to his customers is the produce of cows belonging to the applicant, provided that the true inference from the facts stated is that the milk is disposed of by him along with other milk in the course of a business which is, to borrow a word from the statute, primarily mercantile or commercial—and such is the only inference which it seems to me is warranted by the circumstances disclosed in the present case. I do not read the facts set forth as instructing that the applicant is a dairy farmer, and I offer no opinion one way or another as to the applicability of the section to such. I am prepared to answer the question of law submitted to this Court in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

CONNELL & CAMPBELL, S.S.C., Agents.

No. 21.

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

REVEREND HENRY COWAN, D.D., AND OTHERS (Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland), Pursuers (Respondents).—Constable, K.C.—D. M. Wilson.
THE PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF LONDON, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Chree, K.C.—Lippe—Dykes.

Contract—Constitution—Right in security—Ground-annual—Contract by a party purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself.

Held that a contract, entered into by a proprietor of lands as first party and himself as second party, purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself was ineffectual, in respect that a man cannot by any deed constitute a debt by himself to himself.

Right in Security—Real burden—Ground-annual—Constitution—Assignation of invalid ground-annual—Disposition in security—Absence of express personal obligation.

By a deed in the form of a contract of ground-annual (containing a personal obligation) the owner of land purported to dispone it to himself in consideration of the payment by himself to himself of a ground-annual, which was declared to be a real burden on the land and in security of which he reconveyed the land to himself. By subsequent recorded deed he disponed for value to third parties the ground-annual and security-subjects specified in the prior deed. The later deed contained no personal obligation.

In an action by the disponees under the later deed against the proprietors of the land, who were the singular successors of the original owner, the pursuers, while admitting that no ground-annual was created by the prior deed, maintained (1) that the later deed, though intended to transfer a ground-annual which in fact did not exist, was sufficient by its terms to constitute a ground-annual as a real burden in their favour over the land in question; or otherwise (2) that, by the later deed, they were validly infeft in the land in real security of an annual payment by the granter and his heirs, which, the deed being onerous, he must be held to have warranted, and which was also binding on him in respect that he had impliedly adopted in the later deed the personal obligation in the prior deed.

Held that the pursuers were entitled to succeed on both of the grounds stated.

Observed per Lord Dundas: "Ground-annual is not a vox signata; I think it simply means a perpetual rentcharge secured in some effectual fashion as a real burden on land."

2D DIVISION. Lord Skerrington.

ON 10th May 1912 the Rev. Henry Cowan, D.D., and others, Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, brought an action against the Provident Association of London, Limited, and others. The summons concluded for declarator "that under and in terms of (1) contract of ground-annual between Peter Simpson, S.S.C., Edinburgh, heritable proprietor as therein mentioned, of the one part, and the said Peter Simpson, of the other part, dated 3rd, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Edinburgh 6th, both days of December 1883, and (2) disposition and assignation by the said Peter Simpson in favour of Thomas Graham Murray, W.S., convener; the said Reverend Henry Cowan, vice-convener; and George Baillie Wilson, treasurer; all of the said Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and their respective successors in office, as trustees for behoof of the said Committee, dated 8th, and recorded in

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

Ld. Ormidale.

dairykeeper, supplying the village of Muirkirk with milk. In his dairy business he sells milk produced by his own five cows, and the milk of other ten cows belonging to neighbouring farmers which he buys from them. His horse is used for the purposes of his holding and also for conveying the milk to the village of Muirkirk."

Now from these facts it appears to me that the applicant has a business or calling, and only one business or calling, that, namely, of selling milk. Does he hold the permanent grass park for the purposes of that business or calling? In my opinion he does. The only purpose for which he grazes the permanent grass park with cows is to obtain from them milk to be sold to the customers of his dairy.

Can it be said that this business or calling of selling milk as carried on by the applicant is primarily pastoral? In my opinion it cannot. The greater part of the milk which he sells is purchased by him in the first instance, and then resold to his customers. It seems to me that with respect to that milk his business is a purely commercial or mercantile undertaking or venture, and cannot be described in any sense as primarily agricultural or pastoral, and certainly not in any other sense than the business of the butcher or cattle-dealer referred to in the statute can be so described. If so, does the fact that in addition to the milk which is bought in the first instance from other people he sells milk which is the produce of cows belonging to himself and grazed on the permanent pasture held by him make any difference? In my opinion it does not. It seems to me that it is a mere accident that some of the milk retailed by him to his customers is the produce of cows belonging to the applicant, provided that the true inference from the facts stated is that the milk is disposed of by him along with other milk in the course of a business which is, to borrow a word from the statute, primarily mercantile or commercial—and such is the only inference which it seems to me is warranted by the circumstances disclosed in the present case. I do not read the facts set forth as instructing that the applicant is a dairy farmer, and I offer no opinion one way or another as to the applicability of the section to such. I am prepared to answer the question of law submitted to this Court in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

CONNELL & CAMPBELL, S.S.C., Agents.

No. 21.

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

REVEREND HENRY COWAN, D.D., AND OTHERS (Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland), Pursuers (Respondents).—Constable, K.C.—D. M. Wilson.
THE PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF LONDON, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Chree, K.C.—Lippe—Dykes.

Contract—Constitution—Right in security—Ground-annual—Contract by a party purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself.

Held that a contract, entered into by a proprietor of lands as first party and himself as second party, purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself was ineffectual, in respect that a man cannot by any deed constitute a debt by himself to himself.

Right in Security—Real burden—Ground-annual—Constitution—Assignation of invalid ground-annual—Disposition in security—Absence of express personal obligation.

By a deed in the form of a contract of ground-annual (containing a personal obligation) the owner of land purported to dispone it to himself in consideration of the payment by himself to himself of a ground-annual, which was declared to be a real burden on the land and in security of which he reconveyed the land to himself. By subsequent recorded deed he disponed for value to third parties the ground-annual and security-subjects specified in the prior deed. The later deed contained no personal obligation.

In an action by the disponees under the later deed against the proprietors of the land, who were the singular successors of the original owner, the pursuers, while admitting that no ground-annual was created by the prior deed, maintained (1) that the later deed, though intended to transfer a ground-annual which in fact did not exist, was sufficient by its terms to constitute a ground-annual as a real burden in their favour over the land in question; or otherwise (2) that, by the later deed, they were validly infeft in the land in real security of an annual payment by the granter and his heirs, which, the deed being onerous, he must be held to have warranted, and which was also binding on him in respect that he had impliedly adopted in the later deed the personal obligation in the prior deed.

Held that the pursuers were entitled to succeed on both of the grounds stated.

Observed per Lord Dundas: "Ground-annual is not a vox signata; I think it simply means a perpetual rentcharge secured in some effectual fashion as a real burden on land."

2D DIVISION. Lord Skerrington.

ON 10th May 1912 the Rev. Henry Cowan, D.D., and others, Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, brought an action against the Provident Association of London, Limited, and others. The summons concluded for declarator "that under and in terms of (1) contract of ground-annual between Peter Simpson, S.S.C., Edinburgh, heritable proprietor as therein mentioned, of the one part, and the said Peter Simpson, of the other part, dated 3rd, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Edinburgh 6th, both days of December 1883, and (2) disposition and assignation by the said Peter Simpson in favour of Thomas Graham Murray, W.S., convener; the said Reverend Henry Cowan, vice-convener; and George Baillie Wilson, treasurer; all of the said Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and their respective successors in office, as trustees for behoof of the said Committee, dated 8th, and recorded in

Dec. 12, 1913.

Howatson v. M'Clymont.

Ld. Ormidale.

dairykeeper, supplying the village of Muirkirk with milk. In his dairy business he sells milk produced by his own five cows, and the milk of other ten cows belonging to neighbouring farmers which he buys from them. His horse is used for the purposes of his holding and also for conveying the milk to the village of Muirkirk."

Now from these facts it appears to me that the applicant has a business or calling, and only one business or calling, that, namely, of selling milk. Does he hold the permanent grass park for the purposes of that business or calling? In my opinion he does. The only purpose for which he grazes the permanent grass park with cows is to obtain from them milk to be sold to the customers of his dairy.

Can it be said that this business or calling of selling milk as carried on by the applicant is primarily pastoral? In my opinion it cannot. The greater part of the milk which he sells is purchased by him in the first instance, and then resold to his customers. It seems to me that with respect to that milk his business is a purely commercial or mercantile undertaking or venture, and cannot be described in any sense as primarily agricultural or pastoral, and certainly not in any other sense than the business of the butcher or cattle-dealer referred to in the statute can be so described. If so, does the fact that in addition to the milk which is bought in the first instance from other people he sells milk which is the produce of cows belonging to himself and grazed on the permanent pasture held by him make any difference? In my opinion it does not. It seems to me that it is a mere accident that some of the milk retailed by him to his customers is the produce of cows belonging to the applicant, provided that the true inference from the facts stated is that the milk is disposed of by him along with other milk in the course of a business which is, to borrow a word from the statute, primarily mercantile or commercial—and such is the only inference which it seems to me is warranted by the circumstances disclosed in the present case. I do not read the facts set forth as instructing that the applicant is a dairy farmer, and I offer no opinion one way or another as to the applicability of the section to such. I am prepared to answer the question of law submitted to this Court in the affirmative.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the negative.

CONNELL & CAMPBELL, S.S.C., Agents.

No. 21.

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

REVEREND HENRY COWAN, D.D., AND OTHERS (Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland), Pursuers (Respondents).—Constable, K.C.—D. M. Wilson.
THE PROVIDENT ASSOCIATION OF LONDON, LIMITED, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Chree, K.C.—Lippe—Dykes.

Contract—Constitution—Right in security—Ground-annual—Contract by a party purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself.

Held that a contract, entered into by a proprietor of lands as first party and himself as second party, purporting to create a ground-annual in favour of himself was ineffectual, in respect that a man cannot by any deed constitute a debt by himself to himself.

Right in Security—Real burden—Ground-annual—Constitution—Assignation of invalid ground-annual—Disposition in security—Absence of express personal obligation.

By a deed in the form of a contract of ground-annual (containing a personal obligation) the owner of land purported to dispone it to himself in consideration of the payment by himself to himself of a ground-annual, which was declared to be a real burden on the land and in security of which he reconveyed the land to himself. By subsequent recorded deed he disponed for value to third parties the ground-annual and security-subjects specified in the prior deed. The later deed contained no personal obligation.

In an action by the disponees under the later deed against the proprietors of the land, who were the singular successors of the original owner, the pursuers, while admitting that no ground-annual was created by the prior deed, maintained (1) that the later deed, though intended to transfer a ground-annual which in fact did not exist, was sufficient by its terms to constitute a ground-annual as a real burden in their favour over the land in question; or otherwise (2) that, by the later deed, they were validly infeft in the land in real security of an annual payment by the granter and his heirs, which, the deed being onerous, he must be held to have warranted, and which was also binding on him in respect that he had impliedly adopted in the later deed the personal obligation in the prior deed.

Held that the pursuers were entitled to succeed on both of the grounds stated.

Observed per Lord Dundas: "Ground-annual is not a vox signata; I think it simply means a perpetual rentcharge secured in some effectual fashion as a real burden on land."

2D DIVISION. Lord Skerrington.

ON 10th May 1912 the Rev. Henry Cowan, D.D., and others, Trustees of the Endowment Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, brought an action against the Provident Association of London, Limited, and others. The summons concluded for declarator "that under and in terms of (1) contract of ground-annual between Peter Simpson, S.S.C., Edinburgh, heritable proprietor as therein mentioned, of the one part, and the said Peter Simpson, of the other part, dated 3rd, and recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Edinburgh 6th, both days of December 1883, and (2) disposition and assignation by the said Peter Simpson in favour of Thomas Graham Murray, W.S., convener; the said Reverend Henry Cowan, vice-convener; and George Baillie Wilson, treasurer; all of the said Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and their respective successors in office, as trustees for behoof of the said Committee, dated 8th, and recorded in the said Division of the General Register of Sasines, 11th, both days of December 1883, or otherwise and alternatively under and in terms of the said disposition and assignation, a ground-annual of £4, 5s. 11d. to be uplifted and taken furth of and from All and Whole that piece of ground on the south side of Gilmore Place, Edinburgh, upon which the self-contained dwelling-house, forming number 55 thereof, is built, with the plot in front thereof and the garden ground behind, being the subjects disponed in the third place in the above-mentioned disposition and assignation, was validly and effectually constituted a real burden on the said subjects, and that the pursuers as trustees foresaid are now in right thereof, or otherwise and alternatively, it Ought and Should be Found and Declared, by decree foresaid, that under and in virtue of the said disposition and assignation the pursuers and their successors in office as trustees for behoof of said Committee are validly and effectually infeft, as from the date of recording the said disposition and assignation, in the said piece of ground, and that in real security for the payment by the said Peter Simpson and his heirs and executors and personal representatives whomsoever to the pursuers and their successors in office as trustees foresaid of the yearly sum of £4, 5s. 11d. . . ."*

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

The contract of ground-annual referred to in the summons was in these terms:—"It is contracted and agreed between Peter Simpson, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts, Edinburgh, heritable proprietor of the areas of ground hereinarter disponed, of the first part, and the said Peter Simpson, of the second part, in manner following, viz., The said Peter Simpson, of the first part, in consideration of the ground-annuals and other prestations hereinafter undertaken by the said Peter Simpson, of the second part, has sold and hereby sells and dispones to and in favour of the said Peter Simpson, of the second part, and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, in the first place, . . . In the third place, All and Whole that piece of ground on the south side of Gilmore Place upon which the self-contained dwelling-house, forming number 55 thereof, is built, with the plot in front thereof and the garden ground behind, . . . And declaring that these presents are granted and the foresaid pieces of ground are disponed with and under the real and preferable lien and burden of the payment by the said Peter Simpson of the second part and his foresaids to the said Peter Simpson of the first part and his heirs and assignees whomsoever of the yearly ground-annual following, viz., of £4, 5s. 11d. sterling to be uplifted and taken by the said Peter Simpson of the first part and his foresaids furth of and from each of the pieces of ground before disponed in the first, second, third, and fourth places, and whole houses and buildings erected or to be erected thereon, or furth of any part or portion thereof, and readiest rents, maills, and duties of the same; . . . And the said Peter Simpson of the first part grants warrandice; For which causes and on the other part the said Peter Simpson of the second part binds himself and his foresaids to make payment to the said Peter Simpson of the first part and his foresaids of the foresaid several ground-annuals of £4, 5s. 11d. sterling for each of the said pieces of ground first, second, third, and fourth before disponed; . . . And for further security to the said Peter Simpson of the first part and his foresaids of the payment of the said several ground-annuals, . . . the said Peter Simpson of the second part, . . . hereby assigns, dispones and makes over to and in favour of the said Peter Simpson of the first part and his foresaids not only All and Whole the yearly ground-annuals, viz., of £4, 5s. 11d. . . . but also All and Whole the said pieces of ground and buildings erected or to be erected thereon, . . . and that in real security to the said Peter Simpson of the first part and his foresaids of the payment of the said yearly ground-annuals. . . ."

* The portion of the summons printed in italics was added by amendment by leave of the Lord Ordinary on 12th November 1912.

The disposition and assignation referred to in the summons was in these terms:—"I, Peter Simpson, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts, Edinburgh, in consideration of the sum of £702, 3s. 1d. sterling, now paid to me by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland's Committee for the endowment of Chapels of Ease, by the hands of George Baillie Wilson, their treasurer, of which sum I hereby acknowledge the receipt, and discharge the said Committee, do hereby sell, assign, and dispone to and in favour of Thomas Graham Murray, Writer to the Signet, convener, the Reverend Henry Cowan, minister of New Greyfriars, Edinburgh, vice-convener, and the said George Baillie Wilson, treasurer of the said Committee, and to their respective successors in office, any two of them being a quorum, as trustees for behoof of said Committee, and to their assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, not only the yearly ground-annuals following, videlicet, of £4, 5s. 11d. sterling, to be uplifted and taken by the said Thomas Graham Murray, the Reverend Henry Cowan, and George Baillie Wilson, and their respective successors in office, as trustees foresaid, and their assignees and disponees, in virtue of a contract of ground-annual entered into between me, the said Peter Simpson, on the one part, and me, the said Peter Simpson, on the other part, dated the 3rd . . . December 1883, furth of and from each of the pieces of ground after disponed in the first, second, third, and fourth places, and whole houses and buildings erected or to be erected thereon, or furth of any part or portion thereof, and readiest rents, maills, and duties of the same . . . commencing the first term's uplifting of said respective ground-annuals at the term of Whitsunday 1884 for the half year preceding, and the next term's uplifting at Martinmas thereafter, and so forth at the said two terms in all time coming, and with penalty, interest, and consequents, all as specified in the said contract of ground-annual, and herein held as repeated brevitatis causa, with the said contract itself and whole clauses and obligations therein contained, and all action, diligence, and execution competent; but also, in the first place, . . . In the third place, All and Whole that piece of ground on the south side of Gilmore Place upon which the self-contained dwelling-house forming No. 55 thereof is built, with the plot in front thereof and the garden ground behind . . . with the pertinents of the said several pieces of ground hereby disponed, and my whole right, title, and interest present and future therein: But always with and under the real liens, burdens, declarations, conditions, obligations, provisions, and limitations specified in the said contract of ground-annual dated and recorded as aforesaid, and that in real security to the said Thomas Graham Murray, the Reverend Henry Cowan, and George Baillie Wilson, as trustees foresaid, and their foresaids, of the payment of the said yearly ground-annuals, half-yearly payments thereof, interest and penalties before specified or referred to, and of the performance of the obligations and prestations incumbent on the said second party to the said contract of ground-annual; With entry as at the term of Martinmas 1883, notwithstanding the date hereof."

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

The pursuers averred that the deceased Peter Simpson, S.S.C., had executed the deeds referred to in the summons, that the defenders were his singular successors and as such the present proprietors of 55 Gilmore Place, and that they refused to pay the ground-annual or to recognise the pursuers' right thereto.

The pursuers pleaded;—In respect that under and by virtue of the deeds libelled, or otherwise and alternatively under the deed second libelled, a ground-annual of £4, 5s. 11d. to be uplifted from said subjects at 55 Gilmore Place, Edinburgh, was validly and effectually constituted a real burden on the said subjects, and that the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, are now in right thereof, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—In respect that no ground-annual has been validly constituted a real burden on said subjects in virtue of the deeds libelled, or either of them, the defenders should be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

On 12th November 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares in terms of the second alternative conclusion of the summons as amended, and decerns: Quoad ultra, dismisses the conclusions of the summons, and decerns."*

---

* "OPINION.—The pursuers ask for declarator that a ground-annual of £4, 5s. 11d. has been validly and effectually constituted a real burden over certain heritable subjects now belonging to the defenders, and that the pursuers are now in right thereof. They found primarily upon a so-called contract of ground-annual, dated 3rd, and duly recorded in the Register of Sasines 6th December 1883. This deed professes to create a number of ground-annuals affecting various properties, but the present action is concerned only with one ground-annual which was intended to form a burden upon the subjects disponed in the third place. The so-called contract is in the elaborate and artificial form usually adopted in transactions of this kind. The owner of the heritable subjects sells them to a purchaser in consideration of the ground-annual and other prestations undertaken by the purchaser, and he dispones the subjects to the purchaser under the real burden of the payment of a yearly ground-annual and also of the maintenance and insurance of the buildings, &c. On his part the purchaser binds himself personally to pay the ground-annual and to perform the other prestations. In security for these personal obligations he dispones to the seller not only a yearly ground-annual of the same amount as that already reserved, but also the heritable subjects themselves. In the present case, however, it is apparent upon the face of the deed that the transaction which it professes to record was imaginary and non-existent because the so-called seller and the so-called purchaser were one and the same person, viz., "Peter Simpson, S.S.C., Edinburgh, heritable proprietor of the areas of ground hereinafter disponed of the first part, and the said Peter Simpson of the second part." It follows that the so-called contract is null and void in all its clauses. In particular, the new infeftment in favour of Mr Simpson and the qualification of that infeftment by the real burden of a ground-annual in his own favour are nullities. Even if the deed had not taken the form of a meaningless contract, the practical result, so far as regards the present question, would have been the same. Mr Simpson could competently dispone his property to himself as institute, and he could (I assume) qualify this new infeftment by reserving what Mr Duff calls a "real lien" in favour of a third party (Feudal Conveyancing, p. 195); but he could

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 25th and 26th November 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The so-called contract of ground-annual between Peter Simpson and himself was inept and ineffectual to constitute a ground-annual, or to create a real burden or any obligation of any kind. The disposition and assignation, which ex facie of its terms did nothing but transfer a non-existent burden, was equally inept and effected nothing. The Lord Ordinary had read too much into it. The Court could only consider what a document did, and not what it attempted or intended to do.[1] The disposition contained no personal obligation, either express or implied, and therefore was incapable of creating a ground-annual. This consideration was also fatal to the Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment, since there could not be a disposition of the land in security of an obligation which had never been entered into. Moreover, the payment in quesnot effectually create a real burden in his own favour either by reservation or by constitution so as to affect a heritable subject of which he was absolute owner, any more than he could create a servitude in his own favour. It is, of course, a different question whether a ground-annual which has once been effectually created is extinguished, or, on the other hand, is only suspended, in the event of the person vested in the minor right or burden acquiring the higher right of property. See Murray v. Parlane's Trustee, (1890) 18 R. 287; King v. Johnston, 1908 S. C. 684.

---

"For the foregoing reasons I am of opinion that the so-called contract of ground-annual did not effectually create any real burden over the subjects now belonging to the defenders. Accordingly Mr Simpson remained absolute owner of the heritable subjects under his original title until his death in 1906.

"It now remains to consider the effect of the disposition and assignation, dated 8th, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines 11th December 1883, which he granted in favour of the pursuers in consideration of the payment of £702, 3s. 1d. It is obvious that when this deed was granted and accepted both parties had in view nothing more than a transfer to the pursuers of the rights which they assumed to be vested in Mr Simpson, as the first party to the contract of ground-annual already referred to. It does not, however, follow that a disposition of heritage may not operate in a manner different from that which the parties had in view provided it contains words habile to effect some other operation. Thus a bond and disposition in security which was granted by a person who was believed to have a feudal title to the subjects, and which was intended to create an ordinary heritable security, was held to operate as an assignation of a jus crediti which was all that the granter had to convey, and the recording of the bond was held to operate as intimation of the assignation. Edmond v. Magistrates of Aberdeen, 18 D. 47, aff. 3 Macq. 116."

[After narrating the terms of the disposition and assignation]—"I do not think that it is possible to construe the foregoing conveyance of a ground-annual as constituting and creating a new ground-annual, or as anything more than an assignation to the pursuers of the ground-annual (by reservation) which Mr Simpson had attempted to create by the contract of 3rd December 1883, and of the relative personal obligations, and of the ground-annual which he had attempted to constitute by way of security. These supposed rights being non-existent, the disposition and assignation was to that extent inoperative. I am, however, of opinion that the disposition and assignation, being an onerous deed, contained not expressly but by implication an unqualified acknowledgment on the part of Mr Simpson to

---

[1] Ballachulish Slate Quarries v. Menzies, (1908) 45 S. L. R. 667.

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

tion could not be a real burden on the land, since it did not appear in the defenders' titles.[1]

Argued for the respondents;—These parties did not now maintain that a valid ground-annual was created by the original deed. Their case was, first, that by the disposition and assignation the land was validly burdened with a ground-annual, or alternatively, second, that they were infeft in the land in security of a personal obligation impliedly contained in that deed, since in that deed Peter Simpson acknowledged or adopted his personal obligation in the so-called contract of ground-annual, and disponed the land in security thereof. (1) All the essentials of a ground-annual[2] were to be found in the disposition. A clause of personal obligation was not required, and the old form of a bond of annualrent did not contain it.[3] The deed was intended to transfer a right, but its terms were also apt to create it, and it should be construed in the way best calculated to give effect the effect that he stood from its date debtor to the pursuers for payment of the ground-annuals and performance of the various prestations undertaken by him as the second party to the so-called contract in his own favour as the first party. Mr Simpson could not, in my opinion, have successfully disputed his personal liability for the ground-annual and prestations in a question with the pursuers. It is true that he did not of new bind and oblige himself to pay the ground-annuals and to perform the prestations, but an acknowledgment of indebtedness is sufficient to constitute a debt and to give validity to a conveyance of heritable subjects in security thereof. If the true construction of the disposition and assignation is what I have stated, then it is immaterial that the present question arises with singular successors, because the deed was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, and it was their duty to make up their minds as to its meaning and effect. The granter had the full and unrestricted right of property in the subjects now belonging to the defenders, and he conveyed them to the pursuers in security for certain pecuniary and other obligations incumbent on him as 'the second party to the said contract of ground-annual.' The disposition and assignation itself sets forth plainly and fully the amount of the ground-annuals for which Mr Simpson acknowledged liability, the terms of payment, and the lands affected. It is, however, doubtful whether apart from statute the intended security is not ineffectual so far as regards the interest and penalties, and the various obligations ad factum præstandum, as regards all of which the disposition and assignation is insufficient in detail when taken by itself, and in regard to which it must be supplemented by a reference to the recorded contract of ground-annual. Probably the defect (if any) is cured by section 32 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, but the question was not fully argued, and it hardly arises under the conclusions as framed.

---

"I am prepared to affirm that the ground-annual mentioned in the summons is in a certain sense a real burden over the defenders' property, but I prefer to pronounce a decree declaring that under and in virtue of the disposition and assignation mentioned in the summons the pursuers, as trustees, and their successors in office and their assignees whomsoever, hold a valid and effectual conveyance of the heritable subjects described in the summons in real security for the payment by the late Peter Simpson, S.S.C., Edin-

---

[1] Magistrates of Arbroath v. Dickson, (1872) 10 Macph. 630; Magistrates of Perth v. Stewart, (1830) 9 S. 225, (1835) 13 S. 1100.

[2] Bell's Prin. sec. 861.

[3] Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, (3rd ed.) vol. ii., p. 1155, Juridical Styles, (3rd ed.) vol. i., pp. 216-218, (4th ed.) pp. 631, 634, 660; Duff's Feudal Conveyancing, pp. 262, 273.

to the real wishes of the parties.[1] (2) The disposition implied a personal obligation on Peter Simpson and his heirs to make payment of the sum in question. The deed being onerous, the unqualified acknowledgment by the granter of the existence of the debt specified in the prior deed (which though per se of no effect, could be referred to for its terms[2]), amounted to a guarantee that the debt existed,[3] and a homologation of the obligation which that deed contained.[4] The defenders were put on their guard by the recording of the disposition, and could not found on the absence of any reference to the ground-annual in their own titles.[5]

At advising on 5th December 1913,—

Lord Dundas.—The question here raised is whether the pursuers have a good real security upon the property of the defenders for a ground-annual of £4, 5s. 11d. per annum. The case, however, involves a larger pecuniary amount than would thus appear; because there are other ground-annuals, the validity of which will stand or fall according to our decision.

It is quite clear that the attempt made by Mr Simpson to create these ground-annuals by means of a so-called contract with himself was ineffectual. A man cannot by any deed constitute a debt by himself to himself, with or without security. The so-called contract,—a piece of conveyancing which I confess I do not appreciate at all,—is plainly inept and void as an operative instrument. The real question arises upon the second deed, whereby Mr Simpson for onerous causes, sold, assigned, and disponed to the pursuers not only (inter alia) the ground-annual in question,—which he and they appear to have thought he had created by his former deed,—but also the lands, of which (upon the assumption that the first deed was invalid) he was unrestricted owner, in real security of the ground-annual so conveyed.

It was very forcibly argued for the defenders that, inasmuch as the first deed was admittedly inept and had not constituted any ground-annual at all, it follows that there was no ground-annual to be transburgh, of the yearly ground-annual of £4, 5s. 11d., payable half-yearly, commencing the first term's payment at the term of Whitsunday 1884 for the half year preceding, and the next term's payment at Martinmas thereafter, and so forth at the said two terms in all time coming."

---

[1] Edmond v. Magistrates of Aberdeen, (1855) 18 D. 47, aff. 3 Macq. 116; M'Cutcheon v. M'William, (1876) 3 R. 565; Glen v. Scales's Trustee, (1881) 9 R. 317; Cattanach's Trustee v. Jamieson, (1884) 11 R. 972; Glasgow Feuing and Building Co., Limited, v. Watson's Trustees, (1887) 14 R. 610; Glen's Trustees v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Accident Insurance Co., Limited, (1906) 8 F. 915; Goodtitle v. Bailey, (1777) 2 Coup. 597, per Lord Mansfield, C.J., at p. 600; Roe v. Tranmarr, (1758) Willes, 682; Monypenny v. Monypenny, (1859) 3 De G. & J. 572, per Chelmsford, L.C., at p. 589; Gwyn v. Neath Canal Navigation Co., (1868) L. R., 3 Ex. 209, per Kelly, C.B., at p. 215; In re Johnston Foreign Patents Co., Limited, [1904] 2 Ch. 234; Norton on Deeds, p. 46.

[2] Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 32.

[3] Bell's Prin. sec. 1469, Bell's Com., (7th ed.) vol. i., p. 689.

[4] Bell's Com., (7th ed.) vol. i., p. 141.

[5] Stodart v. Dalzell, (1876) 4 R. 236.

Dec. 5, 1913.

Church of Scotland Endowment Committee v. Provident Association of London, Limited.

Lord Dundas.

mitted by the second deed, which accordingly carried nothing whatever to the pursuers. The pursuers, on the other hand, while not attempting to support the validity of the first deed as creating a ground-annual or anything at all, maintained (1) that a ground-annual may quite well be constituted a real burden on land without any personal obligation; and that, disregarding the first deed altogether, the second deed did by its own effect create a valid real burden, by way of ground-annual or perpetual rentcharge, in their favour; and alternatively (2) that, although the first deed was inept as a contract between Mr Simpson and the pursuers, yet, by the second deed, Mr Simpson did, by plain implication, adopt and re-enact the personal obligation ineptly undertaken by the first deed, to the effect of binding himself and his heirs for payment of the ground-annual to the pursuers, and did further dispone to them, in security of the obligation, the lands which, on the assumption that the first deed was ineffectual, belonged absolutely to himself. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor gives effect only to the second of the pursuers' alternative contentions. I think they would be entitled to succeed upon either of them.

A ground-annual is a right of very ancient origin. It appears to have been resorted to only where subfeu rights were not available, either because the lands were held on burgage tenure, or because the titles expressly prohibited subinfeudation. But "ground-annual" is not a vox signata; I think it simply means a perpetual rentcharge secured in some effectual fashion as a real burden on land. That the second deed was designed to transfer, not to create, the charge is clear; but none the less, I think (differing in this from the Lord Ordinary) that it is by its own terms sufficient to create such a charge. It is not doubtful that charges for money, either for principal sums or by way of annuity, may be secured upon land without any personal obligation at all. Bonds of annuity under the Aberdeen Act afford a familiar example of this; and indeed, as regards ground-annuals themselves, the practice of introducing a personal obligation and disposition in security is, I apprehend, of comparatively recent origin—(see, e.g., Bell's Conveyancing (3rd ed.) pp. 1156-7). If, then, an owner of land shall, by deed and for a price, sell and dispone to another a ground-annual of a definite sum per annum, to be uplifted and taken from the land at specified terms in each year in all time coming, I think that such a deed would constitute a valid real burden for the said amount. The present case is not precisely that which I have figured; because the second deed does throughout refer to the ground-annual as to be uplifted and taken "in virtue of" and "as specified in" the former (admittedly inept) deed. But I do not think the mere fact of such reference,—manifestly introduced because the parties thought they were transferring a right already created,—is sufficient to render void and ineffectual the second deed, the terms of which are otherwise quite sufficient to constitute, as well as to transfer, the charge. The question is not what was intended to be effected by the deed, but what was legally effected by it. The Lord Chancellor (Chelmsford) in Monypenny v. Monypenny[1] said:

[1] 3 De G. & J. 572, at p. 589.

"It is undoubted law that a deed that is intended and made to one purpose may enure to another, for if it will not take effect that way it is intended, it may take effect another way"; and there are numerous decisions, Scots and English, to that effect. I should be prepared, therefore, to hold that the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of the alternative branch of the first conclusion of their summons.

But I think that the second conclusion, introduced by amendment as alternative to the whole of the first conclusion, is also well founded. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to it, and I agree with him. Mr Simpson professed, by the second deed, to assign to the pursuers for value certain obligations undertaken by himself to himself. One who professes to assign a debt to another for value is held to warrant debitum subesse; and the cedent is thus himself personally liable to the assignee for the amount of the debt, even if in fact there was no debt due to the cedent. That seems to be the case here. I think that, upon a fair reading of the second deed, Mr Simpson did by it render himself and his heirs debtors to the pursuers in the personal obligation contained in the so-called contract, which he purported to assign; and that, in a question with himself, the pursuers were entitled to hold him and his heirs to performance of that obligation. I consider further that the second deed amounts to an adoption and homologation by Mr Simpson of the personal obligation contained in the first deed; and he disponed not only this obligation but also the lands in real security thereof. It seems to me, therefore, that the lands are validly charged with the real burden of this annual payment to the pursuers, although they have passed into the hands of the defenders as singular successors.

For these reasons, I am for adhering to the interlocutor reclaimed against. The pursuers' counsel were careful to explain that they were content with that interlocutor, and did not reclaim against it; though they argued that, if the Court were not prepared to sustain the Lord Ordinary's basis of judgment, they were entitled in that event, as I think they would be, to decree in terms of the alternative branch of the first conclusion of their summons.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

MENZIES & THOMSON, W.S.—MACKENZIE & FORTUNE, S.S.C.—JAMES P. NIVEN, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 22.
Dec. 12, 1913.

ALFRED DONALD MACKINTOSH AND OTHERS (The Countess-Dowager of Seafield's Trustees), Appellants.—Murray, K.C.—D. P. Fleming. JOHN M'CURRACH, Respondent.—W. Mitchell.

Seafield's Trustees v. M'Currach.

Lease—Small holdings—"Lotted" lands—Statutory small tenants—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49).

Held that the provisions of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, applied to "lotted lands," not equipped with buildings, which had been voluntarily laid out by the proprietor of an estate for occupation as agricultural subjects by householders in an adjoining village, and that a yearly tenant of three of these lots was a statutory small tenant within the meaning of the Act.

1ST DIVISION. Land Court.

ON 30th January 1913 John M'Currach, tenant of lots Nos. 21, 22, and 39 of the lotted lands of Fordyce, of which the trustees of the late Countess-Dowager of Seafield were the proprietors, lodged an application with the Land Court for an order determining whether he was a "landholder" or a "statutory small tenant" under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act with regard to these lots, and for an order fixing a fair rent for them.

The Land Court having pronounced an order finding that the applicant was a statutory small tenant, the proprietors asked for and obtained a special case for the opinion of the First Division of the Court of Session.

The case set forth, inter alia;—

"2. The respondent's application was duly served on the appellants, who lodged answers. Answer 1 stated: 'The respondents admit that the applicant is a tenant of certain portions of lotted land situated in the parish of Fordyce belonging to them as trustees of the late Countess-Dowager of Seafield. The extent of the applicant's holding is 11 acres 21 poles, and the annual rent now payable is £23, 12s., a reduction of £2 having been given to the applicant at Martinmas 1905.' The answers contained no plea that the subjects occupied by the applicant were not a holding within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, but at the hearing at Elgin on 4th March 1913 the appellants objected that the lands in question did not fall under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, in respect that the said lands were 'lotted lands.'

"3. The respondent became yearly tenant at Martinmas 1894, of part of lot 21 and of lot 22 of the lotted lands of Fordyce, which were let to him at the former rent of £11, 18s. At Martinmas 1896 he became yearly tenant of the other part of the said lot No. 21 at the former rent of £6, 12s., which brought his gross rent to £18, 10s. As from Martinmas 1905 the above rent of £18, 10s. was reduced to £16; and at that same term, on the Reverend John Charles M'Gregor relinquishing his tenancy of lot No. 39, the respondent applied for and became yearly tenant of that lot at the former rent of £7, 12s., which, added to the said rent of £16, made up the present annual rent of £23, 12s. for a total area of 11 acres 21 poles or thereby. Since Martinmas 1905 the respondent has possessed and cultivated the said 11 acres and 21 poles as one agricultural subject, as tenant from year to year, on the six-shift rotation. His ordinary stock has consisted of two cows, one horse, and also two calves during part of the year.

"4. The lotted lands, of which the said 11 acres 21 poles in question form part, are lands which have been laid out by the appellants' predecessors over seventy years ago for occupation as agricultural subjects by householders in Fordyce. The holders of these lands have usually had their houses, with offices, &c., in Fordyce. These houses are usually held by them under feu-charters or long leases. Some of the lots are held by persons who occupy houses in the village as ordinary tenants from feuars or lessees under long tacks. All the lotted lands are held by the tenants thereof under leases of one year or upwards, which are distinct from and have no relation with the leases or titles of their houses and offices in Fordyce. All of them, including the respondent, reside within two miles of their respective holdings. About seventy years ago, the lotted lands extended to 190 acres; the present extent is 150 acres. These 40 acres have been added to adjoining farms. The original lots have been divided or combined from time to time. Considerable expenditure was made on these lands by the appellants' predecessors, chiefly in connection with drainage, between 1861 and 1912.

"5. On 13th May 1913 the appellants received intimation that the following final order had been pronounced in the application by the Land Court:—Edinburgh, 8th May 1913.—'The Land Court having resumed consideration of this application, repel the objection taken for the respondents, that the Act of 1911 does not apply to the applicant's holding; find that the applicant is a statutory small tenant in and of the holding described in the application, and that no reasonable ground of objection to the applicant as tenant has been established; therefore find that he is entitled, in virtue of the 32nd section of the Act of 1911, to a renewal of his tenancy, and to have an equitable rent fixed; and having considered all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, fix and determine the period of renewal at seven years, and the equitable annual rent payable by the applicant at £16, 10s. sterling, each to run from the term of Whitsunday 1912. . . ."*

---

* "NOTE.—The applicant's holding is made up of lots of land let to him at different dates from 1894 to 1905. He entered on the tenancy of lot 22 and part of lot 21 at Martinmas 1894, the rent being £11, 18s., and of another part of lot 21 at Martinmas 1896, the rent being £6, 12s., and of lot 39 at Martinmas 1905, the rent being £7, 12s. In each case the tenancy was from year to year, and the first rent became payable at the Martinmas succeeding the term of entry. Since 1905 he has possessed and worked these originally separate lots as one holding at the total rent of £23, 12s., payable at Martinmas of each year for the crop of that year. There are no buildings on the holding. The applicant has resided and resides in the village of Fordyce, within two miles of the holding. His dwelling-house and offices are held on a separate title, and are not included in the holding, as specified in the application.

"There is no dispute that he is a tenant from year to year of these subjects in respect of which he claims. This prima facie satisfies the requirements of the Act of 1911. It is clear that he is not a landholder, as his predecessors in the different lots were not members of his family, and though he aided the creation of some permanent improvements on the land since his entry, this aid is comparatively small. It is equally clear that he is a statutory small tenant in and of this holding, unless the respondents' special plea is sustained. That special plea is that this holding consists of 'lotted lands,' and that 'lotted lands' are, or ought by construction to be, excluded from the operation of the Small Landholders Acts.

"'Lotted lands' mean simply lands which are laid out or lotted by an

Dec. 12, 1913.

Seafield's Trustees v. M'Currach.

At advising on 12th December 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The applicant in this case is a tenant of lotted lands in the immediate vicinity of the village of Fordyce, and the question we have to consider is whether or no he is a statutory tenant within the meaning of the Scottish Small Landholders Act.

Now I venture to ask why not, and all Mr Murray's ingenuity, although it is great, and his research through the clauses of this Act, which was most industrious, failed to give a satisfactory answer to that question. I am of opinion, therefore, that the final order pronounced by the Land Court is correct, and for the grounds of my opinion I refer to the very full and clear note, which the Land Court have appended to their final order and to which I have nothing to add.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I think it is unfortunate that this Act should interfere with the well-intentioned efforts of land owners, made long ago and at great expense, to supply lotted lands to the inhabitants of villages, but I can find nothing in the statute which warrants the particular pieces of land in question being withdrawn from its application. It is worthy of notice as a comment upon the anticipations of those who passed the Act that apparently these lotted lands have not continued to be appreciated, as lotted lands, by the people of this village, for two things have happened; in the first place, a considerable portion of the original lotted lands have had to be resumed and handed over to the tenant of an adjoining farm; and, in the second place, this particular tenant has, in 1894, 1896, and 1905, gradually amassed into his own hands three holdings or rather four, because one of them was at the time divided, and now cultivates them, not for the greater comfort of himself and his family as an adjunct to his ordinary occupation, but as his regular business. This looks as if there was no demand for allotments properly so-called in this village, or else as if having ceased to be regarded as ordinary allotments this particular tenant has secured these lots by outbidding his neighbours, affording therefore the best criterion of their market value.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. I had difficulty in following the argument presented for the appellants—certainly not because of any want of clearness of statement on the part of Mr Murray. I understood him to admit that the Commissioners' statement in their note is correct, viz.:—"It is beyond doubt that these Fordyce 'lotted lands' do not come within any of the express exclusions in section 26 of the Act of villagers were equally beneficial, and could be more readily worked by co-operation. Accordingly, for residence on the holding, the Act of 1911 substituted residence 'within two miles of' the holding as one of the conditions required to bring a holding within the Act.

---

"The applicant's rent-account shows arrears to the extent of two years' rent, amounting to £47, 4s. as at Martinmas 1912, including rent for crop 1912. He was under the impression that he was only one year's rent in arrear. This was due to his having, for some years, been allowed to pay his rent within the year after it had become due. The applicant promised, and is apparently able, to pay all his arrears, and the objection to renewal on the ground of his existing arrears was not pressed."

1911. Any 'small holding' under the Small Holdings Act, 1892, or any allotment under the Allotments (Scotland) Act, 1892, or the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, is no doubt excluded by subsection 3 (e) of that section. This subsection refers only to holdings and allotments formed on land which a public authority has acquired either by agreement or compulsorily, and subject to special regulations with regard to the tenure, rights, and obligations of the holders under the statutes expressly cited in the subsection. The formation or preservation of small holdings by public authority was regulated or extended in England by a series of statutes from 1601 to 1908, in Scotland much later—by the Crofters Acts, the Acts above cited, and the Act of 1911." Accordingly he addressed himself to what seemed to me the hopeless task of saying that by implication they were excluded by reason of the operation of certain subsections of section 26. It is impossible to come to that conclusion.

Dec. 12, 1913.
Seafield's Trustees v. M'Currach.
Lord Mackenzie.

LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative.

MACKENZIE, INNES, & LOGAN, W.S.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—Agents.

No. 23.

JOHN CHARLES STEWART AND OTHERS (Francis Pott Stewart's Trustees), First Parties.—D. P. Fleming.
JAMES TODD STEWART AND OTHERS (Trustees of John and Robert Stewart), Second and Third Parties.—Blackburn, K.C.—Maconochie.
ROBERT STEWART AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Murray, K.C.—Maclaren.
JOHN CHARLES STEWART AND ANOTHER, Fifth Parties.—Moncrieff, K.C.—R. C. Henderson.
MRS LOUISA GERTRUDE STEWART OR SWINBURNE AND OTHERS, Sixth Parties.—Fleming, K.C.—J. A. Inglis.
MRS AGNES CRAIG MOORE OR STEWART OR BATTCOCK AND ANOTHER, Seventh Parties.—Constable, K.C.—Kemp.

Dec. 12, 1913.
Stewart's Trustees v. Battcock.

Succession—Heritable and moveable—Jus relictæ—Debenture stock—Provision in deed creating stock that the stock should be personal estate.

Held that a provision in a trust-deed, under which the debenture stock of a company was issued, that the stock "shall be, and shall have the incidents of, personal estate," did not have the effect of making the stock moveable in a question as to jus relictæ.

2D DIVISION.

ON 18th December 1912 a special case was presented to the Second Division of the Court of Session for the determination of certain questions which had arisen under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Francis Pott Stewart, Craigweil, Ayr, who died on 26th November 1890. The trustees acting under this trust-disposition and settlement were the first parties to the case; the testamentary trustees and children of the testator's brothers, John and Robert Stewart, were the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth parties; and Mrs Agnes Craig Moore or Stewart or Battcock, the testator's widow, and her second husband, William F. Battcock, to whom she was married on 22nd June 1895, were the seventh parties.

Dec. 12, 1913.

Stewart's Trustees v. Battcock.

By his trust-disposition and settlement the testator directed his trustees to pay to his widow an alimentary annuity of £1000, which was to be reduced to £500 in the event of her entering into a second marriage, and further directed them on her death to divide and pay the residue of his estate in terms which, as the Court held in this case, suspended vesting until that event. The income of the estate was more than sufficient to pay the widow's annuity, and the trustees accumulated the surplus till 26th November 1911 when the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death, after which accumulation was forbidden by the Thellusson Act, expired. It was decided in the case that the surplus income accruing after that date during the widow's lifetime fell into intestacy.

The seventh question was—"In the event of" it being decided that the surplus income fell into intestacy "is the widow entitled to jus relictæ (a) out of the income so falling into intestacy and in particular, (b) out of the income of" certain investments "mentioned in statement 12 or any of them?"

This report deals only with the widow's claim to jus relictæ out of one of these investments, an investment of £6000; and the statement in article 12 of the case as to this investment was as follows:—"The estate of the testator at the time of his death, consisted, inter alia, of £6000 4¼ per cent Mortgage Debenture Stock of the Distillers Company, Limited. This stock is secured over certain heritable and leasehold property of the company in terms of or in manner set forth in the deed of agreement, dated 13th, 14th, and 15th days of April 1887, executed by and between the said company of the one part and certain trustees for the holders of the said stock of the other part, and was redeemable in the company's option after 1st January 1907, on six months' notice, at £110 per cent. A copy of this agreement is printed in the appendix, and held to form part of this case." In the deed of agreement referred to it was declared that "the said stock shall be, and shall have the incidents of, personal estate."

The case was heard on 4th and 5th December 1913, before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) when counsel for the seventh parties maintained that by reason of this declaration the stock must be treated as moveable in all respects, and that the widow's right of jus relictæ attached to it.* Counsel for the other parties (except the first parties) contended that under the Act 1661, cap. 32, the stock was heritable quoad jus relictæ, and that the declaration in the deed of agreement did not have the effect of making it moveable in a question with the widow.[1]

At advising on 12th December 1913,—

LORD DUNDAS.—[In dealing with the widow's claim for jus relictæ said]—

* Sec. 23 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 118), was not referred to at the hearing. That section enacts:—"Debenture stock, with the interest thereon, shall be a charge upon the undertaking of the company, prior to all shares or stock of the company, and shall be transmissible and transferable in the same manner, and according to the same regulations and provisions, as other stock of the company, and shall in all other respects have the incidents of personal estate."

[1] Downie v. Downie's Trustees, (1866) 4 Macph. 1067; Dawson's Trustees v. Dawson, (1896) 23 R. 1006; Bennett's Executrix v. Bennett's Executors, 1907 S. C. 598: Stark v. Stark, 1910 S. C. 397; Heath v. Grant's Trustees, 1913 S. C. 78, were referred to.

The trust-estate, at the testator's death, consisted, inter alia, of (a) £6000 4½ per cent Mortgage Debenture Stock of the Distillers Company, Limited; (b) Debenture bonds, bearing interest at various rates payable half-yearly by the New Zealand and Australian Land Company, Limited; and (c) a sum of £10,000, being balance due to the testator of a loan by him to his brother Robert at interest for ten years from 1888, under an agreement, which is printed in the appendix. All these items bore interest for a tract of time current at the testator's death. They are, therefore, prima facie, moveable quoad his succession, but heritable in a question of his widow's rights. But a special argument was presented for the widow in regard to the mortgage debenture stock of the Distillers Company. The agreement between that company and trustees for the stockholders is printed ad longum in the appendix. The holders are given preferable security over the company's heritable property. The terms of the conditions of issue of the stock are set forth in Schedule A annexed to the agreement. Clause 2 of the agreement, after providing that the stockholders shall have and be subject to the whole rights, privileges, obligations, and others specified in the conditions of issue in Schedule A, ends with the words,—"The said stock shall be, and shall have the incidents of, personal estate." Counsel for the widow founded upon these words as importing that this stock is declared to be, for all purposes, personal estate; and argued that it must, therefore, be subject to jus relictæ in a question with the widow of a deceased stockholder. It seems to me improbable that the framers of this agreement had any such case in mind, or had any intention to effect a variation on the application of the general law of the land. I think it is more reasonable to suppose that the words quoted—though redundant, perhaps, and unnecessary—were introduced in order to make as clear as possible what is expressly stated in article 10 of Schedule A, viz., that executors of a deceased stockholder were alone to be recognised by the company as having any title to the share registered in his name. But, however this may be, the words appear to me to be, in any view, too wide and vague to achieve the purpose for which they are founded on by counsel for the widow. "Personal estate" or its "incidents" might refer equally well to estate personal at common law, or to estate made personal by the statute 1661, cap. 32. But the latter view would not suit the widow's contention at all; it would exclude her claim. I think, though the point is novel, and a little puzzling, that her argument must fail. I am therefore for answering branch (b) of the seventh question in the negative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE concurred.

THE COURT answered head (b) of question 7 in the negative.

WEBSTER, WILL, & Co., W.S.—FRASER, STODART, & BALLINGALL, W.S.—CUMMING & DUFF, S.S.C.—WISHART & SANDERSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 24.

Dec. 12, 1913.

Veitch's Trustees v. Rutherford.

WILLIAM GEORGE TURNBULL AND OTHERS (William Veitch's Trustees), First Parties.—Hamilton.
MRS AGNES RIDDELL TURNBULL OR RUTHERFORD AND ANOTHER, Second Parties.—Moncrieff, K.C.—J. H. Henderson.
MRS JANE ELLIOT TURNBULL OR BROWN AND ANOTHER, Third Parties.—Shiell.
WILLIAM GEORGE TURNBULL AND OTHERS, Fourth Parties.—Macquisten.

Succession—Vesting—Fee or liferent—Gift of fee followed by limiting provision—Repugnancy.

A testator by his will appointed an executor, and disposed of the residue of his estate by leaving it to two persons "for behoof of" Mrs R. and Mrs B., and enjoined on these two persons "not to put a shilling at risk during the life of the two ladies." There was no further disposal of the residue.

Held that the residue was vested in fee in the two ladies equally, and that they were entitled to immediate payment thereof.

1ST DIVISION. ON 26th September 1912 a special case was presented for the determination of the effect of a provision in the will of the late Reverend William Veitch, LL.D.

The testator died on 8th July 1885 leaving a holograph will dated 4th July 1878, and other subsidiary testamentary writings. By this will and other writings he disposed of a certain heritable property, and bequeathed pecuniary legacies to certain individuals and institutions. The will concluded with this provision:—"The residue I leave to my relation and friend Prof. Wm. Rutherford and Mr Wm. Turnbull, Spittal, for behoof of Mrs John Rutherford, Thickside, and Mrs Bywater (Annie Rutherford), and enjoin on them to put not a shilling at risk during the life of the two ladies. I appoint Mr Dalziel Pearson, W.S., 128 Geo. Street, Edinburgh, to administer this my Will." Neither the will nor the other writings contained any further directions with regard to the residue.

After the testator's death in 1885 the executor appointed by the will paid over the residue of the trust-estate to Professor Rutherford and Mr Turnbull, as trustees under the residuary clause. Professor Rutherford died, and another trustee was assumed, in 1899, to act along with Mr Turnbull on this trust.

The parties to the case were the trustees, original and assumed, acting under the trust created by the residuary clause, first parties; the beneficiaries under that clause, viz., Mrs John Rutherford and Mrs Bywater, second parties; the representatives of the next of kin and heirs in mobilibus of the testator at the date of his death, third parties; and the surviving original trustee under the residuary clause, Mr Turnbull, and the representatives of Professor Rutherford, the deceased trustee thereunder, fourth parties.

The case stated:—"III. . . . The trustees since the said residue was paid over to them in 1885 have held and invested the capital thereof which, at the present value of the investments, amounts to about £6400, and have paid the annual income to the said Mrs Rutherford and Mrs Bywater equally. Questions have now arisen as to the extent of the rights competent to the said Mrs Rutherford and Mrs Bywater, and as to the disposal of the capital.

"IV. The second parties hereto . . . maintain that under the said will the residue of the testator's estate has vested in them in fee, and that they are now entitled to have the same paid to them equally. Alternatively they maintain that the said residue has vested in them in fee, subject only to the limitation that during their lifetime it falls to be administered by the first parties for their respective use and behoof. . . .

"VII. The first, third, and fourth parties maintain that under the said will the second parties are not now entitled to have the said residue paid to them, but are entitled only to the liferent of said residue. . . ."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were, inter alia:—"(1) Is the residue vested in fee in the second parties equally? (2) If the first question be answered in the affirmative, (a) are the second parties now entitled to payment of the said residue equally between them, or (b) does it fall to be administered by the first parties during their lifetime for their respective use and behoof?"

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Skerrington) on 31st October 1913.

Argued for the second parties;—The gift of the residue to the trustees "for behoof of" these parties was equivalent to a direct gift of fee to them, as there was no disposal of the fee in any other way or to any other persons. The direction with regard to not risking a shilling during their lives was not effectual to restrict the interest already given to one of liferent.[1] It could only have effect as an instruction to the trustees with regard to the investment of the funds so long as they held them. The second parties were further entitled, if they so desired, to immediate payment of the fund equally between them.[2] This was not a case of a "protected" fee or of a fee limited by the imposition of a trust to secure further purposes.[3] It fell within the rule of Miller's Trustees,[4] and not within that applied in the cases of Chambers' Trustees v. Smiths[5] and Christie's Trustees v. Murray's Trustees.[6]

Argued for the first parties;—It was the duty of these parties to hold the residue and to pay only the income thereof to the second parties. The first parties were not the testator's general testamentary trustees, but were specially appointed to administer the residue. The words "for behoof of" were vague, and did not necessarily imply a gift of fee to the two ladies. The plain meaning of the whole residue clause was that the second parties were to have a liferent only. The first parties were to invest the residue in a particular way "for behoof" of the beneficiaries. The demand for immediate payment was clearly inconsistent with this direction.

---

[1] Miller's Trustees v. Miller, (1890) 18 R. 301; Greenlees' Trustees v. Greenlees, (1894) 22 R. 136 (as contrasted with Forrest's Trustees v. Reid, (1904) 7 F. 142, per Lord Adam, at p. 145); Ballantyne's Trustees v. Kidd, (1898) 25 R. 261; Gillies' Trustees v. Hodge, (1900) 3 F. 238; Yuill's Trustees v. Thomson, (1902) 4 F. 815.

[2] Miller's Trustees v. Miller, 18 R. 301; Greenlees' Trustees v. Greenlees, 22 R. 136; Ballantyne's Trustees v. Kidd, 25 R. 261; Barber v. Finlater, (1835) 13 S. 422.

[3] Tweeddale's Trustees v. Tweeddale, (1905) 8 F. 264; Gibson's Trustees v. Ross, (1877) 4 R. 1038; Massy v. Scott's Trustees, (1872) 11 Macph. 173.

[4] 18 R. 301.

[5] (1878) 5 R. (H. L.) 151.

[6] (1889) 16 R. 913.

Dec. 12, 1913.

Veitch's Trustees v. Rutherford.

Counsel for the third and fourth parties adopted the argument of the first parties, and for the third parties it was further argued that the fee fell to be dealt with as intestate succession of the deceased.

At advising on 12th December 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I regard the questions raised in this special case as completely covered by authority, and I should regret if any further doubt were thrown upon the principle of law laid down and applied by the judgment of the whole Court in the case of Yuill's Trustees.[1] That principle I take to be this, that "when a vested, unqualified, and indefeasible right of fee is given to a beneficiary of full age, he is entitled to payment of the provision notwithstanding any direction to the trustees to retain the capital of the provision, and to pay over the income periodically, or to apply the capital or income in some way for his benefit."[2] And I think that in that case Lord Moncreiff was quite right when he said that the sentence I have quoted was "simply a short statement of the grounds of judgment of Lord Rutherfurd Clark and Lord M'Laren in the case of Miller's Trustees,"[3] for when I turn to Miller's Trustees,[3] I find that Lord Rutherfurd Clark thus laid down the principle, "I do not think that the law allows of any restriction on the owner of an absolute fee, and in my opinion the direction that the trustees shall manage the estate till Mr Miller reaches twenty-five is just as repugnant to the right of fee which is vested in him as a direction to manage the estate till he reaches any other age, or it might be till his death." And Lord M'Laren, in the same case, says: "It seems to me that a beneficiary who has an estate in fee has by the very terms of the gift the same right of divesting the trustees, and so putting an end to the trust, which the truster himself possessed."

Now we have here before us, as I think, a clear case for the application of the principle so laid down, for the residue clause of Dr Veitch's holograph settlement runs thus: "The residue I leave to my relation and friend Prof. William Rutherford and Mr William Turnbull, Spittal, for behoof of Mrs John Rutherford, Thickside, and Mrs Bywater (Annie Rutherford), and enjoin them to put not a shilling at risk during the life of the two ladies." I cannot construe these words otherwise than as conferring a clear, unqualified, and indefeasible right of fee on these two ladies. And it is nothing to the purpose to say that these words are followed by an injunction to the trustees to put not a shilling at risk during the life of the two ladies, because that is no more than a direction to place the money in a safe investment where no loss can take place. It is, I think, impossible to maintain that the import of these words is to reduce the right of fee to a right of mere liferent, and, if they have not that effect, then it was not maintained to us that they had any other effect. The first and third parties to this case were, I think, well advised in not maintaining, in face of the judgment in Yuill's Trustees[1] and Miller's Trustees,[3] that the effect of these words was to enable the trustees to retain and to manage this vested provision.

---

[1] Yuill's Trustees v. Thomson, 4 F. 815.

[2] Ibid, at p. 819.

[3] 18 R. 301.

It appears to me, as the result of the authorities to which I have referred and as the result of the principle which I take to be firmly imbedded in our law, that a beneficiary cannot be denied an immediate payment of his provision unless there are trust purposes in the settlement to secure which it is essential that the trustees retain in their own hands the right which is vested in the beneficiary. Now, in the case before us there are no such trust purposes, and therefore I think that these ladies are entitled to the immediate payment of the provision made for them in the residue clause of this will.

I propose to your Lordships, therefore, turning to the questions, that we should answer the first question in the affirmative, the first part of the second question in the affirmative, and the second part of the second question in the negative. The third question is superseded and the fourth question is abandoned.

Lord Johnston.—The testator left the residue of his estate to two trustees for behoof of two ladies, Mrs John Rutherford and Mrs Bywater, and enjoined them, the trustees, "to put not a shilling at risk during the life of the two ladies." The testator's will was holograph, and evidently prepared by himself. I cannot have any doubt that the testator intended a joint fee vesting a morte, and not a liferent, and that he desired merely that the trustees should keep the money safely invested for the ladies during their lives. Such a trust superimposed on a fee is repugnant, and can receive no effect, however valuable the constitution of such a trust might be to many a fiar.

As the two ladies both survived the testator, though the bequest was joint, they each took a vested interest in one-half, and no question of accretion arose—[His Lordship then pointed out that, in the circumstances of the case, the bequest did not fall under the jus mariti of the ladies' husbands].

The first question and the first branch of the second question therefore fall to be answered in the affirmative. The other questions do not require answer.

Lord Mackenzie.—I think it follows from the authorities which were cited that the questions in this case should be answered in the way your Lordship proposes.

The Court answered the first question in the affirmative, the first branch of the second question in the affirmative, and the second branch of the second question in the negative.

Mackenzie & Wyllie, W.S.—Bell, Bannerman, & Finlay, W.S.—Sharpe & Young, W.S.—J. D. Rutherford, W.S.—Agents.

No. 25.

Dec. 13, 1913.

MacDougall's Trustee v. Ironside.

WILLIAM B. GALBRAITH (MacDougall's Trustee), Pursuer (Respondent).—Anderson, K.C.—Marshall.
WILLIAM IRONSIDE AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Macmillan, K.C.—Maitland.

Bankruptcy—Effect—Illegal preference at common law—Voluntary assignation in security granted by insolvent—Reduction—Necessity of averring granter's knowledge of his insolvency.

The trustee in a sequestration brought an action of reduction, on the ground of fraud at common law, of an assignation in security voluntarily granted by the bankrupt in favour of two persons who were joint agents for a bank to which he was indebted, and one of whom was also his law-agent. The pursuer averred that at the date of the assignation the bankrupt was insolvent; that the defenders, the two assignees, were aware of this, but concealed the fact from him; that the assignation was obtained by the defenders in order to secure the debt to the bank; and that its effect was, with another contemporaneous assignation to the bank, to strip the bankrupt of his whole assets.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington) that, as it was not averred that the bankrupt was at the date of the assignation aware of his insolvency, the pursuer's averments were irrelevant; and action dismissed.

2D DIVISION. Lord Skerrington.

ON 6th May 1913 W. B. Galbraith, trustee on the sequestrated estates of Hugh MacDougall, builder, Oban, brought an action against William Ironside and Peter Moir, Oban, concluding for reduction of an assignation by MacDougall in their favour of a bond and disposition for £2000 held by him.

The pursuer averred that MacDougall's estate was sequestrated on 12th February 1913. His further averments (as amended) were as follows:—(Cond. 2) "Prior to the sequestration of his estates the said Hugh MacDougall carried on business in Oban for a period of twelve years or thereby. During that time his law-agents were Messrs Hosack & Sutherland, solicitors in Oban, of which firm Mr John D. Sutherland and the defender William Ironside until the end of March 1912, and thereafter the said William Ironside, were the sole partners. Mr Sutherland was also the agent of the Royal Bank of Scotland's Branch in Oban, at which bank the said Hugh MacDougall kept his bank account. The said firm of Hosack & Sutherland were thus intimately acquainted with MacDougall's entire business affairs and with his financial position from the time he commenced business onwards." (Cond. 3) "About the month of October 1910, the said John D. Sutherland recommended the said Hugh MacDougall to erect a building of shops and dwelling-houses at Kinlochleven. At that time MacDougall's entire capital amounted only to £600 but, on the representation of Mr Sutherland that he would procure a loan for him, MacDougall proceeded with the erection of the tenement. Mr Sutherland failed to procure a loan, but MacDougall succeeded in finishing the property with the assistance of an overdraft from his bankers. On its completion the property was sold for £3000, of which £1000 was paid in cash and the bond and disposition in security described in the conclusions of the summons was taken in payment of the balance. The £1000 received in cash was paid to the said John D. Sutherland, and to the extent of £100 it was applied in paying his firm's business accounts and the balance of £900 was placed to the credit of MacDougall's bank account.

After placing this amount to the credit of the account it still stood at debit to the amount of £885, 3s. 5d. This was on 11th November 1911." (Cond. 4) "In the month of February 1911, Messrs Hosack & Sutherland asked the said Hugh MacDougall to manage the Ardshiel Granite Quarries which had formerly been worked by the Quarrier Company, Limited, of which company Messrs Hosack & Sutherland were the law-agents. Having implicit confidence in and relying, as they well knew, on the advice of his law-agents, and believing the arrangement which they had proposed to him was for his benefit, the said Hugh MacDougall entered into a contract of copartnery with the said Quarrier Company, under which he was to manage the quarries, receiving an annual salary and a certain share of profits. He was also at this time induced by the said Messrs Hosack & Sutherland to contribute £250 to the capital of the Quarrier Company, but no information whatever was furnished to him by the said Hosack & Sutherland as to the financial position of that company although they were fully conversant therewith. MacDougall was promised by them balance-sheets relating to the quarries, but they were never furnished, and he was thus kept entirely in ignorance regarding the financial workings of the concern. He, however, trusted to his law-agents, one of whom was also his banker. The said partnership agreement was invalid and void and null in respect that the Quarrier Company had no power under its memorandum and articles to enter into any such partnership, but Messrs Hosack & Sutherland, in breach of their duty to MacDougall as his agents, failed to inform him of this." (Cond. 5) "Towards the end of March 1912, Mr Sutherland retired from the said firm of Messrs Hosack & Sutherland, and also from the agency of the said bank. Mr Ironside was thus left sole partner of the said firm of Messrs Hosack & Sutherland, and he, along with the other defender Peter Moir, was then appointed joint agent at Oban of the said Royal Bank of Scotland in succession to Mr Sutherland." (Cond. 6) "A few days before Mr Sutherland's retiral from business the said Hugh MacDougall called for him to discuss his private affairs, when he was assured by Mr Sutherland that these would be put all right before he retired from the business. At this time the said Hugh MacDougall's account with the Royal Bank was overdrawn, but he had no information at the time as to the state of the Quarrier Company's account, nor did he consider that he had any responsibility therefor. About the beginning of April he had some communications from the defender William Ironside as to his personal overdraft, and Mr Ironside suggested an assignment to the bank of certain policies of insurance amounting to £400 on MacDougall's life. Later, Mr Ironside suggested that MacDougall should assign to himself and the other defender the £2000 bond which MacDougall held over the property at Kinlochleven. Having implicit confidence in his law-agents and bankers, MacDougall agreed to do so, and on 16th April 1912 called at the defenders' office and signed an assignation of the bond. Prior thereto, he had received a letter from Mr Ironside dated 12th April, marked 'private,' in which it was stated:—'You of course will get a back-letter from Mr Moir and myself stating the purpose for which the assignation is granted. The acceptance of this assignation must not prejudice the position taken up by the bank that your overdraft must be considerably reduced.' MacDougall understood, and was led by the defenders to understand, that the assignation referred to his individual overdraft, and that he would receive a back-letter from the defenders setting forth the purpose for which the deed had been granted. No such letter was, however, granted. At the same time the life policies before referred to were assigned to the Royal Bank, and thereupon MacDougall was stripped of his whole available assets. The amount of his overdraft at the bank on 12th April was £1131, 12s. 6d. Throughout these transactions Mr Ironside was agent for MacDougall, the Quarrier Company, and for the bank. The said Hugh MacDougall was insolvent at the date of granting the said assignation, and he remained in a state of insolvency down to the date of his bankruptcy. The object in obtaining the assignation of the said bond was to enable the defenders to obtain security for the said Hugh MacDougall's overdrafts, and thus to protect the said bank and obviate any question as between the bank and themselves. It is believed and averred that the defenders had received instructions from the head office of the bank that the overdrafts must be paid off or secured, and they acted in concert in obtaining the security above mentioned. They were both aware that the said Hugh MacDougall was liable for the overdraft on the Quarrier Company's account, as in fact he was in a question with the bank, and that he was then hopelessly insolvent. But the defender Mr Ironside, who personally carried through the transaction, acting for himself and the other defender, and also as law-agent for the said Hugh MacDougall, fraudulently concealed these facts from the latter, in order to induce him to grant the said assignation which he could not honestly have done. In further pursuance of their scheme the defenders represented to the said Hugh MacDougall that the assignation referred only to his individual overdraft, and in order to prevent the true state of the facts becoming known to him, they failed to execute and deliver to him the back-letter which had been promised in the letter above quoted, stating the purposes for which the assignation was granted. As his law-agent, the defender Mr Ironside had a duty to the said Hugh MacDougall to make a full disclosure to him of the whole facts which were necessary to enable him to decide whether he was warranted in granting the said assignation. This the said defender failed to do, but in breach of his duty took from him an assignation which he had no right to grant. The transaction was an attempt on the part of the defenders to secure the said bank from loss by getting from the said Hugh M'Dougall a conveyance of his whole estate, and thus obtaining an illegal preference to the detriment of MacDougall's other creditors." (Cond. 7) "After this MacDougall went to Copinsay where he was erecting a lighthouse, and did not return to Oban till the end of September or beginning of October 1912. He had then a meeting with the defender Moir, who informed him that it was the purpose of the bank to hold him liable for the whole of the Quarrier Company's overdraft. This overdraft amounted to £1412, 11s. 4d. or thereby, while MacDougall's own overdraft only amounted to £401, 11s. 9d. MacDougall at once protested against the attempt which was being made to make an improper use of the assignments which he had made, but the defender Ironside persisted in the position which he had taken up. Liability for the overdraft of the Quarrier Company at both dates rendered his estates hopelessly insolvent. This was well known to the defenders, who were fully acquainted with MacDougall's entire position." (Cond. 8) "Thereafter MacDougall's creditors began to press him, and, on the recommendation of the defender Ironside, he, on 23rd November 1912, signed a trust-deed in favour of the pursuer. This deed was superseded by the sequestration which was awarded on 12th February following." (Cond. 9) "At the time when the said assignation was granted in favour of the defenders, the said Hugh MacDougall, having regard to his liabilities as a partner of the said Quarrier Company, was hopelessly insolvent, and this was well known to the defenders. No consideration was given for the said assignation, and the granting and procuring of the said deed was a fraudulent attempt to secure the overdrafts of MacDougall and of the said Quarrier Company to the said bank, and to the prejudice of the just rights of MacDougall's other creditors. The pursuer has called upon the defenders to reassign the said bond to him, but they refuse or delay to do so, and the present action has accordingly become necessary."

Dec. 18, 1913.

MacDougall's Trustee v. Ironside.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The assignation libelled falls to be reduced in respect—(a) that it was granted without consideration; (b) that at the date thereof the granter was insolvent; and (c) that the said deed was procured by the defenders fraudulently in the knowledge of MacDougall's insolvency, and with the intention to defeat, and to the prejudice of, the just rights of his other creditors; (d) that the said deed was procured by the defenders while acting as agents for MacDougall, and in breach of their duty towards him.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (3) The assignation sought to be reduced having been granted by MacDougall while solvent, the defenders should be assoilzied. (4) Esto that at the date of the granting of said assignation MacDougall was insolvent, said assignation having been granted by him and accepted by the defenders in the bona fide belief that he was solvent, the defenders should be assoilzied. (5) The transaction complained of being fair and reasonable in the circumstances, and having been entered into by MacDougall in the ordinary course of business for full consideration and to his benefit, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 16th July 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) allowed a proof before answer.*

---

* "OPINION.—This is an action to reduce a security voluntarily granted by an insolvent to a creditor, the ground of reduction being fraud at common law. The relevancy is objected to for the reason that the pursuer refrains from averring that the granter of the security was conscious of his insolvency. The judgment and opinions in the well-known case of M'Cowan v. Wright, (1853) 15 D. 494, show that such an averment is of the very essence of an action of reduction based upon the ground that a security was granted fraudulently and in order to disappoint the legal rights of the other creditors. In the present case the pursuer alleges that the defenders were aware of the insolvency, but a creditor cannot be guilty of collusion in a case where his debtor acted honestly in giving the security.

"For the foregoing reasons I should have dismissed the action as irrelevant but for certain specialties which make it necessary, in my opinion, to have an inquiry into the facts. The pursuer alleges that the defenders, in whose favour the security was granted, were the law-agent and the banker of the insolvent; that they knew of his insolvency, but for their own purposes industriously concealed the fact from him; and that they thus obtained from him a security which he could not honestly have granted if he had known his true position. I am not prepared to decide as an abstract proposition in law that a creditor owes no duty whatsoever to his fellow

Dec. 13, 1913.

MacDougall's Trustee v. Ironside.

The defenders having reclaimed, the case was heard before the Second Division on 15th November 1913, when counsel for the reclaimers submitted that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, as it was not averred that MacDougall, at the date of the assignation, was insolvent and was conscious of his insolvency. Counsel for the pursuer having craved leave to amend his record, the case was continued to enable him to do so; and, the averments having been amended so that they read as printed above, the case was again heard before the Second Division (without Lord Salvesen) on 13th December 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The action was irrelevant. In the case of a gratuitous alienation by an insolvent to a third party fraud was presumed,[1] but this was not so where the deed challenged was one granting security to a creditor. In the latter class of cases it was necessary to show that the deed was executed by the debtor (a) voluntarily, (b) when he was insolvent, and (c) in the knowledge of his insolvency.[2] At one time it was thought that collusion, or at least knowledge of the debtor's insolvency, on the part of the creditor must also be proved, and it was with this point that the cases cited from the Dictionary by the pursuer dealt.[3] As the law now stood, such knowledge or collusion on the part of the creditor was not required, but the other three elements of fraud must be established. In the present case the pursuer, although he had had an opportunity of doing so, did not aver that MacDougall was aware, when he granted the assignation, that he was insolvent; and the action was accordingly bad. The specialties on which the Lord Ordinary founded did not cure this defect. Esto that the defenders were aware that MacDougall was insolvent, they were not thereby debarred from dealing with him and taking an assignation[4]; and the averment that they had concealed from him that he was insolvent was irrelevant, as they were under no duty to disclose that fact to him. The further averment that the defender Ironside was MacDougall's law-agent would be material in an action by MacDougall based on some lesion that he had thereby suffered[5]; but here the only parties injured by the assignation were the other creditors, and the averment was therefore irrelevant. The argument founded on the insolvent having parted with all his estate could not help the respondent, for the assignation challenged was in no sense a disposition omnium bonorum.

Argued for the respondent;—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be sustained. It was averred that the defenders here took advantage of the information Ironside obtained as MacDougall's law-agent to deceive him and to obtain the assignation. If a creditor carried creditors in the matter of obtaining securities from an insolvent, and that accordingly it is impossible to aver or prove a case of the breach of such duty. I shall allow a proof before answer."

---

[1] Goudy on Bankruptcy, (3rd ed.) 24; Bell's Com., (7th ed.) vol. ii. 170.

[2] Goudy on Bankruptcy, 40; Bell's Com., (7th ed.) vol. ii. 226; M'Cowan v. Wright, (1853) 15 D. 494, per Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, at pp. 498, 499, and 504, Lord Cockburn, at p. 510; Thomas v. Thomson, (1866) 5 Macph. 198, per Lord Neaves, at p. 201.

[3] Kinloch v. Blair, (1678) M. 889; Cramond v. Bruce & Henry, (1737) M. 893; Marshall's Trustee v. Provan & Co., (1794) M. 1144.

[4] Price & Pierce, Limited, v. Bank of Scotland, 1910 S. C. 1095, per Lord President Dunedin, at p. 1118, Lord Kinnear, at p. 1110.

[5] Dick v. Alston, 1913 S. C. (H. L.) 57.

through a transaction to the prejudice of the other creditors in the knowledge that the other party to the transaction was insolvent, the transaction was reducible although that party was not conscious of his insolvency[1]; for the equitable distribution of an insolvent estate which the law sought to secure was equally interfered with whether the insolvent was or was not aware of his condition. In Thomas v. Thomson[2] Lord Cowan observed: "When a creditor takes securities for prior obligations with his eyes open, and knowing the state of his debtor's affairs, he does what at common law is a fraud, and to the prejudice of other creditors." The fact that the assignation in question comprised MacDougall's whole estate implied knowledge on his part that he was insolvent, besides being a circumstance in itself strongly indicative of fraud.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Lord Ordinary in this case observes that he had a difficulty in allowing a proof, and that he did so solely because he considered there were certain specialties in the case. The question we have to decide is whether there are any such specialties as will justify that decision, and I have come to be satisfied, after hearing the very able discussion we have had, that here the pursuer has not stated such a case as entitles him to a proof.

The facts are that Mr MacDougall was in difficulties, to this extent at least, that his bankers were not willing to allow him to remain in the position of having unsecured overdrafts with the bank. They intimated that to him, with the result that they obtained the assignation of a bond. Now, that was all done in the ordinary course of banking business by the joint agents of the branch bank, at which the debtor did his business; it is a transaction such as happens every day, and it generally happens because the bank is beginning to be doubtful whether their debtor is in such circumstances as make it safe for them to go on with the overdrafts without security, and when a bank considers an overdraft too large it is, of course, within its rights in insisting that it should be reduced or in demanding security. It was in such circumstances that the bond was granted. Now, to begin with, was it granted by a man in the knowledge that he was insolvent? There is no case of that kind at all. MacDougall did not believe himself to be insolvent, and, therefore, the idea of collusion between him and the two bank-agents for the purpose of defeating the interests of the other creditors is entirely out of the question. As was pointed out in the course of the debate, it cannot be said that a man is acting in collusion with another unless they both know that what is being done is illegal or fraudulent. If MacDougall did not consider himself to be insolvent he could not commit a fraud in giving security.

Therefore, upon the first blush of the case I see no ground for holding that, where it is not alleged, and cannot be alleged, that the debtor knew

[1] Bell's Com., (7th ed.) vol. ii. 226-229, especially Lord M'Laren's note (1) on p. 229; Jones's Trustee v. Jones, (1888) 15 R. 328, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff, at p. 332; M'Cowan v. Wright, 15 D. 494, per Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, at p. 499; Crawford v. Black, (1829) 8 S. 158.

[2] 5 Macph. 198, at p. 201.

[3] Kinloch v. Blair, M. 889; Cramond v. Bruce & Henry, M. 893; Marshall's Trustee v. Provan & Co., M. 1144.

Dec. 13, 1913.

MacDougall's Trustee v. Ironside.

Lord Justice-Clerk.

himself to be insolvent at the time of the transaction, that transaction can be attacked and cut down upon ordinary grounds. But the Lord Ordinary thinks there are special grounds for reduction averred, and these special grounds are two—in the first place that it is alleged that the bank-agents knew that the debtor was insolvent, and in the second place, that one of these two bank-agents happened to be the debtor's personal law-agent. I do not see how these two facts can affect the matter at all. As to the first, Mr Macmillan's argument on that matter was unanswerable. It is not a question of what the creditors knew, but of what the debtor himself knew, and what he in conjunction with them did because he knew and because they knew of his insolvency. As to the other matter, viz., that one of the defenders was the law-agent of the debtor, I do not see how that can affect the case. What was done by the bankers was done by them as agents of and for behoof of the bank, and to hold that an ordinary transaction of banking could not be carried out on the usual footing and with the usual result in a case where one of the bank-agents, or even the bank-agent himself, was a solicitor and was the agent of the person with whom he was dealing, would lead to very grave disturbance in a great deal of business—business which is perfectly usual and regular and occurs every day. Of course there might be an argument that the agent was more likely to be aware of the state of the debtor's affairs. But then, again, whatever the agent here knew, he knew as a bank-agent, and it does not at all follow that he knew that the debtor was insolvent, or that the debtor himself was dealing with the matter on the footing that he was insolvent.

Another point very ingeniously raised by Mr Anderson was that this deed was of the nature of a disposition omnium bonorum. Mr Anderson says "that the bond which he transferred to the bank carried the whole of his goods." That is certainly not a thing to be assumed, and it certainly does not appear to be so on the face of the bond. It is quite certain that if this had been a disposition omnium bonorum it would not have benefited the bank, because it would have been a distinct declaration of insolvency—a distinct declaration by the debtor that he knew that he was insolvent.

On the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and dismiss the action.

Lord Dundas.—I concur.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that one of the defects in the previous record, namely, the absence of a clear averment that, at the date of the assignation, MacDougall was insolvent, has now been removed. But what the Lord Ordinary, in the opening paragraph of his opinion, desiderated, namely, an averment that he knew of his insolvency, has not been made and could not be made, because the case of the pursuer is that he thought he was not liable for the overdraft of the Quarrier Company, and without that overdraft he was perfectly solvent.

I think the Lord Ordinary in allowing proof of what he thought a specialty has a little forgotten the position of the parties, because he says in his second paragraph: "the pursuer alleges that the defenders, in whose favour the security was granted, were the law-agent and the banker of the insolvent; that they knew of his insolvency, but for their own purposes industriously concealed the fact from him." The fact is that one of them, Ironside, was law-agent to MacDougall, that he was also a banker, and that the other, Moir, had no connection with MacDougall in the way of law agency, and was only a banker. Mr Anderson put it, however, that Ironside knew the facts which came to his knowledge as law-agent, and that in some way, rather difficult to follow, Moir was responsible for Ironside. I do not know what might have been the result if that had been properly averred, but I find no such averment. The averment is that they, that is the two bank-agents, were both "aware that the said Hugh MacDougall was liable for the overdraft on the Quarrier Company's account, as in fact he was in a question with the bank, and that he was then hopelessly insolvent." Therefore, even if there might be a special case—I do not know of any in the books—which would entitle the pursuer to proof without an averment that the debtor knew that he was insolvent, I do not find any such specialties here.

In regard to what your Lordship has said about a disposition omnium bonorum, that again might raise a question if we had a case requiring us to consider it. But there is here no averment of a disposition omnium bonorum. If there were such an averment relevantly made, the conclusion would be obvious, so far as relevancy went, that the debtor must have known that, when he granted such a disposition, he left himself insolvent, because he had no estate remaining. It would also follow, if that were necessary, that the creditors must have known that their debtor had at their instance rendered himself insolvent; but we have no such case made.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and dismissed the action.

MACPHERSON & MACKAY, S.S.C.—DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—Agents.

No. 26.

R., Pursuer (Respondent).—G. Watt, K.C.—Ingram.
S. AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—T. A. Menzies.

Reparation—Slander—Falsity of slanderous statements admitted in letter of apology—Action of slander for subsequent repetition of same statements—Plea of veritas—Competency—Personal bar.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington, diss. Lord Dundas) that the defender in an action of damages for slander was not barred from pleading veritas by having, on a former occasion, written a letter of apology, admitting that similar statements then made by her were false, and undertaking not to repeat them.

ON 19th June 1913 Miss R. brought an action against Mrs S. and her husband, concluding for payment of £400.

The pursuer averred that in November and December 1912, in the presence of certain persons named, the defenders made statements to the effect that the pursuer had had sexual intercourse with N., that she consulted a law-agent, and that on 14th January 1913 he obtained letters of apology from the defenders, the letter from Mrs S. being as follows:—"I hereby admit that I have on several occasions made false and slanderous statements reflecting on the moral character of your clients, the R. family, who reside at this address, and particularly against Miss R. These statements, I admit, are entirely unfounded in fact, and I now unreservedly withdraw the same, and apologise for having made same. I further bind myself in future not to repeat any of these statements, nor to molest any of the family in any way. It is agreed that this apology shall not be shown to any person or persons, except those who have heard either directly or indirectly any of the statements made by me." (Cond. 5) "The pursuer, who wished to avoid publicity, hoped that the said letters of 14th January 1913 would effectually put a stop to said slanders. On 15th May 1913, however, the pursuer's father received a letter from the female defender, which is produced and founded on. The letter is as follows:—' . . . You may not be aware that your two sons . . . have insulted me in the stair . . . since the month of January. If they persist in continuing this conduct towards me, I may inform you that I have letters sent to me when I was on holiday last September explaining in detail the conduct of your daughter in this stair, which I will show to every person I know in this district . . .' Said letter was composed and written by the female defender with the knowledge, assistance, and authority of the other defender, and was dispatched by them in concert for the purpose of further slandering and annoying the pursuer. Said letter is a repetition of the former slander in a particularly offensive way, and the defenders are both liable for its dispatch." The pursuer further averred;—"The statements in the said letter are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely represent, as they were intended to represent, that she had been guilty of immoral conduct and sexual intercourse, and they were so understood by her."

Dec. 18, 1913.
R. v. S.

Defences were lodged for both defenders. With reference to the statements alleged to have been made in 1912, the female defender, after denying that the statements were in the terms or bore the meaning complained of, averred;—(Ans. 2) "In any event, if this defender did make any statements regarding the pursuer in the terms and with the meaning alleged, said statements and said meaning were true. The pursuer, prior to December 1912, frequently misconducted herself and had carnal intercourse with N. at the foot of the said common stair. In particular, she did so on or about 3rd August 1912, on or about 24th August 1912, on or about 31st August and 1st September 1912, and on or about 27th September 1912." With reference to the letter of 14th January she averred;—(Ans. 4) "At the time said letter of apology was signed her husband was very ill and likely to be seriously affected by the worry of proceedings which were threatened by the pursuer. In the circumstances, this defender signed one of the letters referred to in terms insisted upon by the pursuer's agent. The said letter was accepted by the pursuer as a full apology for all statements made by this defender concerning pursuer's conduct." The male defender denied that he was a party to his wife's letter of 15th May 1913.

The female defender pleaded, inter alia;—(5) The statements made by this defender regarding the conduct of the pursuer with the said N. being true, this defender is entitled to absolvitor.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defenders are barred from stating said defences, and decree should be granted.

Dec. 18, 1913.

R. v. S.

The pursuer proposed this issue:—"Whether the defenders, or either and which of them, dispatched a letter to the pursuer's father on or about 15th May 1913, whether the said letter, which is printed in the schedule hereto, was of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer, being an unmarried person, had been guilty of sexual intercourse,—to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

The female defender proposed this counter issue:—"Whether during the months of August and September 1912 the pursuer was guilty of sexual intercourse with a man named N. in the common stair at . . .?"

On 4th November 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington) approved of the issue proposed by the pursuer and refused the counter issue.*

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 6th December 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—This was an action of damages for slander, and not an action for breach of any undertaking contained in the letter of 14th January. Therefore the defender was not pre-

---

* "OPINION.—As a result of the discussion the pursuer now proposes a single issue against both defenders, and the latter's counsel admitted that the pursuer was entitled to an issue asking whether the defenders or either and which of them dispatched a letter to the pursuer's father on or about 15th May 1913 representing that the pursuer, being an unmarried person, had been guilty of sexual intercourse. The female defender proposes a counter issue asking whether, during the months of August and September 1912, the pursuer was guilty of sexual intercourse with a certain person. The pursuer maintains that the female defender is barred from stating this defence by her letter of 14th January 1913 addressed to the pursuer's solicitor in which she admitted that she had on several occasions made false and slanderous statements reflecting on the pursuer's moral character, which statements she thereby admitted to be entirely unfounded in fact, and accordingly she withdrew the same and apologised for having made them. It should be noted that the female defender does not aver in so many words that the innuendo said to be conveyed by the letter of 15th May 1913 is true in point of fact. What she does aver in answer 2 is that if, prior to January 1913, she did make any verbal statements regarding the pursuer representing that the latter had been guilty of sexual intercourse, said statements were true. Accordingly she stands in this dilemma; either the record contains no averments of veritas applicable to the innuendo said to be conveyed by the letter of 15th May 1913 or, alternatively, the defender must be held to admit that this letter refers to the same incidents which are referred to in the letter of apology of 14th January 1913. In either view the counter issue must be disallowed. A person who represents as a matter of existing fact that he admits the falsehood of defamatory statements, which he has previously made concerning another person, is not entitled to withdraw the admission and to prove the truth of his charges after the person to whom the representation was made has altered his legal position on the faith of it. The female defender avers (answer 4) that [his Lordship quoted answer 4]. If, as this defender alleges, the pursuer accepted the defender's letter of 14th January 1913 as a full apology for all antecedent statements made by the defender concerning the pursuer's conduct, the pursuer thereby debarred herself from claiming damages in respect of these statements and so altered her legal position. It follows that the defender is for ever foreclosed from asserting the truth of these charges which according to her own representation were admitted by her to be false. I accordingly refuse the counter issue."

Dec. 18, 1913.
R. v. S.

vented by any admissions contained in that letter from stating all competent defences to an action of slander. Veritas was a complete defence to such an action,[1] and a defender was always entitled to put it forward. In view of the admissions made in the letter of 14th January, it might be difficult to establish the defence, but that was no objection to its competency.[2] No question of bar arose, because the letter had caused no real change in the pursuer's position.[3] The defender was therefore entitled to the counter issue proposed.

Argued for the respondent;—By admitting in the letter of 14th January that the statements were false, the defender had for ever barred herself from maintaining that they were true,[4] unless she could allege—which she had not done—that any fresh information had come to her knowledge. To allow the defender to plead veritas would be to permit her to break her contract, for the letter was a contract between the parties whereby, in consideration of the pursuer refraining from taking proceedings, the defender admitted that the statements were false, and undertook not to repeat them.

It was also stated at the bar that since the letter of 14th January was written a material witness for the pursuer had disappeared.

At advising on 18th December 1913,—

Lord Dundas.—I think this case raises a peculiar and a very difficult question. Its difficulty is sufficiently illustrated by the fact that, while I consider that the Lord Ordinary's conclusion is right, I am aware that both my brethren who heard the case differ from that view; and the interlocutor will, therefore, be altered.

The Lord Ordinary seems to have proceeded wholly upon the defender's admission, in her letter of apology of 14th January 1913, that the statements she had made were entirely unfounded in fact. He points to the assertion in answer 4 for Mrs S, that "the said letter was accepted by the pursuer as a full apology for all statements made by this defender concerning pursuer's conduct." This averment was, I suppose, made by Mrs S. in order to support her fourth plea in law that "the pursuer having accepted this defender's apology for all statements made by her concerning the pursuer's conduct, this defender is entitled to absolvitor." The plea thus put forward seems to me to be quite untenable; but the defender's averment remains, for whatever reason it may have been inserted in her record. The Lord Ordinary founds upon it his view that the pursuer, by so accepting the letter of 14th January, "debarred herself from claiming damages in respect of these statements, and so altered her legal position. It follows that the defender is for ever foreclosed from asserting the truth of these charges which according to her own representation were admitted by her to be false." It may well be that the pursuer, by foregoing her action of damages, has been prejudiced in her legal position; I think the presumption is in her favour, and that there

[1] Mackellar v. Duke of Sutherland, (1859) 21 D. 222; Campbell v. Ferguson, (1882) 9 R. 467.

[2] Mangena v. Wright, [1909] 2 K. B. 958, per Phillimore, J., at p. 975.

[3] Bell's Prin., sec. 27A; Ex parte Adamson, (1878) 8 Ch. D. 807, per James, L.J., at p. 817.

[4] Everest and Strode on Estoppel, (2nd ed.) pp. 1-4.

Dec. 18, 1913.
R. v. S.
Lord Dundas.

is no need for specific averment of such alteration. It is, moreover, the case that the pursuer's counsel stated at our bar that her position has in fact been prejudiced owing to the recent disappearance of a material witness. I am disposed, therefore, to agree with the grounds upon which the Lord Ordinary has disallowed the counter issue.

But I think there is a stronger, and, to my mind, a very cogent, reason for adopting this course. In her letter of 14th January 1913, Mrs S. expressly bound herself "in future not to repeat any of these statements, nor to molest any of the family in any way." By her subsequent letter (dated presumably on or about 14th May) she in effect repeats her former statements, and threatens to make public throughout the district letters which she says she had received in the preceding September; and she now desires to plead veritas, and to restate, and if possible to substantiate, in open Court, the whole of the injurious statements she originally made, and afterwards admitted to be false. The defender's obligation of silence, contained in her letter of 14th January, forms part of an onerous contract; the counter consideration for the letter was the pursuer's withdrawal of the threatened action of damages. The contract binds both parties. If the pursuer had, in breach of it, raised an action of damages for slander, I do not think we should have allowed it to go to trial. In the same way, I do not think that, standing such a contract, the Court can permit, as by granting the counter issue it would in effect permit, the defender to break a material term of it, in order to enable her to maintain a plea in defence to this action which she could not otherwise put forward.

The point is difficult; but it seems to me that, assuming that the defender's plea of veritas is in fact capable of substantiation, she has only herself to blame if, by her own act in writing the letter of 14th January, she has deprived herself of the right to maintain it. For my own part, therefore, I consider that the justice of the matter lies in the direction of refusing the counter issue, and that we ought to adhere to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

Lord Salvesen.—The point raised in this case is an interesting one, and has not previously been the subject of direct decision. The material facts are that the defender on various occasions in the course of the year 1912 slandered the pursuer; that she was called to account for doing so, and that under threat of proceedings she, on 14th January 1913, admitted that the statements complained of were entirely unfounded in fact, withdrew and apologised for having made them, and bound herself in future not to repeat any of them. It is common ground that the delivery of this letter was granted and accepted on the footing that no other proceedings could thereupon be taken in respect of the slanders to which it referred.

It now appears that the defender in a letter addressed to the pursuer's father has again published the same defamatory statements; and she does not allege that any other facts had come to her knowledge since the date when she penned her apology. The pursuer has accordingly brought this action in order to obtain damages in respect of this new wrong, and has obtained an issue to which no objection is taken. The defender, however,

Dec. 18, 1913.
R. v. S.
Lord Salvesen.

proposed a counter issue in support of her plea of veritas. This issue the Lord Ordinary disallowed on the ground that the defender is "for ever foreclosed from asserting the truth of those charges which, according to her own representation, were admitted by her to be false."

If this action had been laid upon a breach of the defender's undertaking not to repeat any of the defamatory statements, I am disposed to think that it would not have been competent, even in mitigation of damages, to have averred or proved that the statements were in fact true. As between the parties to the agreement, and for the purposes of the same, it must be held to be an admitted fact that the charges were untrue; and as there was an express undertaking by the defender that they were not to be repeated—which undertaking she has violated—I do not see what defence, standing the agreement, she could relevantly have proponed.

But that is not the nature of the action with which we are called upon to deal. The pursuer treats the letter of 15th May not as a breach of the agreement but as a new wrong, and her action is an ordinary one of damages for slander. Her statements would not be relevant to support the conclusions at all unless she averred that the defamatory statements were false; and the issue that the Lord Ordinary has allowed is in the usual form. In these circumstances I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the defender is barred from proving that the statements which she made were in fact true, and of course she would not be permitted to do this without a counter issue. The former letter of apology will be excellent material for cross-examination of the defender, the more so as she does not aver that anything has occurred to change the view to which she therein gave expression. But I can well understand a person giving such a letter under stress of circumstances, or on the advice of a prudent solicitor, while all along retaining the conviction that she was thoroughly justified in publishing the slanders complained of. The pursuer urged that her sole object in bringing this action was to clear her character. If so, I do not see how she can achieve it by closing her adversary's mouth. One can easily figure the case of an apology being given at a time when the granter had not specific evidence to prove the truth of her slanders, and that afterwards she received information which led her to think that she had acted unwisely; but if a letter of apology is a bar in the present case, where no new facts are said to have come to the defender's knowledge, I cannot see why it should not be a bar in every case. The admission that the slanders were unfounded could not be got rid of on the ground of error, for in the case figured there was none. It is true that in the present action the pursuer has founded only on the repetition of the slanders after the apology was delivered, and has apparently done so on the footing that any claim in respect of the defender's prior slanders had been satisfied by the apology. In this, however, she was in error. The defender, who was admittedly in breach of her agreement, could not have founded upon it to the effect of barring a claim in respect of the prior slanders. A party who is in breach of a contract cannot plead the contract as foreclosing the claim which but for it would have been competent.

An appeal was made to the doctrine of personal bar or personal exception, as stated in Bell's Principles, section 27a. The learned editor of that work says:—"Rei interventus, i.e. the occurrence of a real change of position, is in all cases the foundation of the plea." If so, it does not help the pursuer here, because she has not stated on record any respect in which she has been prejudiced by the repetition of the slanders apart from the wrong which the publication of the defamatory statements itself constitutes.

I am accordingly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has erred in refusing the counter issue, and that we should recall his interlocutor to that extent. As regards the form of the counter issue, I think it must be made as specific as the defender's averments in support of her plea of justification contained in the last sentence of answer 2.

Lord Guthrie.—The defenders take no objection to the pursuer's issue. But the pursuer objects to the counter issue proposed by the female defender. In my opinion that issue, if made specific, in terms of answer 2, should be allowed.

The Lord Ordinary has not disallowed the counter issue merely on the terms of the defender's letter of 14th January 1913, accepted by the pursuer. He does not hold that, apart from alteration of the legal position of the person slandered, the writer of such a letter, on subsequently repeating the slander which it had been undertaken should not be repeated, might not, at least in certain circumstances, be entitled, on the raising of an action of damages for slander, to plead veritas and to obtain an issue of veritas. The Lord Ordinary holds that "the defender is for ever foreclosed from asserting the truth" of the charge which she had admitted to be false, which she had withdrawn and apologised for, and which she had undertaken not to repeat in future. His Lordship comes to this conclusion because the pursuer by acceptance of the letter "thereby debarred herself from claiming damages in respect of these statements and so altered her legal position." But if these two things are to be taken as counterparts, it must be because the pursuer, by acceptance of the letter, for ever debarred herself from claiming damages in respect of the statements referred to in the letter. The summons, which does not found as ground for damages on the slanders referred to in the defender's letter of 14th January 1913, seems to proceed on this hypothesis. I think this view is unsound. If the defender breaks the undertaking in respect of which the pursuer agreed not to claim damages, I see no reason why the pursuer should not thereafter found on the original statements in an action of damages for slander.

But the pursuer raised the wider question, whether, in any circumstances, the writer of such a letter as the one in question would be entitled to plead veritas in an action of damages raised for subsequently repeating the slanders. The question is new, and there are considerations both ways. But I see no sufficient reason for holding that, in the circumstances supposed, an exception ought to be introduced to the recognised rule—No falsehood, no slander. Cases may be figured in which such an exception would work gross injustice. Innocent persons may, to their ruin, be compelled by threats of actions of damages to brand themselves

Dec. 18, 1913.

R. v. S.

Lord Guthrie.

as slanderers, because they are unable, from want of evidence, to prove the truth of injurious accusations they have made. In such a case, on sufficient evidence subsequently appearing, the most obvious course open to them for clearing their character is to withdraw their admission, and assert the truth of the very injurious statements which they had undertaken not to repeat. In such a case it would be most unjust if their mouths were shut. It is true that no such special circumstances are averred here, although it appears that the letter was written under threats of proceedings, and it is not said that the defender had any separate legal advice. But in any event, in this case, as in the one supposed, there is the same essential element, namely, that no one ought to be made liable in damages for injurious statements, which are, if false, slanderous, without an opportunity of showing that they are true, and therefore not slanderous.

At first sight it looks as if this view not only ignored the sacredness of a deliberate and onerous contract but supplied a motive for a person, in the position of the writer of the letter of 14th January 1913, breaking his contract. But it must be observed that the defender, who has admittedly broken her contract, is in this case not taking advantage of her so acting to take proceedings, but is defending her position against attack, and, in so doing, is only asking to be allowed to put the Court in possession of the facts which, apart from the objection taken by the pursuer to their admission, are clearly relevant. In many cases a defender has rights, and is entitled to privileges, not open to a pursuer. But however this may be, the difficulty does not seem to me to arise in this action of damages for slander. If the pursuer had sued the defender for damages for breach of contract the defence of veritas would probably be irrelevant, and might not be allowed to be proved, except if, and in so far as, the pursuer's general character might arise for consideration in a question of amount of damages.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, and allowed the issue for the pursuer and the counter issue for the defender, the latter being amended to the effect of deleting the words "during the months of August and September 1912," and substituting the precise dates specified in answer 2.

J. GEORGE REID, Solicitor—C. STRACHAN PETRIE, Solicitor—Agents.

No. 27.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Mackay v. Mackay.

ENEAS MACKAY, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Chree, K.C.—Wark.
MRS ANNIE MACLEAN SHARP OR MACKAY, Defender (Respondent).—W. Mitchell.

Title to sue—Assignation by executors before confirmation—Title of assignee to sue.

The trustees and executors of a deceased, acting under his trust-disposition and settlement which contained a general disposition in their favour, granted an assignation of certain copyrights forming part of his estate, before they had obtained confirmation. The assignee having brought an action in respect of infringement of the copyrights—

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Ormidale) that he had a good title to sue, although confirmation would have to be expede by the trustees before he could extract a decree for payment.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Mackay v. Mackay.

1st Division. Ld. Ormidale.

On 7th March 1912 Eneas Mackay, bookseller and publisher in Stirling, brought an action against Mrs Annie Maclean Sharp or Mackay, owner and publisher of the Celtic Monthly, in which he craved that the defender should be ordained to produce "a full and complete account of the profits made by the defender from the insertion in the Celtic Monthly for September 1911, published by the defender, under the heading of 'John Mackenzie on the Beauties of Gaelic Poetry,' of a part of a memoir or biography of John Mackenzie, editor of the Beauties of Gaelic Poetry, printed in the Celtic Magazine for April 1877, the copyright of which biography belongs to the pursuer, and to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £100 sterling, or such other sum as shall be ascertained to be the amount of said profits. . . ."

The pursuer averred that the biography or memoir mentioned in the summons had been written, and published in the Celtic Magazine in 1877, by Alexander Mackenzie, who was the proprietor of that magazine and of the copyright of the biography in question. Alexander Mackenzie died in 1898.

He further averred:—"By assignation dated 3rd, 4th, and 5th March 1903, the pursuer acquired from the trustees of the said Alexander Mackenzie the absolute copyright in and for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and in and for His Majesty's Colonies and Dominions abroad, of and in certain works of the said Alexander Mackenzie, including inter alia the Celtic Magazine, and all the right and interest of said trustees to and in the same and all future impressions of the said works. He thus acquired right by assignation to the whole copyright of said biography or memoir, and he is registered as proprietor of the copyright thereof, conform to certificate of the Registering Officer appointed by the Stationers Company, No. 18654, dated 20th September 1911. . . ."

The defender averred in answer, inter alia:—"It is believed and averred that the said trustees never confirmed to the copyright of said article, and that they were not in titulo to grant said assignation"; and pleaded;—(1) No title to sue.

On 16th November 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) sustained the defender's plea of "No title to sue," and dismissed the action.*

---

* "Opinion.—The first plea in law for the defender is 'no title to sue.' The averment on which that plea is based is that the trustees who granted the assignation on which the pursuer founds his right to insist in the action never confirmed to the copyright of the article in question. It was admitted at the bar that this averment was true in fact. The pursuer, however, maintained that confirmation was not necessary to support his title to raise the action, although it would require to be expede before any decree for payment could be extracted.

"Now I do not think that it can be disputed that actual confirmation to a sum sued for, though necessary as a title to uplift and discharge, is not a requisite to instruct a title to sue, or that a general disposition unconfirmed is a good legal title to sue for a sum of money—M'Laren, Wills and Succession, section 1616, and cases there cited. Accordingly, if the present had been an action at the instance of Mr Mackenzie's trustees for a sum of money alleged to be due to the defunct their title to sue would have been undoubted, although they could not have obtained final decree without expeding confirmation.

"But the pursuer here is not Mr Mackenzie's trustees, and he is not suing for a debt due to the defunct. He is in effect seeking to recover damages for

Dec. 19, 1913.

Mackay v. Mackay.

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 18th and 19th December 1913.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The trustees from whom the pursuer had obtained his assignation were not only the executors, they were the general disponees of the late Mr Mackenzie. As such they could competently transmit to the pursuer a good title to sue in respect of the breach of copyright.[1] It was conceded that confirmation might have to be expede before the pursuer could extract decree for payment, but in virtue of his assignation he was in a position to force the trustees to confirm. In any case, the defect in the pursuer's title to sue caused by the want of confirmation had now been remedied, as confirmation had been obtained.

Argued for the respondent;—The trustees from whom the pursuer had obtained his assignation had no real right in Mr Mackenzie's estate before confirmation. They had only a jus ad rem, a right to recover the estate, but no right to administer or deal with any part of it.[2] The assignation to the pursuer was therefore bad, and subsequent confirmation did not cure its initial radical defect.

Lord President.—I think this interlocutor cannot be supported. The Lord Ordinary, it appears to me, has proceeded too fast in sustaining the plea of no title to sue. The law of the case is completely covered by authority.

---

an alleged infringement of a copyright to which he maintains an exclusive right in virtue of an assignation by the trustees of the deceased owner of the copyright. In my opinion the trustees were not in titulo to grant an effective assignation of the copyright prior to taking out confirmation. The general disposition gave them no doubt a jus ad rem to the copyright, but before intromitting with it, and disposing of it, they were bound to complete their title to it; just as in the case of a debt due to their author they would have required to have completed their title to it in order to vest them with the plenum jus and to enable them effectively to intromit with the sum recovered.

"Assuming that, if the trustees were to expede confirmation now, the confirmation would—I do not require to decide that it would—retroact so as to cure the defect in the assignation, the pursuer is not himself in a position to expede confirmation, and that consideration of itself in a question between him and the defender appears to me to warrant my sustaining the plea of 'no title to sue.'

"The precise ground on which the Lords decided the case of Smith v. Grieve, M. sub voce Substitute and Conditional Institute App. No. 1, does not appear from the interlocutor, but both in it and in the later case of Robertson v. Gilchrist, 6 S. 446, the disposition was not to trustees, but direct to the disponee who was found entitled to transmit without confirmation.

"I shall accordingly sustain the first plea in law for the defender and dismiss the action."

[1] M'Laren on Wills, (3rd ed.) p. 871, sec. 1604; Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, (3rd ed.) ii., p. 1132; Smith v. Grieve, (1801) M. App. 1, s. v. Substitute and Conditional Institute; Robertson v. Gilchrist, (1828) 6 S. 446; Chalmers' Trustees v. Watson, (1860) 22 D. 1060, per Lord Ivory, at p. 1064; Titles to Lands Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 127, and Sched. K K; Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), sec. 64.

[2] Erskine, Inst. iii. 9, 30; M'Laren on Wills, (3rd ed.) pp. 870 and 878, sec. 1602 and 1617; Act anent the Confirmation of Testaments, 1690, cap. 26.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Mackay v. Mackay.

Ld. President.

The pursuer seeks here decree of count and reckoning in respect of the infringement of an alleged copyright, or alternatively for damages, and the title on which he founds is an assignation, dated in March 1903, granted by the testamentary trustees of a certain Alexander Mackenzie who was the proprietor of the copyright. The defender meets that case by an averment in the following terms: "It is believed and averred that the said trustees never confirmed to the copyright of the article, and that they were not in titulo to grant the said assignation," and on that averment their first plea is founded. It is true that the testamentary trustees of Alexander Mackenzie were not confirmed at the date when they granted the assignation in favour of the pursuer, but I think it clear that, by virtue of the general conveyance contained in his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 8th January 1898, the trustees had a beneficial interest in the copyright vested in them and transmissible by them. No doubt confirmation was required in order that they might secure an active title to intromit with and administer the estate, but it seems to me to be perfectly clear that if they subsequently obtained confirmation the defect in their title could be effectively cured, and the cure would draw back to the date of the assignation.

So much seems to have been conceded by the pursuer before the Lord Ordinary, for I find from his Lordship's note that he says that the pursuer maintained that confirmation was not necessary to support his title to raise the action, although it would require to be expede before any decree for payment could be extracted. This contention on the part of the pursuer is, I think, well founded in law, for by virtue of the assignation which he had received from the testamentary trustees, I consider that he was vested with the right to demand that the trustees should complete their title by expeding confirmation. That was his right, and he was in a position to exercise that right, and he stood before the Lord Ordinary bound to exercise that right before seeking decree in this action.

The Lord Ordinary appears to me, in the reasoning contained in his note, to have stated with perfect accuracy the whole law of the case. He says distinctly that actual confirmation is not a requisite to instruct a title to sue, and that it cannot be contended that a general disposition unconfirmed is not a good title to sue. But he goes on to make this observation—"Assuming that, if the trustees were to expede confirmation now, the confirmation would . . . retroact so as to cure the defect in the assignation, the pursuer is not himself in a position to expede confirmation, and that consideration of itself in a question between him and the defender appears to me to warrant my sustaining the plea of 'no title to sue.'" I am of opinion that that did not warrant the Lord Ordinary in sustaining the plea of no title to sue, and that, although no doubt the pursuer himself was not in a position to expede confirmation, he was, by virtue of the assignation (which I assume was granted for valuable consideration), entitled to demand that the trustees should complete their title by expeding confirmation. In these circumstances I think the pursuer was well entitled to maintain that his title was a good one to sue this action, although, no doubt, before he obtained extract he would be bound to have the title of his authors completed so as to make it effective in any question with the defender.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Mackay v. Mackay.

I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and remitting to him to proceed with the case.

LORD JOHNSTON.—Since this case was opened to us I have never been able to understand how an assignation granted by executors unconfirmed cannot be validated by the retroactive effect of confirmation afterwards obtained, but must be treated as an entirely invalid and null deed, which would necessitate the execution of a new assignation after confirmation. On these grounds I think the Lord Ordinary should have proceeded with the case.

LORD MACKENZIE and LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against, repelled the first plea in law for the defender, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

MORTON, SMART, MACDONALD, & PROSSER, W.S.—FYFE, IRELAND, & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 28.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

ARTHUR HUGH LISTER (Judicial Factor on Lord Lister's Trust-Estate), First Party.—J. H. Millar.
LUCY MARIA ANDERSON SYME, Second Party.—J. H. Millar.
MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN MACVICAR BURN AND ANOTHER, Third and Fourth Parties.—Blackburn, K.C.—Lord Kinross.

Foreign—Succession — Marriage-contract — Construction — Destination to "next of kin"—Marriage-contract executed in Scotland—Spouses dying domiciled in England—Lex loci contractus or lex domicilii.

An antenuptial contract of marriage was entered into between an Englishman residing in Scotland and a Scotswoman. The contract was prepared by a Scottish solicitor, was in Scottish form, and contained a provision that a fund provided by the wife should, after her death failing issue, belong to her "next of kin, excluding her husband." Some years after the marriage the parties moved from Scotland to England, and the wife died domiciled there.

Circumstances in which held (diss. Lord Johnston) that it was the intention of the parties to the contract that the wife's next of kin entitled to succeed to the fund should be ascertained according to the law of Scotland, and accordingly that brothers and sisters of the half blood were excluded.

1ST DIVISION. ON 3rd December 1912 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court as to the construction of a clause contained in the antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between Joseph Lister, afterwards (and herein referred to as) Lord Lister, and Miss Agnes Syme, afterwards (and herein referred to as) Lady Lister. The question of law was whether a destination to Lady Lister's next of kin contained in this contract fell to be construed according to the law of England or according to the law of Scotland.

The parties to the marriage-contract were—(1) Lord Lister, therein designed as of No. 3 Rutland Street, Edinburgh, Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons; (2) Lady Lister; (3) Joseph Jackson Lister, of Upton House, Stratford, Essex, Lord Lister's father; and (4) James Syme, of Millbank House, Edinburgh, Professor of Clinical Surgery in the University of Edinburgh, Lady Lister's father. The contract was in Scottish form, was prepared by a firm of Scottish solicitors, and contained a clause of consent by all parties to its registration in the Books of Council and Session. It was executed by Lord and Lady Lister, and by Professor Syme, in Scottish form, in Edinburgh on 18th April, and by Joseph Jackson Lister, in English form, in London on 19th April 1856.

The trustees appointed to act under the contract were—Arthur Lister, of Bradford, Yorkshire, woolstapler; Rickman Godlee, barrister, London; Professor Syme; and David Syme, advocate, Sheriff-substitute of Kinross, and the acceptors and survivors.

By the contract the father of each of the spouses bound himself to pay to the trustees a sum of £2000, to be applied by them on certain trusts for the benefit of the spouses. In particular, the trustees were directed to pay the income of the £2000 contributed by Professor Syme to Lady Lister during her lifetime and after her death to Lord Lister, should he survive her. With regard to the capital of each sum of £2000 the trustees were directed, after the death of the survivor of the spouses, to divide the same amongst the children of the marriage, as set forth in the contract. With regard to the capital of the £2000 provided by Professor Syme, the trustees were directed to hold the same during the life of the spouses and of the survivor of them, "but subject to this provision, it is hereby declared that if no child of the said intended marriage shall become absolutely entitled to the funds hereby placed in trust under and in terms of the foregoing provisions then and in that case the sum of £2000 which is to be advanced by the said James Syme, the fourth party hereto, or the funds, shares, stocks, or securities in or on which the same may be then invested shall in such case belong absolutely to the said Agnes Syme, and subject to her appointment and disposal, but that only by mortis causa deed or will to take effect after her decease, and in default of such appointment or disposal shall belong to her next of kin, excluding her husband."

The contract also contained the following provision:—"And in consideration of the obligation hereby undertaken by the said James Syme, the fourth party hereto, the said Agnes Syme with the advice and consent of the said Joseph Lister, her promised husband, hereby renounces and discharges the said James Syme and his executors of all claim competent to her through his death, either for legitim or bairns' part of gear, or for executry or as one of the next of kin of her late mother, or under the contract of marriage of her said parents, or otherwise, the goodwill of her said father alone excepted: And the said Agnes Syme hereby accepts the provisions hereby made in her favour in full of terce of lands, half or third of moveables, jus relictæ and dower, and all which she could ask or claim through the decease of the said Joseph Lister, or which her executors or next of kin could claim by and through her predecease: And it is hereby agreed and declared that the foregoing provisions in favour of the issue of the said intended marriage are and shall be held, accepted, and declared to be in full of all that they and each and any of them could ask or claim as legitim or bairns' part, or otherwise by and through the death of their father or as executors or next of kin, or otherwise by and through the death of their mother; and all parties consent to the

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

registration hereof in the Books of Council and Session or others competent for preservation, as well as for execution in common form." *

The case stated:—"(3) The said Professor James Syme (Lady Lister's father), who settled £2000 as above mentioned on his daughter under the said contract of marriage, was the son of Scottish parents, and was born at Edinburgh on 7th November 1799. He died at Edinburgh domiciled in Scotland on 26th June 1870. (4) The said Joseph Lister (Lord Lister) was the son of English parents. He was born at Upton, Essex, on 5th April 1827, and he was educated in England. He came to Scotland in pursuance of his profession about the year 1852, and at the date of his marriage (1856) he resided in Edinburgh, and till 1877 he resided and carried on his profession first in Glasgow and afterwards in Edinburgh. In 1877 Lord Lister returned to England, and he resided in London till his death in 1912. Lord Lister was at his death a domiciled Englishman. (5) The said Miss Agnes Syme (Lady Lister) was born in Scotland and was the daughter of a domiciled Scotsman, but she acquired an English domicile on her husband taking up his residence in England. She died at Rapallo, Italy, on 12th April 1893 intestate and domiciled in England. (6) There was no issue of the marriage between Lord and Lady Lister, and Lady Lister did not exercise her power of appointment. The said trust funds therefore fall under the said contract of marriage to 'her next of kin.' (7) Lady Lister was survived by her husband, Lord Lister (who died 10th February 1912), and by her full sister the second party, by her half sister Mrs Jemima Syme or Burn, wife of the third party, and by her half brother Mr James Syme, of Millbank."

It was then narrated that the trustees nominated under the marriage-contract entered into possession and management of the trust funds, but that they all predeceased Lord Lister, the survivor of the spouses, without any appointment of new trustees having been made; that the last survivor of them died in July 1908; and that his executors, in accordance with the English practice, acted as trustees under the marriage-contract until Lord Lister's death, after which Arthur Hugh Lister was appointed to be judicial factor on the marriage-contract trust-estate.

The judicial factor was the first party to the case; Lady Lister's full sister, Miss Lucy Maria Anderson Syme, was the second party; Lady Lister's half-sister and half-brother, Mrs Burn and Mr James Syme, having predeceased Lord Lister, their respective representatives, Major-General John Macvicar Burn and Captain John William Jeffreys, were respectively third and fourth parties to the case.

The case proceeded:—"15. The question has arisen between the parties to this case as to who are Lady Lister's 'next of kin,' and, in default of issue and of any appointment or disposal by Lady Lister, entitled as such to the said trust funds settled by Lady Lister's father under the said contract of marriage. This renders it necessary to ascertain authoritatively whether the said contract of marriage is to be construed according to the law of Scotland or according to the law of England. The parties to the special case are agreed that by the law of England (if the said contract falls to be construed according to the law of England) Lady Lister's next of kin at the date of her death were her full sister, the second party, her half-brother, Mr James Syme, and her half-sister, Mrs Burn, and that these parties or their representatives are entitled to share the trust funds equally per stirpes. If, on the other hand, the said contract falls to be construed according to the law of Scotland, the parties to the case are agreed that the second party is entitled to the whole trust funds as Lady Lister's sister-german and as such sole next of kin at the date of her death, to the exclusion of the other parties as representing her sister consanguinean and her brother consanguinean."

* The contract, in dealing with the shares of children of the marriage, contained a provision requiring a child, in certain circumstances, to bring "his or her appointed part or share into hotchpot." It also contained a provision that the £2000 to be provided by Lord Lister's father should, under certain circumstances, belong absolutely to Lord Lister "and his executors and administrators."

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

The contentions of the parties were stated as follows:—"16. The first party submits no contention on the question at issue between the second, third, and fourth parties. The second party contends that in respect (1) that Lord and Lady Lister were both resident in Scotland at the date of the marriage; (2) that the contract of marriage is in the Scottish form, and was prepared by a Scottish solicitor; and (3) that Lady Lister's father was a domiciled Scotsman, and the marriage trust funds now in dispute were settled by him, the said marriage-contract, and in particular the destination of the said funds, must be construed according to Scots law; and that consequently the term 'her next of kin' in the said contract of marriage means Lady Lister's next of kin at the date of her death according to the law of Scotland. The third and fourth parties contend that the bequest to Lady Lister's 'next of kin' is a testamentary provision and not one of the essential portions of the contract between the spouses. That as there is no contrary intention expressed in the marriage-contract the 'next of kin' should be ascertained according to the law of England as the law of the country of Lady Lister's domicile at the date of her death."

The question of law, as amended at the hearing, was:—"Does the destination to the next of kin of Miss Syme contained in the aforesaid contract of marriage fall to be construed in the sense attached to that expression by the law of Scotland to the exclusion of the half-blood, or in the sense attached to that expression by the law of England to the inclusion of the half-blood?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 10th and 11th December 1913.

Argued for the second party;—Whether the clause under construction was to be regarded as contractual or as testamentary the result was the same—Lady Lister's next of kin must be ascertained according to the rules of the law of Scotland. (1) Assuming the provision to be contractual then, according to the general rule applicable to the construction of contracts, the lex loci contractus must be applied to its construction.[1] The Court in deciding such questions would always pay particular regard to indications of intention,[2] and there

[1] Bar, Private International Law, (2nd ed.) 423; Dicey, Conflict of Laws, (2nd ed., 1908) pp. 637-9; Story, Conflict of Laws, (8th ed., 1883) p. 372; Jacobs, Marcus, & Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais, (1884) 12 Q. B. D. 589, per Bowen, L.J., at p. 599; Corbet v. Waddell, (1879) 7 R. 200.

[2] Surman v. Fitzgerald, [1904] 1 Ch. 573, per Cozens Hardy, L.J., at pp. 587-8; Chamberlain v. Napier, (1880) 15 Ch. Div. 614, per Hall, V.-C., at p. 630.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

was ample indication here, in the Scottish form of the deed and in the preponderance of technical expressions of the law of Scotland, of an intention that the law of Scotland should be applied. The destination to the wife's next of kin bore a special meaning involving an appeal to Scottish law for its construction; it was not equivalent to a general disposition to heirs in mobilibus,[1] who might be ascertained according to various systems of law. The exclusion of the husband was no indication that the parties had in view the possibility of the application of English law to the construction of the contract, for the husband was not one of the wife's next of kin according to the law of that country.[2] (2) Again, on the assumption that the clause was to be regarded as testamentary in character, the same rule of construction must, in the circumstances, be applied.[3] If it should be decided that the law of Scotland must regulate this matter, then it was the municipal law of Scotland, the law which would have been applicable had the parties died domiciled in Scotland, which must be applied,[4] and not the law of Scotland in the larger sense, which included a set of dogmas of private international law, the application of which would identify Lady Lister's next of kin according to her domicile at the date of her death.[5] A change of domicile subsequent to execution did not alter the construction of a testamentary deed.[6]

Argued for the third and fourth parties;—The question was simply one of intention, and the facts stated or admitted in the case showed that the parties to the contract intended that this destination should be construed, in the event which had occurred, according to the law of England. The destination was not one in which the contracting parties had any interest. It could not come into operation until after the death of Lady Lister, and then only in the event of her dying intestate. The destination was not to personæ delectæ, but to a general class, the members of which could not be ascertained until after her death. The provision was therefore clearly testamentary and not contractual, and it was testamentary of Lady Lister, who had acquired the capital sum in question from her father for the consideration of the abandonment of her legal rights. It was therefore testamentary of a domiciled Englishwoman. According to the ordinary rule of construction the law of the domicile at the date of the [1] Gregory's Trustees v. Allison, (1889) 16 R. (H. L.) 10; Hannay's Trustees v. Graham, 1913 S. C. 476, per Lord Dundas, at pp. 477-8.

[2] Jarman on Wills, (6th ed.) vol. ii. 1604-6 and 1633; Statute of Distributions, 1670 (22 and 23 Car. II. cap. 10); Statute of Frauds, 1676 (29 Car. II. cap. 3); Bailey v. Wright, (1811) 18 Ves. 49, 18 R. R. 151; Milne v. Gilbart, (1852) 2 De G., M., & G. 715, and (1854) 5 De G., M., & G. 510.

[3] M'Laren on Wills, (3rd ed.) vol. i. pp. 30, 32, 35, et seq.; Dicey, Conflict of Laws, (2nd ed.) pp. 679-80; Westlake, Private International Law, (5th ed.) sec. 122, referring to Trotter v. Trotter, (1829) 4 Bl. N. R. 502, 3 W. & S. 407; Thomson's Trustees v. Alexander, (1851) 14 D. 217; Mitchell & Baxter v. Davies, (1875) 3 R. 208; Brown's Trustees v. Brown, (1890) 17 R. 1174; Griffith's Judicial Factor v. Griffith's Executors, (1905) 7 F. 470.

[4] Stair v. Head, (1844) 6 D. 904.

[5] Minority of consulted Judges in Stair v. Head, 6 D. 904.

[6] Wills Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 3; In re Groos, [1904] P. 267; Dicey, Conflict of Laws, (2nd ed.) p. 680.

testator's death should be applied.[1] In any event there was a presumption in favour of the application of the law of the domicile of the testator as at his death to regulate matters of moveable succession, unless another intention could be clearly read from the deed under construction. No such intention was indicated in gremio of this deed, indeed there were indications in the deed that the parties contemplated the application of a law other than that of Scotland to its construction. Such indications were to be found in the use in several instances of terms of art of English law. Further, the exclusion of the husband from the next of kin, which was meaningless in Scots law, showed that the parties intended to provide for circumstances in which another law might have to be applied. The fact that the destination was allowed to stand unchanged after a change of domicile was in itself an indication of intention to submit to the application of the law of England.

At advising on 19th December 1913,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Lord Lister died in February 1912 a domiciled Englishman. At the date of his death he was in the enjoyment of the income of the capital sum of £2000 which had been settled on Lady Lister by her father in the antenuptial marriage-contract of the parties, dated as far back as April 1856. The income of the same sum had been enjoyed by Lady Lister until the date of her death in April 1893. And the question that now arises relates to the disposal of the capital sum of £2000, and that depends upon the construction of a certain clause in the marriage-contract. That deed was prepared by a Scotch conveyancer, is in Scotch form, and was executed in Scotland by Lady Lister at the time when she was a domiciled Scotswoman. It directs that, subject to the right of the spouses in the income, and in the event of no child of the marriage succeeding to the capital, the £2000 should belong absolutely to Agnes Syme and subject to her appointment and disposal, "but that only by mortis causa deed or will to take effect after her decease, and in default of such appointment or disposal shall belong to her next of kin, excluding her husband." Lady Lister died without having executed any deed of appointment, a domiciled Englishwoman; and there were no children of the marriage. Now, it is agreed between the parties that the capital sum in question passes to the next of kin of Lady Lister ascertained at her death, but the question is—Who are they? Are they to be ascertained according to the law of Scotland, or are they to be ascertained according to the law of England?

I am of opinion that the sum in question belongs to the next of kin of Lady Lister at her death ascertained according to the law of Scotland. I read the clause in the marriage-contract as testamentary and not contractual, but I may say in passing that I should have reached exactly the same conclusion had I regarded the clause as contractual. Indeed, we were invited by counsel for the third and fourth parties in this case to consider it as one in which a domiciled Scotswoman executed a will in [1] M'Laren on Wills, (3rd ed.) i. pp. 30 et seq.; Purvis' Trustees v. Purvis, (1861) 23 D. 812, at p. 830; Smith v. Smiths, (1891) 18 R. 1036.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

Ld. President.

Scotland, in Scotch form, in favour of her next of kin and died a domiciled Englishwoman. I am willing so to regard it; and, on that assumption, the question at once arises—What was the intention of the testatrix as evinced by the words used in her settlement? I entertain no doubt that, at the date when she executed her deed, Lady Lister contemplated that her next of kin, by the law of Scotland, should have the bequest. In the absence of any indication to the contrary, we are not entitled to assume that she intended, as the objects of her bounty, persons to be chosen and selected according to the law of a foreign country with which, presumably, she was not familiar. Equally clearly, I think, we are not entitled to assume that when she changed her domicile she intended to change the objects of her bequest, unless she expressed a clear intention to that effect. Now, down to the time of her death, it was within her power by such a deed as is mentioned in the marriage-contract to direct the destination of this £2000 whithersoever she desired. But she did not avail herself of the power so conferred, and that leads, I think irresistibly, to the conclusion that she was perfectly satisfied with the will which she had already made, and in that frame of mind she remained until the day of her death.

Apart altogether, therefore, from the authority of decided cases, I come to the conclusion that we must have regard entirely to the intention of the testatrix as disclosed in the deed which she made. But, in coming to this conclusion, I think I am following the authority of the cases on this point which were cited to us in the very able and elaborate argument with which we were favoured. I refer especially to the reasoning of Lord Ivory in the case of Lord Stair v. Head,[1] of Lord President Inglis in the case of Mitchell & Baxter v. Davies,[2] and of Lord Fraser, concurred in by Lord Adam and, I think, by Lord M'Laren, in Brown's Trustees v. Brown,[3] and, adopting the words of Lord Fraser in that last-mentioned case, with a variation appropriate to the circumstances, I am inclined to say that at the time when the marriage-contract was executed by Agnes Syme she knew nothing about the law of England and was thinking only about the law of her own land.

Apart altogether from the authority of the decided cases, I should have reached exactly the same conclusion as the result of express statutory enactment, for the third section of the Wills Act, 1861,[4] provides as follows: "No will or other testamentary instrument shall be held to be revoked or to have become invalid nor shall the construction thereof be altered by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same," on which clause Professor Dicey's apt and, as I think, accurate comment is: "It is also clear that all questions of interpretation must be dealt with exactly as they would have been dealt with had the testator not changed his domicile."

I, therefore, interpret this clause of the marriage-contract exactly as if Lady Lister had died a domiciled Scotswoman; and, in accordance with that opinion, I think we ought to answer the question put to us, in the

---

[1] 6 D. 904.
[2] 3 R. 208.
[3] 17 R. 1174.
[4] 24 and 25 Vict. cap. 114, sec. 3.

form to which I understand it is to be altered, to the effect that the next of kin of Lady Lister fall to be ascertained according to the law of Scotland, and that the second party to this case is entitled to have the capital sum of the £2000 in question.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I regret I cannot come to the same conclusion that your Lordship has reached, but I desire to say that my difficulty arises not on the law—as to which I think we are entirely agreed—but in the application of that law to the particular document.

By a clause in Lord and Lady Lister's marriage-contract her fortune, in the circumstances which have occurred, passes to "her next of kin." Are the individuals so designated to be ascertained according to the law of Scotland or of England? The former excludes, and the latter includes, the half blood. Lady Lister left a sister by the full blood, and a brother and sister by the half blood. Hence the question. There may be other distinctions between the two systems of law, but the above is stated as the only distinction affecting the question raised in the present case.

I take first the facts as regards domicile. Lady Lister was the daughter of Professor Syme, and her domicile at the date of the execution of her marriage-contract, 1856, was Scotland. Whatever the domicile of the marriage from 1856 to 1877, and I think it was Scottish, it was, from 1877 to Lady Lister's death in 1893, English. Lord Lister was born in Essex, in England, of English parents in 1827. In 1852, at the age of twenty-five, he came to Scotland in pursuance of his profession, and at the date of his marriage, 1856, he was living at 3 Rutland Street, Edinburgh. Between 1856 and 1877 he practised in Glasgow and in Edinburgh. He returned to England in 1877, and resided in London till Lady Lister's death in 1893, and in fact till his own in 1912.

I have mentioned these facts in detail because many of them have a bearing upon the construction of Lord and Lady Lister's marriage-contract. Under that deed Professor Syme, who was a party to it, settled £2000 upon his daughter. I do not need to refer to the special terms—the settlement being a mutual settlement, and the respective fathers of the spouses making provision for them—further than to say that failing issue of the marriage, which event happened, it was declared that the provision made for Lady Lister by her father should "belong absolutely to the said Agnes Syme, and subject to her appointment and disposal, but that only by mortis causa deed or will to take effect after her decease, and in default of such appointment or disposal shall belong to her next of kin, excluding her husband." Lady Lister left no deed appointing or disposing. But as, in consideration of the above-mentioned provision, Lady Lister discharged her father of her legitim, the consequent settlement on her next of kin must be deemed and taken to be her settlement; and, while her settlement of the fund quoad ultra is contractual, this part I conceive to be testamentary. One more fact—two of the trustees were English and two were Scottish, so that nothing bearing on the domicile of the trust can be deduced from the selection of trustees.

In these circumstances the next of kin "take expressly in the character of grantees under the deed, and by force of the specific provisions on their behalf therein contained"—per Lord Ivory in Stair v. Head.[1] They are, in fact, conditionally instituted to the issue of the marriage. But it is necessary to construe the deed in order to ascertain the meaning of next of kin, which, though a common expression, is in law a term of art, because the law assigns a particular meaning to it, and a meaning which differs in different countries. Writing as a domiciled Scotswoman, the prima facie presumption is that Lady Lister used the term in the sense attributed to it by the law of her own country. And if there was nothing special in the deed to counteract this presumption, I should agree that it must prevail. But as Lord President Inglis pointed out in Mitchell & Baxter's case,[2] "the real question, as in every testamentary deed, is, what was the intention of the testator" or grantor? The fact of domicile is not "absolutely conclusive." "It might be his intention that his settlement should be construed by the law of a different country, and that intention might be expressed in his will. If so, the law of that country would regulate the construction . . . of his settlement."—See also Brown's Trustees.[3] Not only do I think that the intention may be expressed, but that it may equally be implied.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

Ld. Johnston.

There are here indicia from which a different intention may be, I think must be, implied. It cannot but be observed, on a careful perusal of the marriage-contract, that the parties or their advisers foresaw that the future matrimonial domicile was a matter of doubt. I do not speak merely as wise after the fact, but because the doubt was in the circumstances reasonable, and is betrayed by the terms of the contract itself. It bears on the face of it to have been prepared by those who had in their mind's eye the law both of Scotland and of England, for at three different places, at least, English words of style are introduced, separately or as alternatives for Scottish equivalents, viz., "hotchpot," "executors and administrators," "will," and "dower." And more pregnant still, it contains two provisions intended, I think, to meet the possibility of the domicile of the marriage at the dissolution being English. These are, I think, of importance.

The first is the ulterior destination to Lady Lister's "next of kin, excluding her husband." Why should he be excluded in these general terms? If the law of Scotland alone was looked to, her husband's jus mariti would have been renounced or excluded. But by the law of England a surviving husband has possible rights of a different character, much more nearly rights of succession, though it may be not technically such.—Milne v. Gilbart.[4] It is true that any such claim was avoided by the destination to the next of kin, who thus took as conditional institutes, and not merely ab intestato—Brown's Trustees.[3] But that case had not arisen at the date of the marriage-contract, and it was not unreasonable that it should be regarded as better ob majorem cautelam expressly to exclude it. Hence was used the expression "excluding her husband," an expression apt to apply with effect, whether the domicile at the dissolution of the marriage was Scottish or English. The second is the acceptance of her provisions from her husband by Lady Lister as in satisfaction not only of terce and jus relictæ but of dower—again providing against the possibility of the domicile being English at the date of the dissolution of the marriage.

---

[1] 6 D., at p. 921. [2] 3 R., at p. 211. [3] 17 R. 1174.
[4] 2 De G., M., & G. 715, and 5 De G., M., & G. 510, 95 R. R. 300.

From these considerations I think that I am bound to draw the conclusion that Lady Lister's intention was that her next of kin should succeed, in the event which happened, according as these might be pointed out by the law of the domicile ultimately adopted by the spouses, whether Scottish or English. That she did not look further and contemplate that the domicile might be neither Scottish nor English, does not affect the construction of the settlement in the circumstances which she did contemplate.

I am therefore of opinion that the next of kin, according to the law of England, are entitled to succeed.

Lord Mackenzie.—[After narrating the facts, and quoting the clause of the marriage-contract disposing of the capital of Lady Lister's £2000] —It is evident that the clause under consideration is not one under which the husband takes any interest. He is expressly excluded. The destination to next of kin only takes place in default of any other appointment of the fund by Lady Lister. None of the parties to the marriage-contract except Lady Lister has any interest in the clause in question. It is of the nature of a testamentary bequest. The intention of the person making the bequest has therefore to be ascertained. Did Lady Lister mean that on her death the law of Scotland was to be applied in fixing who her next of kin were, or did she mean that they were to be ascertained by the law of the country in which she happened to be domiciled at her death? I come to the conclusion that the reasoning contained in the opinion of Lord Ivory in the case of the Earl of Stair v. Head[1] is applicable. No doubt in that case there was an express declaration that the import and effect of the deed "shall be construed and regulated by the law of Scotland." In the present case this is to be implied from the language of the deed and the position of the parties as above set forth. There do occur in the contract certain expressions more appropriate to the law of England than to the law of Scotland, viz., the reference to hotchpot, the destination of the husband's fund to his executors and administrators, and the reference to dower. The latter phrase is, however, used in conjunction with terce and jus relictæ. The destination to the next of kin is a special destination. Next of kin is not equivalent to heirs in mobilibus. The words "excluding her husband" were founded on as indicating an intention to exclude the paramount right which a husband has under the law of England, but they serve a purpose in this deed under the law of Scotland because, although the jus mariti is excluded from the liferent of the wife, there is no exclusion, express or implied, of the jus mariti after Lady Lister's death.

As is pointed out by the Lord President in the case of Mitchell & Baxter v. Davies,[2] this is not a question of the law of succession, but a question of the construction of a deed. The real question, as in every [1] 6 D., at p. 921. [2] 3 R., at p. 212.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Lister's Judicial Factor v. Syme.

Lord Mackenzie.

testamentary deed, is what was the intention of the testatrix? I may also refer to the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Fraser) in Brown's Trustees.[1] I am of opinion that in this case next of kin means next of kin at the date of death as fixed by the law of Scotland, and that accordingly the second party is entitled to the whole trust funds. The construction of the settlement is not altered by any subsequent change of domicile. The provisions of Lord Kingsdown's Act (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 114), section 3, are declaratory of the law.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—Although the destination of the sum of £2000 to the next of kin of the future Lady Lister was defeasible and gratuitous, it formed a term of the contract between her and her father whereby she induced him to come under an obligation to pay £2000 to the trustees of the marriage-contract. It was also a term of the contract between her and her father on the one hand, and her future husband on the other, whereby he renounced his rights as a husband as regards this fund. The present case resembles that of Gregory's Trustees v. Allison,[2] in which Lord Watson attached importance to the fact that the deed which he had to construe was a contract and not a will, which might be held to speak as from the death of the testator. The clause in the marriage-contract which has to be interpreted begins by conferring upon Lady Lister a power of "appointment and disposal, but that only by mortis causa deed or will to take effect after her decease." The distinction between a mortis causa deed and a will was, in the year 1856, one of great importance in Scots law and was familiar to Scottish lawyers, but it depended upon technicalities peculiar to our system which have no place in English law. In default of appointment or disposal the clause declared that Lady Lister's fortune should "belong to her next of kin, excluding her husband." Lord M'Laren lays it down[3] that a bequest in such terms operates in favour of the persons who at common law would have been entitled ab intestato to the moveable succession of the propositus. In other words, relations through the mother would be absolutely excluded; descendants would exclude collaterals and ascendants; collaterals would exclude ascendants; and the full blood would exclude the half blood. These are highly technical and arbitrary rules. The special case does not state, and I do not profess to know, how such a bequest would operate according to the law of England; but I cannot assume that the effect would be the same as in Scotland with the single exception that the half blood would rank along with the full blood—which is the only difference mentioned in the special case. There is authority for the view that in England the children and the parents of the propositus are held to be in an equal degree of kindred, and that they take jointly—Withy v. Mangles.[4]

I can discover nothing in the marriage-contract to indicate that the expression "next of kin," as used in the clause under construction, was not used in the sense in which it is intelligible to Scottish lawyers. It

[1] 17 R. 1174.
[2] 16 R. (H. L.) 10.
[3] Wills and Succession, (3rd ed.) ii. p. 765.
[4] (1843) 10 Cl. & Fin. 215.

seems unlikely that the parties, after using technical words of Scots law in the earlier part of the clause, should have used the expression "next of kin" in any but the technical sense intelligible to Scottish lawyers. Further, I cannot believe that the parties, and in particular Lady Lister and her father, desired that their contract should take effect according to the rules of some foreign system of jurisprudence (either English or colonial or foreign), of the operation of which they were utterly ignorant.

In my opinion the persons entitled to benefit are those who were Lady Lister's next of kin (as defined by the law of Scotland) at the date when the provision vested, i.e., at her death.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative of the first alternative and in the negative of the second alternative thereof.

W. & J. COOK, W.S.—RUSSELL & DUNLOP, W.S.—Agents.

THE MOST HONOURABLE GAVIN, MARQUIS OF BREADALBANE, Appellant.—Wilson, K.C.—Wilton.
DONALD ROBERTSON, Respondent.—Chree, K.C.—Aitchison.

No. 29.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane v. Robertson.

Lease—Small holdings—"Present rent"—Tenant's share of fire insurance premium—Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V. cap. 49), sections 13 and 26 (3) (a).

The Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, section 13, defines "present rent" as "the yearly rent, including money and any prestations other than money." And section 26 (3) enacts that a person shall not be held an existing yearly tenant or a qualified leaseholder in respect of "(a) any land the present rent of which within the meaning of this Act exceeds fifty pounds in money . . ."

A tenant whose yearly rent was £50 also made to his landlord an annual payment of 1s. 10d., being his proportion of a premium of insurance over certain buildings on his holding.

Held (diss. Lord Johnston) that this payment of 1s. 10d. did not fall to be taken into account in computing the tenant's "present rent" within the meaning of section 26 (3) (a) of the Act.

1ST DIVISION. Land Court.

IN an application to the Land Court, under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, by Donald Robertson for an order fixing a fair rent for the holding of Easter Moiearlanich, of which Robertson was the tenant from year to year and the Marquis of Breadalbane was the proprietor, the Land Court granted the application, and, at the request of the landlord, stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth, inter alia,—"(4) The holding, exclusive of common pasture, exceeds fifty acres. The sum entered in the Valuation-roll for the county of Perth as the rent of the applicant's holding for the year current at the commencement of the said Act was £50, 1s. 10d. per annum. This 1s. 10d. represents the proportion payable by the said Donald Robertson of the premium of an insurance policy against fire, effected by the respondent, the proprietor, over a large number of farm buildings upon the estate, which policy includes the byre and stable occupied by the said Donald Robertson. This insurance policy was effected many years later than the reduction of the rent of £58 by the sum of £8 [which, as stated in a previous paragraph of the case, had taken place in 1885]. There was no proof of any specific agreement by the tenant to pay the said 1s. 10d., but this sum was charged to and paid by him yearly each year from 1905 to 1912 inclusive. The rent was payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas, and the said 1s. 10d. was collected yearly along with the Whitsunday rent. The notices to pay and receipts for payment produced by the tenant which relate to a Martinmas term contain only 'half year's rent of possessions at Moiearlanich Twenty-five pounds,' while those which relate to a Whitsunday term contain separately (first) 'half year's rent of possessions at Moiearlanich Twenty-five pounds,' and (second) 'Insurance on buildings for year One shilling and tenpence.' (5) The application came before the Scottish Land Court for hearing at Killin on 28th March 1913. At the hearing the proprietor (respondent therein) appeared by an agent, and objected to the competency of the application, in respect that the applicant, being tenant of a holding exceeding (exclusive of common pasture) fifty acres in extent, and also exceeding £50 of yearly rent, was not, as at 1st April 1912, an 'existing yearly tenant' within the meaning of the said Act, and particularly of section 26, subsections (3) (a) and (10) and section 13 (b) thereof, and was therefore neither a landholder nor a statutory small tenant within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Acts, 1886 to 1911. (6) On 18th June 1913 the following final order was issued by the Land Court:—'Edinburgh, 18th June 1913.—The Land Court, having resumed consideration of this application, repel the objections to the competency stated for the respondent under reference to the annexed note: Find that the applicant is a statutory small tenant in and of the holding described in the application. . . .' (7) It is maintained by the proprietor that the said final order is erroneous in point of law, in so far as it repels the objection to competency founded on the rent of the holding exceeding £50 and the extent of the holding exceeding fifty acres. It is maintained by the proprietor that in determining whether the applicant is an existing yearly tenant under the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act, 1911, the proportion of insurance premium payable by the applicant must be taken into account in computing the 'present rent' of the holding within the meaning of section 13 and section 26, subsection 3 (a), of said Act."

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane v. Robertson.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court included the following:—"(1) Whether in computing the applicant's 'present rent' within the meaning of section 26, subsection (3) (a) of the said Act, the said proportion of insurance premium payable by the applicant ought to have been taken into account?"

The case was heard before the First Division on 26th and 27th November 1913.

Argued for the appellant;—Sections 13 and 26 (3) of the Small Landholders Act, read together, provided in effect that "present rent" must be ascertained by adding together all prestations made in respect of the occupany of the holding, whether these were in money or in kind, including (1) nominal rent; (2) other money payments; (3) payments in kind. The payment of a premium of insurance fell within the second of these categories. In practice it had rightly been treated as a payment of the nature of rent,—the Valuation-roll was prepared on this basis, and the present Act accepted as the annual value of a holding the figure entered in the Valuation-roll.[1] It was clearly established by authority that payment of a premium of insurance was part of the consideration for which the tenant occupied his holding.[1] The obligation to make such a payment was one undertaken solely for the benefit of the landlord, and was in fact nothing else than an addition to the rent.[2]

[1] Secs. 7 (16) and 33 (2).

Argued for the respondent;—Neither at common law nor by statute was there authority for treating this payment as part of the rent of the subject. The two classes of payment were essentially different,—rent being a return paid by the tenant to the landlord in respect of the use of the subjects,[3] the insurance premium being a contribution to a fund to be applied to the restoration of the subjects in the event of their destruction. The landlord would not be entitled to sequestrate for non-payment of premiums,[4] or to bring an action of removing on that account.[5] Nor had the common law position of rent been altered by statute. It was defined in section 13 of the Act of 1911 (the words being taken from the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886,[6] section 4), as including yearly rent, i.e., in accordance with the test above given, the return made in respect of the use of the subjects, whether this was in money or in kind. The present payment was not one made for the use of the subjects, and was therefore not included in the yearly rent. The distinction between payment of a premium of insurance and payment of rent was recognised in kindred legislation.[7] In the present case the parties had treated the two payments as being separate and distinct. It was not to be assumed against the respondent that there was a contract under which he was bound to pay the premium, but, conceding that there was such a contract, it was separate from and only collateral to that of the lease. The payments were made at different intervals, and treated as separate payments in the receipts granted. It was not the case that the premiums were paid entirely in the landlord's interest. He was bound to apply them to insurance as a condition of exacting their payment to him.

At advising on 19th December 1913,—

Lord President.—The applicant in this case is tenant of a holding which extends to more than 50 acres, and, accordingly, he cannot be considered to be a statutory small tenant within the meaning of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Act if the present rent of his holding exceeds £50 in money.

Now, when we turn to the entry in the Valuation-roll, we find that the applicant's rent for the holding for the year current at the commencement of the Act was £50, 1s. 10d. per annum. But then this 1s. 10d. represents the proportion payable by the tenant of the premium of an

[1] Walker, (1862) 24 D. 1453; Armour on Valuation, (2nd ed.) p. 149; Wood's Lectures, p. 132.

[2] Duke of Hamilton's Trustees v. Fleming, (1870) 9 Macph. 329, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 335, and Lord Ardmillan, at p. 338; Rankine on Leases, (2nd ed.) pp. 220-1.

[3] Rankine on Leases, (2nd ed.) p. 287.

[4] Bennie v. Mack, (1832) 10 S. 255.

[5] Morton v. Murray's Representatives, (1793) M. 13,872.

[6] 49 and 50 Vict. cap. 29.

[7] Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 6.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane. v. Robertson.

Ld. President.

insurance policy against fire effected by the appellant over a large number of farm buildings upon the estate, which policy includes the byre and stable occupied by the respondent. This rent of £50 was payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas, the said sum of 1s. 10d. being collected yearly along with the Whitsunday rent. The question which rises sharply, therefore, is this—Is the insurance premium of 1s. 10d. to be taken into account in computing the "present rent" of the holding?

I am of opinion that it is not; that rent is one thing and insurance premium a totally different thing. Rent is a payment by the tenant for the use and possession of the land and buildings, whereas the insurance premium is paid in order to secure reinstatement of the buildings and indemnification in the case of loss by fire. And I find, on turning to the note appended to the final order, that the Land Court considered that rent means the return in money, or in produce, or in kind, due by the tenant for his possession and use of the subjects let to him by the landlord, which is in substance really the definition of rent which you find in a familiar text-book —Professor Rankine's work on "Leases"—where he defines rent thus[1]: "Rent in law as distinguished from political economy is the return in money, produce, or other moveables, due by a tenant for the possession and use of the subject of a lease." In short, these two payments are made for a totally different purpose. They are payments which differ in quality, and the parties to this agreement obviously so regarded them, for the case distinctly sets out that the notices to pay and the receipts for payment produced by the tenant which relate to a Martinmas term contain only "half year's rent of possessions at Moiearlanich twenty-five pounds"; while those which relate to a Whitsunday term contain separately (first) "half year's rent for possessions at Moiearlanich twenty-five pounds," and (second) "Insurance on buildings for one year one shilling and tenpence." Parties, therefore, were able quite clearly to distinguish between the two payments, the one rent and the other insurance premium. Now, the best definition I can find of insurance is that given by Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in the case of the Scottish Amicable Heritable Securities Association v. Northern Assurance Company,[2] where he says insurance "is a contract belonging to a very ordinary class, by which the insurer undertakes, in consideration of the payment of an estimated equivalent beforehand, to make up to the insured any loss he may sustain by the occurrence of an uncertain contingency." The uncertain contingency in this case is fire, and the pre-estimated equivalent for indemnification is the fire insurance premium. I think, therefore, holding the opinion that the quality of the two payments is entirely different, that it is unnecessary to consider—because immaterial to decide—whether the tenant would be entitled to compel the landlord to devote the money received from the insurance company, if a fire took place, to the re-instatement of the premises. In the general case it is clear, I think, that he would not; but that in no way affects the quality of the payment. The payment is none the less a payment to secure re-instatement or indemnification in case of

[1] Rankine on Leases, (2nd ed.) p. 287.
[2] (1883) 11 R. 287, at p. 303.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane v. Robertson.

Ld. President.

loss by fire because the tenant would not be entitled to compel the landlord so to apply it.

We were referred in the course of the discussion to the case of the Duke of Hamilton's Trustees v. Fleming,[1] not for the decision pronounced by the Court in that case, but because of certain dicta of the Judges of this Division, which were said to support the contention that a payment for the use and possession of subjects was exactly the same as a payment in order to secure reinstatement of the subjects in the event of loss by fire. I am of opinion that the dicta in that case do not support that view. The judgment in the case was on a totally different point from that which is raised for our consideration here. The tenant obliged himself—he was the tenant of a mill with machinery—to have the whole houses and machinery constantly insured in some respectable insurance office to the extent of £1200 sterling, the policy to be taken in name of the proprietor, he relieving the tenant of one-half of the premium of insurance. Lord President Inglis, in construing that clause, a fire having taken place and the landlord having recovered the insurance money, says, "It appears to me that this insurance is for the interest of the landlord only. It is a common stipulation, particularly in agricultural leases, and the obligation of the tenant to pay the whole or the half of the premium is just an addition to his rent." I think it quite clear that it is an addition to his rent. The two payments—insurance premium and rent—are certainly similar in this regard that they are both paid at the Whitsunday term by the tenant to the landlord, but that in no way alters the quality of the payment; and I accept, therefore, without hesitation the dictum of the Lord President to the effect that the payment of half of the insurance premium is just an addition to the tenant's rent. But he does not say nor does he indicate that a premium of insurance is rent. And, in the same way, Lord Deas, in expressing his opinion, differing on the main question from the Lord President, says, "The whole insurance is on the buildings and machinery, both being the property of the landlord, and the words of the policy show that it was effected for the sole behoof of the landlord. The tenant pays a portion of the premium, that is, his rent is increased by that amount, but that does not entitle him to participate in the benefit of this insurance." I think we are all agreed that the rent is increased by the amount of 1s. 10d. per annum here. But that does not lead to the inference that the two payments are of the same quality and the same kind. Lord Ardmillan further expresses his opinion on this part of the case thus:—"Neither landlord nor tenant was bound to rebuild; and, apart from special obligation, neither party was bound in law to insure. The obligation to insure contained in the lease is in favour of the landlord; the payment of half the premium by the tenant was just an additional rent." Now, if by the expression "additional rent" Lord Ardmillan means what the Lord President in, I think, more accurate language expresses by the phrase "an addition to the rent," I am well content; but if he means by the use of the words "additional rent" that a payment for the use and possession of subjects is exactly the same as a payment in [1] 9 Macph. 329.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane v. Robertson.

Ld. President.

order to secure reinstatement of the subjects in the event of loss by fire, then I respectfully differ. Lord Kinloch in his opinion uses this expression, "Though half the premium was to be paid by the tenant, this was in substance nothing more than so much additional rent, just as the payment of so much of the landlord's taxes might be"—a statement which is not objectionable in itself, because, in substance, it is a money payment, though in quality it is entirely different, because made for an entirely different purpose.

A capital test, as it appears to me, would be this—not whether the tenant would be entitled to demand exhibition of the receipt for the premium before he pays the 1s. 10d., which I think he would, but this—whether the landlord's hypothec at the time it existed would have covered an obligation by the tenant in his favour to pay an insurance premium—whether, in short, a landlord could take out sequestration, where the rent was paid, for an unpaid premium of insurance. I do not think anyone would maintain that the landlord's rights could be so extended; and reading between the lines in Lord Moncreiff's opinion in the case cited to us of Bennie v. Mack,[1] I can quite clearly see that he would not have so held. On the whole matter I come to the same conclusion as the Land Court, that the two payments were entirely different in quality; that the payment of the insurance premium was a personal contract apart from the contract of lease; and, accordingly, that we ought to answer the first question which is put to us in the negative, and find it unnecessary to answer the second question.

Lord Johnston.—A statutory small tenant, coupling section 26 (3) and (10) with section 32 of the Small Landholders Act, 1911, is a tenant from year to year or a leaseholder—(first) who has not provided the buildings and permanent improvements on the holding, or the greater part of them, and (second) the present rent of whose holding, within the meaning of the Act, does not exceed £50 in money, or if the rent does exceed £50 in money, whose holding does not exceed 50 acres in extent.

The respondent here conforms to the first condition. The question is, does he comply with the second? and that is answered if we know what is his present rent within the meaning of the Act, for there is no question that his farm does exceed 50 acres in extent. The only definition of "present rent" is found in section 13, and it is very awkwardly expressed, especially in relation to section 26 (3). For the one speaks of the consideration as being "money, and any prestations other than money," while the other speaks of it as if it was "money" only. They cannot both be "present rent," unless the consideration first referred to is to be reduced to money. Whether this can be done in the ordinary case under the Act is not for our determination here.

In the present case we are relieved of this difficulty. If the appellant is right on the facts, there is, putting it at the lowest for him, a consideration given for this lease in money and in a prestation, which sounds to be in money, because it is to pay something in money for the appellant's benefit.

[1] 10 S. 255.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane. v. Robertson.

Ld. Johnston.

Where I think that the Land Court has been misled is in approaching the case on the assumption that the present rent of section 26 (3) was only the money part of the present rent of section 13 to the exclusion of considerations other than money, and further on the assumption that the additional prestation or consideration here, though sounding in money, might be also excluded, because it was an ancillary consideration, or for some other reason that I cannot suggest. In point of fact, what has been paid for some years past for the farm is £50 and 1s. 10d., the latter being half the share of the premium, on a covering policy of insurance over the buildings, effeiring to this particular holding. As the case is stated, I must assume that it has been paid as matter of obligation. The case has been inadequately prepared and stated, and, if desired, I should not be averse to sending it back for further inquiry and restatement. But, on the case as stated, I must take the facts as I have given them.

The Land Court have held that only the £50 falls to be considered as rent under the statute. I think that their judgment is not well founded. We are, in my opinion, foreclosed by contrary precedent, which the Land Court have ignored.

I cannot get rid of the decision in Walker's case,[1] by merely saying, as the Land Court do, that an obligation to pay insurance premiums may, for the purposes of the Valuation Acts, be treated as a consideration other than the stipulated rent, because I find the Judges of the Valuation Appeal Court in that case arriving at their determination, not on anything special to the Valuation Acts, but on the general consideration expressed by them thus: "In respect that by the lease the subjects are let not merely for the money stipulated for, but for the further consideration of the tenant insuring the buildings."

And I find that, in the more important case of Duke of Hamilton v. Fleming,[2] the opinions of the Judges are entirely consistent with the finding in Walker's case,[1] and explain at more length the principle on which Walker's case,[1] and the case in which they were then sitting, proceed. The Lord President (Inglis) speaks to the effect that the obligation of the tenant to pay the whole or part of the insurance is just an addition to his rent; and why, because the insurance is entirely for the benefit of the landlord. There is, unless it is specially provided by the lease, no obligation on the landlord to give the tenant any share of the sum recovered, or to rebuild. He may put the sum in his pocket, and the tenant's only remedy is to abandon the subjects, which ex hypothesi have been destroyed by an act of God. Lord Deas considers "that the insurance was for the benefit of the landlord alone . . . The tenant pays a portion of the premium—that is, his rent is increased by that amount, but that does not entitle him to participate in the benefit of this insurance." Lords Ardmillan and Kinloch express themselves in similar, though even stronger terms. I cannot ignore these judgments, or regard their Lordships' opinions as obiter, or as otherwise than the foundation of their judgment on the second branch of the case before them. And if the facts here are as I have assumed them, there was being paid, in the year the Act came into [1] 24 D. 1453. [2] 9 Macph. 329.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane v. Robertson.

Ld. Johnston.

force, as consideration for the lease of these lands, a sum of £50, 1s. 10d., and if so, the Act does not apply to this farm.

I was, at the discussion, inclined to the view that the stipulation that the landlord should insure, and the tenant repay half the premium, was based on the assumption that they had both an interest in reinstatement, and taking the broad axe to it, that that interest might be regarded as justifying the premium being shared equally, and further, and consequently, inclined to the view that there was an implied obligation on the landlord to devote the policy money to reinstatement. Had my impression been well founded, it would have led to a different conclusion on the question at issue. But a more careful perusal of the case of Duke of Hamilton[1] has satisfied me that my impression was erroneous. Its premiss, indeed, was faulty. For the Lord President (Inglis) says in that case: "The obligation to insure is put upon him (the tenant) for the obvious reason that, as the occupant, he is the party more immediately concerned with the occurrence of fire." Any doubt that there might have been on the point has been resolved by the recent decision of Clark v. Hume.[2]

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of opinion that the Land Court have come to the right conclusion. The term "rent," as used in the statute, is the return due by the tenant for the possession and use of the subject of the lease. That in the present case is £50. The 1s. 10d. is payable under a collateral contract, by which, if and when the landlord produces the receipt vouching payment of the premium of insurance, the tenant is under obligation to relieve him to that extent. It is not necessary to affirm that there is an obligation on the landlord to expend the proceeds of the policy in rebuilding in case of fire. It is enough to say that the tenant pays in the expectation that, in point of fact, the money will be so applied.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—In my opinion the legal inferences which ought to be drawn from the facts stated in the special case, and particularly from the terms of the receipt, are as follows, viz.:—(1) that the landlord was under no obligation to insure the buildings on the holding against fire, but that if he chose to do so the tenant was bound to repay to him the annual premium amounting to 1s. 10d.; (2) that if the landlord chose so to insure, he insured his own interest only and not that of the tenant; and (3) that if the landlord received payment of the insurance money he came under no obligation towards the tenant to restore the buildings. These propositions follow from the decisions in Hamilton's Trustees v. Fleming,[1] and Clark v. Hume.[2] I may here observe that the conditional character of the tenant's obligation to pay the premium of 1s. 10d. per annum as contrasted with the absolute obligation to pay £25 each half year in name of "rent" is not necessarily inconsistent with the view that the true rent of the holding was £50, 1s. 10d. Over and above an absolute obligation to pay a fixed rent in money or in kind a tenant is occasionally taken bound to perform services, but that only if required by the landlord. Such services are part of the rent.

---

[1] 9 Macph. 329. [2] (1902) 5 F. 252.

So far, I do not think that I have said anything inconsistent with the contentions put forward at the debate by counsel on both sides. The landlord's counsel, however, went a step further and argued that as a matter of law the rent of the subjects must be held to be £50, 1s. 10d. although the receipt states the rent at only £50. If the parties regarded the larger sum as the annual value of the subjects to a tenant, the only explanation why part of the rent should have been payable conditionally must have been the trifling amount involved. It seems, however, more probable and also more consistent with the language of the receipt that the tenant expected to receive some benefit in the event of the landlord insuring the buildings, and that he regarded such benefit as worth 1s. 10d. per annum, although he did not think it necessary to secure it either by a trust or by a contract. The yearly tenant of a small farm might reasonably be apprehensive that in the event of the buildings being destroyed by fire his landlord might not think it worth his while to advance money in order to restore them, but might prefer to terminate the yearly lease and to add the ground to another of his farms. In such a case the existence or non-existence of a policy of insurance in favour of the landlord might determine his line of action in the matter of rebuilding. Accordingly it is impossible to infer as a matter of law that the tenant in the present case would have agreed to pay a rent of £50, 1s. 10d. for the subjects. On the contrary, the proper legal inference, in my view, is that the tenant agreed to pay the yearly sum of 1s. 10d. not as a part of the consideration for the right to occupy and use the heritable subjects, but in return for something which was not in its nature heritable. Of course it might be the fact, and might be proved, that in the special circumstances of this particular case the insurance was not regarded by the tenant as of any value to him, and that, if he had not been required to pay 1s. 10d. as the annual premium, he would have been willing to pay that sum as an addition to his rent. But that fact, even if proved or admitted, would not lead to the conclusion that the sum of 1s. 10d. mentioned in the receipt was paid as part of the rent. The only result would be to demonstrate that the rent agreed upon between the parties was too low and did not represent the amount at which the subjects might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. In short, the obligation to pay the yearly premium would, on investigation, be found to be a "consideration other than rent" within the meaning of the Valuation Acts. The Valuation Appeal Court so decided in the case of Walker.[1]

For these reasons I agree with the result arrived at by the Land Court. There are expressions in the opinions of the Judges in the case of Hamilton's Trustees[2] to the effect that a payment by a tenant for insuring the buildings is "an addition to the rent" or "additional rent," but they are merely obiter. All that the Court had to decide was whether the tenant had or had not a legal interest in the insurance money. Further, I have not overlooked the fact that the question to be decided turns primarily upon the meaning of the statutory definition of the word "rent," or of the expression "yearly rent," contained in section 13 of the Small Land-

[1] 24 D. 1453.

[2] 9 Macph. 329.

Dec. 19, 1913.

Marquis of Breadalbane v. Robertson, holders (Scotland) Act, 1911, which supersedes section 4 of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886. These definitions were, in my opinion, intended to include every form of rent, viz., money, kind, and services, but did not otherwise enlarge the ordinary and popular conception of the word.

THE COURT answered the first question of law in the negative.

DAVIDSON & SYME, W.S.—BALFOUR & MANSON, S.S.C.—Agents.

No. 30.

Jan. 6, 1914.

Aitken v. Robson.

THOMAS AITKEN, Petitioner.—A. J. P. Menzies.
WILLIAM ROBSON, Respondent.—Hamilton.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Discharge of bankrupt—Nobile Officium—Trustee elected but not confirmed—Petition to nobile officium by bankrupt for discharge and reinvestment—Competency.

At a statutory meeting for the election of a trustee in a sequestration the creditors elected a trustee and fixed the amount for which he should find security, but did not decide on the sufficiency of the caution offered, and consequently the Sheriff refused to confirm the election. No further steps having been taken in the sequestration for seven years, the bankrupt (who had paid no dividend) presented a petition to the nobile officium of the Court, praying for his discharge, for reinvestment in his estates, and to have the sequestration declared at an end. The petition was opposed by one of the creditors.

The Court held the application competent, and in the circumstances granted the prayer for discharge, but quoad ultra dismissed the petition.

2D DIVISION. ON the 22nd November 1906 Thomas Aitken's estates were sequestrated by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills on the petition of a creditor, William Robson, S.S.C. At a statutory meeting held on 3rd December 1906 the creditors elected a trustee and fixed the sum for which he should find security, but did not decide on the sufficiency of the caution offered as directed by section 72 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. In consequence, when the proceedings were reported to the Sheriff under section 70, he refused to confirm the election, and no bond of caution was ever lodged with the Sheriff-clerk.

No further steps were taken in the sequestration until 3rd November 1913, when the bankrupt presented a petition to the nobile officium of the Court, in which he craved the Court "to find the petitioner entitled to his discharge, and to discharge him accordingly of all debts and obligations contracted by him or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration of his estates, to declare the said sequestration to be at an end, and to declare the petitioner reinvested in his estates; further, to grant warrant for recording the said deliverance in the Register of Sequestrations and in the Register of Inhibitions."

The petitioner averred:—"That if the sequestration proceedings had followed their normal course the petitioner would now have been entitled to apply for and to obtain his discharge, for although he has not paid his creditors 5s. per £1 on the amount of his indebtedness to them he is prepared to satisfy the Court that his failure to do so has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible, all in terms of the provisions of the foresaid statute and also of the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, section 6.

"That, owing to the failure to find security for the trustee's intro-missions as resolved on at the said meeting of creditors and to the failure of the creditors to proceed in the sequestration, the petitioner is deprived of his statutory right to apply in ordinary course for his discharge, or to take any step at all in the sequestration, and he is therefore obliged to make the present application to your Lordships' nobile officium. Before doing so he wrote the creditor on whose petition sequestration was awarded to inquire whether he was prepared to proceed with the sequestration, and in answer received the following reply:—'Dear Sir,—We are in receipt of your letter of 7th. As we explained in our letter of 19th May, in our opinion Mr Robson is not in any way responsible for there being no trustee in the sequestration, and we cannot see that there is any obligation upon him to institute proceedings in the matter at his own expense.—Yours truly. . . .'

Jan. 6, 1914.

Aitken v. Robson.

"That the petitioner appeared at the foresaid meeting of his creditors held on 3rd December 1906, and delivered to the clerk a state of his affairs, and he has always been ready and willing to perform all the duties and acts incumbent on him in connection with the sequestration so as to entitle him to his discharge in terms of law."

Answers were lodged on behalf of William Robson, which stated, inter alia:—"The petitioner has made no offer of any dividend or composition upon his debts, and has taken no steps to have the said sequestration proceeded with, or to obtain a report in terms of the Bankruptcy Acts, or to obtain his discharge in ordinary course, or to entitle him to be reinvested in his estates. The respondent submits that the prayer of the petition should be refused in respect that—(1) the petition is incompetent. (2) The appropriate procedure for obtaining a discharge under the Bankruptcy Statutes is provided by the said statutes. (3) The petitioner's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the application. (4) No offer of any dividend or composition upon his debts has been made by the bankrupt. (5) No report has been obtained by the bankrupt in terms of section 146 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. (6) The petitioner's averments, so far as material, are unfounded in fact."

The case was heard before the Second Division (without the Lord Justice-Clerk) on 6th January 1914.

Argued for the petitioner;—When in the course of a sequestration any difficulty arose which could not be solved by the statutory procedure, the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, would interfere to set matters right.[1] Such a situation had arisen in the present case. The trustee elected in 1906 could never act because he had not found caution within seven days of the meeting, and therefore could not now be confirmed by the Sheriff.[2] The creditors would not move, and even if the petitioner could competently apply for the appointment of a new trustee, it was not fair that he should be put to this expense. He was accordingly entitled to decree in terms of the prayer of the petition, or at least so much of it as referred to his discharge.

Argued for the respondent;—The petitioner had not made out a

[1] Steuart v. Chalmers, (1864) 2 Macph. 1216; Anderson, (1866) 4 Macph. 577; White, (1893) 20 R. 600.

[2] Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1913 (3 and 4 Geo. V. cap. 20), sec. 69, which (by sec. 192) superseded the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 75), sec. 72.

Jan. 6, 1914.

Aitken v. Robson.

case for the interference of the Court. His petition was incompetent because he had not exhausted the procedure provided by statute. His proper course was to apply for the appointment of a new trustee[1]; or at least the Court should obtain a report from the Accountant of Court, as in the case of White.[2] In any event the petitioner was not entitled to be reinvested in his estates, which was a privilege extended only to a bankrupt after composition with his creditors.[3]

LORD DUNDAS.—This case is a peculiar one and is, I think, attended with a certain amount of delicacy. It is a petition by a sequestrated bankrupt for his discharge, and it is put in the form of an appeal to the nobile officium of this Court. I respectfully agree with the words of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in the case of Steuart v. Chalmers[4]:—"It is necessary when we are asked to interpone,"—I think that should be interpose—"in the exercise of our nobile officium, to set right proceedings in a sequestration which have been misconducted or by accident have got out of shape, to be satisfied, in the first place, that a dignus nodus has been made out—a sufficient reason for interfering in the exercise of our nobile officium; and, in the second place, that we have parties before us who are justified in presenting the application."

Now what happened here was that as far back as 22nd November 1906 the petitioner's estates were sequestrated on the respondent's petition. On 3rd December 1906 the creditors held their statutory meeting; they elected a trustee, and they fixed the sum for which the trustee should find security, but they did not decide upon the sufficiency of the caution. That seems to have been not so much a mistake or accident as a deliberate failure by the creditors to comply with one of the requisites of section 72 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. On the proceedings being reported to the Sheriff he refused to confirm the trustee. Matters have since apparently been at a deadlock and nothing has been done for, roughly speaking, seven years. The creditors, apparently, have not cared to face the expense of getting matters put into order. The bankrupt, on the other hand, cannot get his discharge in the ordinary way, because he cannot get a report from the trustee, which under the statute is a condition precedent to a discharge in the ordinary way being granted. He, therefore, comes to us and asks for his discharge. It is true that in the petition he asks a good deal more; he asks us to declare the sequestration to be at an end, and to declare the petitioner reinvested in his estates, and further to grant warrant for recording the deliverance in the Register of Sequestrations and in the Register of Inhibitions. That part of the prayer was not, however, insisted in by Mr Menzies,—I think quite properly,—and will not be granted.

This unhappy person has been under the ban of sequestration for something like seven years. The respondent's counsel suggests that the proper remedy in these circumstances is not a petition of this nature, or at least is not this petition, but is for the bankrupt, I suppose at his own expense, to get a trustee duly appointed and confirmed, and then go

[1] MacDuff v. Baird, (1892) 20 R. 101.
[2] 20 R. 600.
[3] Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 140.
[4] 2 Macph. 1216, at p. 1218.

through the whole machinery of sequestration down to claiming the desired discharge if he can get it. That is what the respondent indicates in his answers as "the appropriate procedure for obtaining a discharge under the Bankruptcy Statutes . . . provided by the said statutes." I do not think that in the circumstances that would be an appropriate, or a right and equitable, course to adopt. Nor do I think that any good purpose would be served by making a remit, as was done in a previous case, to the Accountant of Court; and Mr Hamilton did not satisfy me that his client would be any better off if such a course were taken, or that he has any sufficient interest to press for it. In the very peculiar circumstances of this case,—because I think it is a very peculiar one, and not on all fours with any case of which I am aware,—I think the proper and the just course will be to grant the prayer of the petition so far as it relates to the discharge, but no further.

Lord Salvesen.—I am very clearly of the same opinion. I think this is a case for the exercise of the nobile officium of the Court, because the Bankruptcy Statutes provide no means by which this petitioner can obtain a discharge in his sequestration. The position in which he finds himself is due entirely to the failure of his creditors to proceed with the sequestration; they appointed a trustee but they did not take steps to ensure that sufficient caution should be found by the trustee; and accordingly the Sheriff refused to declare the trustee elected. If the creditors had had any genuine desire to go on with the sequestration they ought to have presented a petition to this Court, or to some other Court having jurisdiction, and there is no doubt that they would then have been able to put the sequestration on a proper footing. They have not chosen to do so, and for the very obvious reason, which is stated in the answers, that they do not believe there are any assets in this sequestration which will justify the expense of the necessary proceedings for their distribution. That being so, they are not entitled to maintain the sequestration against the petitioner, and he, I think, is well warranted in coming to this Court and asking that now after the lapse of seven years he should be granted his discharge.

It is a totally different matter to say that he should be reinvested in his estates; although it may be that if there is any asset which originally vested in the sequestration the petitioner might at some future period take that up on the footing that the whole of the creditors had abandoned this asset. But that is not a matter which falls to be disposed of now, and Mr Hamilton's client, who is a creditor, might have the strongest objection to any such inference being drawn, seeing that one of the assets which is said to exist in the sequestration is a claim against himself. I accordingly appreciate entirely the motive of the respondent in opposing this petition as it was originally framed; but in so far as it is limited to the crave that we should discharge the bankrupt I am prepared to grant it.

I agree with your Lordship in the chair in holding that it would be a futile proceeding to remit the case for inquiry by the Accountant of Court. There may be many cases in which that is the appropriate course,

Jan. 6, 1914.

Aitken v. Robson.

Lord Salvesen.

but the penalty that the Court is in the habit of imposing upon a bankrupt, who is not able to prove that the bankruptcy was caused by circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible, is merely to postpone the time at which the discharge shall take effect. After seven years I cannot imagine that any further penalty would be imposed upon this bankrupt, whatever his conduct may have been; and as to this matter we are left entirely in doubt, because there is no averment by the respondent of a positive kind to the effect that the bankrupt was responsible—culpably responsible—for the state of his affairs. On these grounds I agree with your Lordship.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion. It may be true, as the respondent says, that the present petition is not the only method by which the petitioner could attain the end he naturally seeks, namely, to get his discharge. He could adopt the procedure that was followed in MacDuff v. Baird,[1] namely, to get a trustee appointed to take up the whole matter of new. That procedure, however, seems to me unnecessary, because while it would cause great expense to the petitioner it would serve no interest of the respondent, and the creditors, other than the respondent, have not appeared to oppose.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find the petitioner entitled to his discharge: Therefore discharge him accordingly of all debts and obligations contracted by him or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration of his estates, and decern: Quoad ultra dismiss the petition."

R. D. C. M'Kechnie, Solicitor—Robson & M'Lean, W.S.—Agents.

No. 31.

Jan. 9, 1914.

Edwin L. Grant, Pursuer (Appellant).—A. M. Mackay.
John Fleming & Company, Limited, Defenders (Respondents).—Horne, K.C.—J. G. Jameson.

Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

Reparation—Negligence—Property—Common stair—Duty of proprietor to provide safe access—Child.

Process—Proof or jury trial—Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII. cap. 51), sec. 30.

A father brought an action in the Sheriff Court against the proprietor of a tenement for damages for injuries sustained by his pupil daughter, who, while on her way to visit a companion who lived in the tenement, had fallen from the common stair. The pursuer averred that, at the point at which his child had fallen, the balustrade on the stair was not of sufficient height for the protection of children, and also that one of the uprights of the balustrade was wanting and there was a gap sufficient for a child to fall through. He averred that his child fell either through the gap or over the insufficient balustrade; and that the defenders were in breach of their duty as proprietors in failing to provide an access to the houses on the stair which should be safe for the inmates and their visitors, including children.

Held (diss. the Lord President) that the pursuer had stated a relevant case for inquiry as to whether the defenders had discharged their duty to use all reasonable care to provide a safe access. Jan. 9, 1914.

[1] 20 R. 101.

Opinion, per the Lord President, that the duty of one having the control of premises is the same towards children as towards adults. Opinion reserved per Lord Skerrington. Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

Held further that the case was unsuitable for jury trial; and cause remitted back to the Sheriff for proof.

1st Division. Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

In April 1913 Edwin L. Grant, labourer in Aberdeen, brought an action in the Sheriff Court there, as tutor and administrator-in-law for his pupil daughter, Agnes Grant, against John Fleming & Company, Limited, in which he claimed £100 as damages for personal injuries sustained by her.

The defenders were proprietors of certain properties in Links Street, Aberdeen, including No. 18 thereof, and the pursuer averred:—(Cond. 2) "The said properties . . . have back stairs leading up to the first floor of the houses. Said stairs are made of stone and cement, with iron railings and banisters, and on the 17th day of October 1912, and for some time prior thereto, the iron railing on the back stair of No. 18 Links Street was insufficient and defective, and unsafe for the use of the public, and, particularly, for children. In particular, the said iron railing or balustrade on said back stair was, at the turn of the stair at or near where the child fell over as aftermentioned, only 2 feet in height, and thus afforded an insufficient guard for the protection of children using the stair, and, in addition, one of the iron balusters was awanting from the balustrade at or near the point mentioned, allowing a gap in the balustrade sufficient for a child to fall through, and in consequence of said defects, or one or other of them, the child fell as aftermentioned." (Cond. 3) "On or about said date the pursuer's daughter Mary Agnes Grant, aged four years, called at the house 18 Links Street aforesaid, to ask her companion Dorothy Christie, who lived there (a girl about the same age as pursuer's daughter), to come out to play with her, and was coming out of said house 18 Links Street aforesaid along with said Dorothy Christie when, owing to the defective state of the stair railing of said stair, which is a common stair, forming the only access to the tenements in said house 18 Links Street, the said Mary Agnes Grant fell either through the gap or over the insufficient balustrade from the stone steps on to the concreted ground below, severely and permanently injuring her head. Defenders' averments that the child was climbing on the stair railing, and that the accident was due to her fault or negligence, are denied. . . ." (Cond. 5) "It is the defenders' duty, as proprietors of the property in question, to provide accesses to the various floors of their buildings which are safe for the inmates and members of the public visiting or frequenting the houses, including children, of whom there are a large number residing in and near the said property, and in respect of their failure to provide such safe access to the property in question, the defenders are at fault, and are liable in reparation to pursuer as tutor and administrator-in-law for his daughter for the injuries she has received."

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer's child having been injured through the fault and negligence of the defenders as condescended on, pursuer is entitled to the damages claimed as tutor and administrator-in-law for his said daughter, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is irrelevant.

Jan. 9, 1914.

Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

(2) Pursuer's averments are insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (3) The accident was caused, or materially contributed to, by the child's fault or negligence.

On 29th October 1913 the Sheriff-substitute (Young) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer required the case to be remitted to the Court of Session, and proposed an issue of fault in ordinary form for the trial of the cause before a jury.

The case was heard on 6th January 1914 before the First Division (without Lord Johnston), when counsel for the respondents objected to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments, and argued;—(1) This was not a case where the maxim res ipsa loquitur applied. Here it was necessary to aver specific fault on the part of the defenders as the cause of the accident,[1] and the pursuer had failed to do so. He had merely averred two alternative causes, without specifying to which the accident was to be attributed; and even these did not exhaust the possibilities of the case. The child might, for instance, have been sliding down the banister and lost its balance, and thus fallen over. (2) There was no averment that the child was on the stair by invitation of the defenders. The child was in fact a mere licensee, and was in the same position as an adult licensee, to whom the defenders owed no duty of protection from an obvious danger, such as was the alleged defect in the balustrade here.[2] (3) The height of the balustrade had been the same throughout its existence, and it was not averred that any complaint had ever been made to the defenders as proprietors of any fault in its condition, either as to height or as to a missing baluster. Responsibility for its condition, therefore, could not be brought home to the defenders, but really rested upon the occupiers of the houses on the stair, who had failed to make any complaint.[3] (4) In any event the pursuer of such an action as the present could not be heard to aver fault generally in order that he might ultimately select a particular fault upon which to rest his case before a jury. Accordingly, if the case were to go to trial at all, it should be remitted to the Sheriff for proof,[4] and that, not only in respect of the difficult questions of law involved, but also on the separate ground that the alleged injury was not of a serious nature.

Argued for the appellant;—(1) On a question of relevancy it was enough that the averments in support of the weaker alternative were sufficient to support the conclusions of the action.[5] Further, the verdict of a jury could competently be sought upon alternative grounds

---

[1] Wakelin v. London and South-Western Railway Co., (1886) 12 App. Cas. 41.

[2] Kennedy v. Shotts Iron Co., Limited, 1913 S. C. 1143, Lord Mackenzie, at pp. 1150-1, Lord Ormidale, at p. 1147; Burchell v. Hickisson, (1880) 50 L. J., Q. B. 101, Lindley, J., at p. 102, Lopes, J., at p. 103; Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Limited, [1913] 1 K. B. 398, Farwell, L. J., at p. 407, Hamilton, L. J., at p. 414; Mechan v. Watson, 1907 S. C. 25, Lord M'Laren, at pp. 27-8; Bevan on Negligence, (3rd ed.) i. 452. Lord Mackenzie referred to Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow, 1908 S. C. 1034, and Gibson v. Glasgow Police Commissioners, (1893) 20 R. 466.

[3] Mechan v. Watson, 1907 S. C. 25, Lord Kinnear, at p. 29; M'Martin v. Hannay, (1872) 10 Macph. 411; Cameron v. Young, 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7; Cavalier v. Pope, [1906] A. C. 428.

[4] Kennedy v. Bruce, 1907 S. C. 845, Lord Ardwall, at pp. 848-9.

[5] Hope v. Hope's Trustees, (1898) 1 F. (H. L.) 1, Lord Watson, at p. 3.

of action, e.g., in an action of reduction of a will on the ground either of facility and circumvention or of incapacity. Here the pursuer's child having been found injured by a fall below a point on the defenders' common stair at which there were two defects as averred, a jury might be asked to draw the reasonable inference that the accident was due to one of these defects. (2) The defenders were in fault for neglecting their duty to provide for the safety of the stair as an access to their houses. They were not entitled to leave it in a condition which exposed members of the public who might use it (including children) to any risks, whether concealed or unconcealed. (3) The cases of Cameron v. Young[1] and Cavalier v. Pope[2] were distinguishable from the present case, because they were actions upon contract, and were at the instance of strangers to the contract. The former action had been discussed judicially, and had not been found to exclude an action based upon fault such as was here alleged,[3] and such fault afforded a good ground of action in respect of injuries attributable thereto.[4] The cases of Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow[5] and Mechan v. Watson[6] were also distinguishable, because the scope of the decision in the former case could not be extended to apply to a property of a different nature from that which was there dealt with; and the decision in the latter, which proceeded upon knowledge on the part of a tenant who was suing, did not affect the question of the defenders' liability to a member of the public who could have no knowledge of the defective state of the premises.[7] The case of Burchell[8] was distinguishable, because the child injured there had no right to be upon the stair; and the case of Latham[9] did not affect the present, because it proceeded upon a consideration of points of English law as to the position of a licensee. In Scotland one who had possession and control was responsible for the safety of such an access as that in question.[10] The pursuer had averred here both original insufficiency of construction, and also supervening defect of long standing. His record contained all the averments desiderated by the Court in the case of M'Martin v. Hannay,[11] and also those judicially recognised in the recent case of Kennedy,[12] a case decided since the record in this action was closed. (4) The law applicable to the case was not doubtful, and the injuries suffered were serious; accordingly there was no reason for remitting it to the Sheriff for proof, and issues for a trial by jury should be allowed.

At advising on 9th January 1914,—

Lord President.—In this case the pursuer's daughter, a child of four years of age, fell through or over the railing upon a common stair leading

---

[1] 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7. [2] [1906] A. C. 428.
[3] Mellon v. Henderson, 1913 S. C. 1207, Lord Hunter, at p. 1209-10.
[4] Kennedy v. Bruce, 1907 S. C. 845.
[5] 1908 S. C. 1034. [6] 1907 S. C. 25.
[7] Fulton v. Anderson, (1884) 22 S. L. R. 100; Miller v. Hancock, [1893] 2 Q. B. 177, Bowen, L. J., at p. 181.
[8] 50 L. J., Q. B. 101. [9] [1913] 1 K. B. 398.
[10] Kennedy v. Shotts Iron Co., Limited, 1913 S. C. 1143, Lord Mackenzie, at p. 1151.
[11] 10 Macph. 411.
[12] 1913 S. C. 1143, per Lord Mackenzie, at pp. 1151 and 1153.

Jan. 9, 1914.

Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

to a house or houses in Aberdeen, and sustained serious personal injury. This action is brought against the proprietors of the property in order to recover damages for the injury so sustained. It is, of course, conceded that the defenders qua proprietors are not liable in damages. But then it is alleged on record that the stair was a common stair leading to a number of tenements, and, accordingly, that the defenders ought to be assumed to have had control and possession, and are therefore liable in damages to anyone lawfully using the stair if the injured person can aver and prove fault or negligence on the part of the defenders. This action rests exclusively upon fault. It is so set out in the initial writ and in the only plea in law, and in the proposed issue which we are asked here to approve the question is pointedly put, "Was the pursuer's child injured in consequence of the fault of the defenders." The question we are now to consider is whether there are averments on this record relevant to infer fault and consequent liability on the part of the defenders. I am of opinion, for my part, that there are not.

Apparently the child was lawfully using the stair at the time when the mishap occurred. She was not a trespasser. She was visiting a companion who resided in one of the houses reached by the common stair. In cases such as this the proprietor has a duty to all who are lawfully using his property to take every reasonable precaution to ensure their safety against injury. The law was thus stated as far back as the year 1866 in the well-known case of Indermaur v. Dames,[1] where Mr Justice Willes, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, said: "With respect to such a visitor at least"—and this child was a visitor on this occasion—"we consider it settled law, that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger, which he knows or ought to know." And in almost similar language Lord Kinnear, in the case of Mechan v. Watson,[2] laid down the law thus: "The theory is that occupiers of premises—not necessarily owners, but occupiers—are bound to take reasonable care that the persons whom they, either expressly or by implication, invite to enter premises are exposed to no dangers which require more than ordinary care on their part to guard against. The principle is that such visitors using reasonable care for their own safety are entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger of which he knows or ought to know."

My opinion is that according to the law of Scotland the duty is exactly the same on the part of a proprietor whatsoever be the object or purpose for which the property is being used, provided it is being lawfully used. I draw no distinctions between the objects which different visitors may have in using the property. The one consideration, in my opinion, is: are they using the property lawfully or unlawfully? And further, the duty of a proprietor is, I think, exactly the same whether the injured person is an adult or a child. The law on that subject is nowhere better stated, I think, than in the judgment of Lord Justice Farwell in the case of Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Limited,[1] where he says: "I am not aware of any case that imposes any greater liability on the owner towards children than towards adults: the exceptions apply to all alike and the adult is as much entitled to protection as the child. If the child is too young to understand danger, the licence ought not to be held to extend to such a child unless accompanied by a competent guardian." And the law was laid down in similar terms, in the opinion of Lord Kinnear, in the case which was cited to us of Stevenson v. Corporation of Glasgow.[2]

[1] (1866) L. R., 1 C. P. 274.

[2] 1907 S. C. 25, at pp. 29-30.

Having then in view the rule of law which lays upon the proprietor the duty of taking every reasonable precaution to ensure the safety of all who are lawfully using his premises, I turn to consider whether the pursuer in this case has relevantly averred a breach of that duty, in other words, fault and negligence, without proving which it is impossible for him to recover damages. It is said upon the record that this mishap was the result of one or other of two causes. It is said that either the child fell through a gap in the railing due to the absence of a baluster, or, alternatively, the child fell over the railing in consequence of its insufficient height. It is averred that the railing afforded an insufficient guard for the protection of children. It is carefully not averred that the railing was of insufficient height for the protection of the lieges at large. The averment is confined exclusively to children.

Now, if both of these grounds of liability were relevantly averred, then, in my opinion, the pursuer would be entitled to have the case tried, even although these two did not exhaust all the possible causes of the child's fall, for that would be a matter of evidence. If, on the other hand, both or either of these grounds of fault is not relevantly averred, then, in my opinion, this action cannot go further.

I turn, therefore, to the former of the two alternatives in order to see whether fault is relevantly averred. Now, the only averment is that there was a baluster lacking at the time when the mishap occurred. It is not averred—and I take it, inasmuch as this record has been the subject-matter of careful consideration in the Sheriff Court, having been once, at all events, amended, it is intentionally not averred—that the defenders, the proprietors of the property, knew or ought to have known that the baluster was amissing. It is not alleged—as in every other case it has been—that there was a lack of reasonable inspection, that there was no inspection at all, or that inspection was made and information of danger given and disregarded. The averment upon the record is perfectly consistent with the punctilious discharge by the proprietors of this property of their duty to all those who were lawfully using the property. In short, there is here a bare averment that there was, on the occasion in question, a baluster lacking, and then we are asked to infer liability on the part of the proprietors.

Now, if the proprietors qua proprietors are not responsible, if they are not insurers of the safety of those who are lawfully using the property, then, in my opinion, it is insufficient to aver and prove merely the absence of a baluster without going further and saying that it was known to the

[1] [1913] 1 K. B. 398, at p. 407.

[2] 1908 S. C. 1034.

Jan. 9, 1914.

Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

Ld. President.

defenders, or that they ought to have known of the defect, and that they neglected to have it remedied. The authority which was cited to us in support of the contrary proposition, to wit, M'Martin v. Hannay,[1] does not seem to me to support the argument, for, when that case is examined, it will be found that one of the essential and vital facts upon which the judgment rested was that complaint of the defect was made to the proprietors and that they neglected to attend to it. That appears very clearly in the opinion of Lord Cowan where he thus sums up the facts upon which the judgment of the Court rested[2]: "(1) that the state of disrepair had continued for at least six months; (2) that the gap was quite large enough to permit of a child falling through; (3) that the stone of the step in which the banister had been fixed was itself worn away, which would more readily lead to a child missing its foot; and (4)"—and this is vital—"that the defender's factor and overseer had been warned of the state of matters, and that nothing was done to put the railing into a safe state till after the fatal occurrence had taken place." My reading of the meaning and effect of the judgment in M'Martin v. Hannay[1] is confirmed by the opinion of Lord M'Laren in Mechan v. Watson,[3] in which his Lordship, commenting upon and distinguishing the case of M'Martin,[1] said the ground of liability in that case "which is very distinctly stated in Lord Cowan's opinion, was that one of the rails of the stair had been displaced, leaving a gap through which a child had fallen, and that the landlord's factor had been called on to repair it, but had done nothing." And Lord Kinnear, summarising M'Martin v. Hannay's case,[1] comes to a similar conclusion. It appears to me then, that it is not sufficient, in a case such as this, to allege merely that a baluster is awanting. We have no allegation that the stair as originally constructed was without it—merely that a baluster is awanting—and yet the Court and the jury are asked to infer liability on the part of the proprietors who, for aught that appears, have done everything to ensure the complete safety of everybody who has a lawful right to use their property.

If I am right in this view, it is needless to go further and to examine the second ground of liability. But my opinion is that the second ground of liability is in no better position than the first. The second ground of liability is that the railing was of insufficient height, and that it did not afford a sufficient guard for the protection of children using the stair. That is not an allegation of any failure to repair or failure to inspect, or of allowing the property to get into a state of disrepair. It is merely an allegation, at the best, of original faulty construction. Now, it is not said that this insufficiency of height will be any danger whatever to adults. It is not said that the construction is unusual. It is not said that any complaint was ever made by any tenant of the property. It is not said that any accident ever occurred on account of the insufficient height, and it is not said that the insufficient height of the railing was a concealed danger. Obviously it was open and patent to everybody who was using the property—as open and patent to tenants and visitors as it was to the proprietors themselves. In the absence of any averment of fault or neglect, and with only a simple statement that the railing was of insufficient height to protect children, I am of opinion that there is no allegation relevant to infer liability on the part of the defenders, or to lead us to the conclusion that they were neglectful of the duty imposed upon them to take every reasonable precaution for the safety of those who were lawfully using their property.

[1] 10 Macph. 411. [2] Ibid, at p. 412.
[3] 1907 S. C. 25, at p. 29.

I am confirmed in this opinion by the judgment of this Division of the Court in the case of Mechan v. Watson.[1] In that case, which was decided on relevancy, the allegation was that there was an unusually great interval between the side of the wall and the first of the uprights in a railing, which in consequence left a gap so wide that a child fell through and was injured. Now, the Court held in that case that the averments were insufficient to infer liability on the part of the defenders, and that on more than one ground: in the first place, on the ground of lack of specification; and in the second place (it was a tenant's child that had fallen), on the ground that the tenant was just as much to blame as the landlord; but further, the Court held that the allegation of fault there was wholly insufficient in respect that the insufficiency of the railing was as open and patent to visitors as it was to tenants of the property. For aught that appears in the present case the tenants are perfectly satisfied, as well satisfied as the landlord, with the height of the railing; and it appears to me to be a strong thing to hold that visitors were entitled to complain of an open and patent insufficiency if tenants were precluded from complaining, and, indeed, stated no ground of complaint. Now, when I turn to the opinions expressed in Mechan v. Watson I find that Lord Pearson very clearly states the second ground of liability to which I have adverted, in the following terms[2]:—"This is not the case of an access, originally safe, being allowed to go out of repair. The fault alleged is in the original design and construction of the railing, and that is a matter which had never been made the subject of a complaint, and was as patent to the pursuer, the tenant, and to all who used the staircase, as it was to the landlord." It is not said that there was any concealed source of danger here or any risk which was not as patent to the visitor using the staircase as to the tenant or the proprietor himself. And, keeping in view that the extent of the proprietor's liability to a child is exactly the same as the extent of his liability to an adult, I am of opinion that this second ground is as irrelevant as the first ground upon which fault is sought to be rested.

If your Lordships take a different view from me on the question of relevancy of averment here, then I am very clearly of opinion that this is not the type of case which ought to go to a jury. I think it is on many grounds wholly unsuitable for trial by jury. It resembles closely two or three other cases which, in this Division and the other Division of the Court, have been regarded as unsuitable for jury trial, and which have been remitted to the Sheriff Court for investigation of the facts. Accordingly,

[1] 1907 S. C. 25.

[2] Ibid, at p. 30.

Jan. 9, 1914.

Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

if your Lordships should be of a different opinion from me upon the question of relevancy, I should propose that this case should be remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed in terms of the interlocutor which is now before us.

LORD MACKENZIE.—In this case the Sheriff-substitute has allowed a proof before answer. I think he followed a course which was safe and proper in the circumstances. I should have been content to allow the case to go back without laying down any propositions in law, but in consequence of what your Lordship in the chair has said I think it right briefly to explain my reasons.

I am averse, in a case of this kind, to going into the law on a question of relevancy. We are here dealing with a branch of the law which has been subjected to great refinement. I may, in justification of that statement, refer to the case of Indermaur v Dames,[1] cited by your Lordship as applicable to the facts averred in the present case. If, however, the passage which was read by your Lordship from Willes, J., is taken along with the context, it is plain that the visitors there referred to were those only who visited the premises on purposes of business. That is made quite clear in the opinion of Lord Kinnear in the case of Stevenson,[2] and it was pointed out to us by Mr Jameson in his argument. Here we are dealing not with a person who was on business but with a child who had gone to call on a companion. I say that in passing as illustrating the care which is necessary before it is attempted to define what law is applicable to cases of this description.

In my opinion both sides were wrong in the contentions they submitted to us. I think that the defenders were wrong in taking advantage of the pursuer's removal of the case for the purpose of asking a jury trial to say that the action is irrelevant; and I think the pursuer was wrong in bringing the case here and asking for a jury trial, because I agree with your Lordship that it is unsuitable for jury trial.

Now, what is the ground of action here? As your Lordship has pointed out it is laid on fault. It is so pleaded, and that was the only case which was argued. There cannot be fault unless you start with a duty. What was the duty? There was no duty ex dominio solo (a phrase used by Lord Gifford in the case of Moffat & Company v. Park,[3] which I took occasion to repeat in the recent case of Kennedy v. Shotts Iron Company[4]). Therefore you must aver and offer to prove that there was a duty. Now, it is not a matter of controversy what the duty is. The only controversy, as I gather, is whether the pursuer in this case has used exactly appropriate language to define the duty. It is said that condescendence 5, if read critically, might spell an obligation to ensure or guarantee. Now, language exactly the same as that employed in condescendence 5 has been used in previous cases to define the duty incumbent on the owner who is left in possession and control of a common stair. It is a duty to use all reasonable care and diligence. Exactly the same language was used by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, in the case of Miller v. Hancock.[1] The same duty was recognised in the case of M'Martin v. Hannay,[2] and in Kennedy v. Shotts Iron Company.[3] There is no question that the duty is to provide and to keep a reasonably safe entrance and exit for the tenants of the premises. There is a proper averment in the present case of what the duty is.

[1] L. R., 1 C. P. 274. [2] 1908 S. C. 1034. [3] (1877) 5 R. 13.
[4] 1913 S. C. 1143.

Is there a sufficient averment of a breach of that duty? It is said that the landlords failed in their duty because they failed to provide a rail of sufficient height, that is to say, there was a fault in construction. It is also said that they failed in their duty because they failed to keep the railing, such as it was, in a safe condition. It is said that the railing was a cause of danger because one of the uprights was wanting. I should have thought that, having stated the duty and then having explained the breach in those terms, that that constituted a relevant case—a relevant case when it is averred that, in consequence of one or other of those defects, the child met with an accident. I do not dwell upon the argument with which the respondents opened that, there being an alternative ground of action here, that would not do in the circumstances of the case. I understand your Lordship has no difficulty about that, nor have I. It appears to me that the pursuer is entitled to have the facts inquired into. If it appears in the course of the proof that the landlords used all reasonable care, or that there was no duty to this particular child in regard to this particular danger, then it may be that the pursuer will fail in his case. But I cannot, for my own part, see how, without knowing the facts, we can assume either the one thing or the other in regard to such a matter.

I do not think that the case of Mechan,[4] upon which your Lordship lays stress, really meets the difficulty in the present case. That was an action in which the tenant was pursuing. This is an action in which a member of the public is suing for injury to his child. Now, it may very well be that where you have got a tenant living on the stair, and seeing it day by day, then, in the absence of any averment that he complained, the result may be, as Lord Pearson put it in the case of Mechan,[4] that the fault is just as much on the part of the pursuer as on the part of the defender. But how can that apply to the case of a member of the public, who, for aught we know, knew nothing about the state of the stair herself, and whose father may have been equally ignorant? That a member of the public has a right lawfully to be upon the staircase does not admit of doubt. Whether we are, in the law of Scotland, to draw a distinction further than between those who are lawfully and those who are unlawfully upon the premises I am not at present disposed to say, because that is a matter which, I think, would require careful consideration, and I do not think it is suitable, on the present occasion, to go further into that matter. In Mechan[4] Lord Kinnear pointed out that, if the rail was insufficient, the defect was a defect in construction which was perfectly obvious to the tenant. It may turn out, if there is a proof in the present case, that the defect was obvious. It may turn out that it was not. Cases

[1] [1893] 2 Q. B. 177. [2] 10 Macph. 411. [3] 1913 S. C. 1143. [4] 1907 S. C. 25.

Jan. 9, 1914.

Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

Lord Mackenzie.

in which the owner of property has been held not liable for accidents to children who fell into ponds or streams are not necessarily applicable to the case in hand. Where a person passing (with permission) over private property falls into a pond, you may start with a totally different obligation as regards the owner. You may start with no obligation to fence the pond or stream. But, in the present case, you necessarily start with an obligation on the owner of the property to provide a staircase which shall be safe so far as he, by reasonable care and inspection, can secure. The duty and the right thence emerging are different in the two cases, because, although there is no contractual right between a member of the public using the staircase and the landlord, yet the right which is vested in the member of the public does arise out of the contract which has been entered into between the tenant and the landlord, it being an implied condition of that contract that those visiting the tenant shall have access to the tenant by a staircase which is reasonably safe and secure.

There were several English cases cited to us. In these the facts were ascertained. As regards the position of a child and an adult, I venture to refer to what I have said in the case of Stevenson.[1] Unless fault on the part of a defender is the proximate cause of the accident, then, whether the person injured is an adult or a child he is not liable.

I regret having been obliged to go into the questions of law which I should rather have left over until the facts were ascertained. For the reasons stated I am of opinion that the order for proof made by the Sheriff-substitute should stand, and that the case should go back to him.

Lord Skerrington.—I agree with Lord Mackenzie in thinking that, as a matter of averment and pleading, the pursuer has said all that is necessary in order to entitle him to an inquiry into the facts.

I further agree with the observations which Lord Mackenzie has made in regard to the legal principles applicable to cases of this kind. But I desire to reserve my opinion upon one question, namely, whether it is strictly accurate to say, as a general proposition of law, that the duty of the person who has control of premises is precisely the same towards adults whom he permits to use his property as it is towards children. I may refer to the opinion of Lord Atkinson in the case of Cooke v. Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland,[2] where he states that "the duty the owner of premises owes to the persons to whom he gives permission to enter upon them must, it would appear to me, be measured by his knowledge, actual or imputed, of the habits, capacities, and propensities of those persons."

As regards the question whether this case should be tried by a jury or not, I agree with both your Lordships in thinking that it ought to be tried by a Judge, but I desire to say that I come to this conclusion merely upon the specialties of this particular case and in view of the fact that there is a difference of opinion among the Judges of this Court as to the legal principles which ought to be applied. I do not think that there is anything in this particular type of action which ought to deprive a pursuer of his statutory right to have his case tried by a jury. Jan. 9, 1914. Grant v. John Fleming & Co., Limited.

[1] 1908 S. C. 1034.

[2] [1909] A. C. 229, at p. 238.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor in the following terms:—"Having considered the closed record and heard counsel for the parties on the defenders' motion to retransmit the cause and on their objections to the relevancy, repel said objections, sustain said motion, disallow the issue, No. 14 of process, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 29th October 1913 in so far as it assigns a diet of proof: Quoad ultra affirm said interlocutor and remit the cause to him to proceed as accords."

HILL MURRAY & BRYDON, S.S.C.—BOYD, JAMESON, & YOUNG, W.S.—Agents.

JOHN CHISHOLM, Pursuer (Respondent).—Lord Adv. Munro—A. M. Stuart.
JAMES GRANT, Defender (Reclaimer).—G. Watt, K.C.—Macquisten.

No. 32.
Jan. 10, 1914.
Chisholm v. Grant.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Allegation of professional incapacity—"Quack."

In an action of damages for slander at the instance of C., the superintendent of a district lunatic asylum (who was admittedly not a qualified medical practitioner), complaining that the defender had said of him, "What does that mannie C. know about treating lunatics? He is just a quack. We will sack him yet," held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue with the innuendo that these words represented "that he was unfit for his duties as superintendent, that he did not know his work, was not properly qualified for the work in which he was engaged, and ought to be dismissed from his post."

ON 4th September 1913 John Chisholm, Banff, brought an action of damages for slander against James Grant, solicitor and town-clerk, Banff. 2D DIVISION. Lord Dewar.

The pursuer averred that he was appointed superintendent of the Banff District Asylum on 21st September 1910. (Cond. 13) "On or about 16th December 1912 the defender, at Ladysbridge Railway Station, shouted in a loud voice, 'What does that mannie Chisholm know about treating lunatics? He is just a quack. We will sack him yet.' The said statement was made in the hearing of, among others, Mr F. G. Watt, station-master at the said station, and Dr Ledingham, Medical Officer of Health, Banff, and was addressed to Mr Alexander Murray, bank-agent, Banff, and a former member of the District Lunacy Board. These statements are false and calumnious, and the defender, when making them, deliberately and maliciously raised his voice in order to make himself heard by everyone about the station. The said statement was of and concerning the pursuer, and was false and calumnious. It represented, and was intended to represent, that the pursuer was unfit for his duties as superintendent of the asylum, that he did not know his work, and was not properly qualified for the work in which he was engaged, and ought to be dismissed from his post. The said false and calumnious statements were so understood by the said persons who heard them."

The pursuer also averred other instances of alleged slander with which this report is not concerned.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Chisholm v. Grant.

He proposed, inter alia, an issue based on the words quoted in cond. 13, which he innuendoed as meaning "that the pursuer was unfit for his duties as superintendent of the asylum, that he did not know his work, was not properly qualified for the work in which he was engaged, and ought to be dismissed from his post."

On 21st November 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Dewar) pronounced an interlocutor, inter alia, approving of this issue.*

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Ormidale) on 9th and 10th January 1914.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The issue relating to the conversation on 16th December should be disallowed. The words complained of were not slanderous in themselves, and would not support the innuendo placed on them. They meant, and could only mean, looking to the context, that the pursuer was unable to give lunatics medical treatment, because he was not a qualified doctor. It was admittedly true that he was not a qualified doctor and, though it might be unkind to publish the fact, it was not a slander, and did not pass the limits of fair comment on a man in the pursuer's position. The word "quack" was invariably associated with the idea of a person practising a profession without the proper qualification—such as a quack doctor[1] or a quack lawyer.[2]

Counsel for the respondent were not called upon to reply on this point.

Lord Dundas.—[After dealing with other issues with which this report is not concerned]—As regards the fourth issue also I think the Lord Ordinary is right. That issue proposes to ask the jury whether the defender said about the pursuer:—"'What does that mannie Chisholm know about treating lunatics? He is just a quack. We will sack him yet,' or words of like import and effect, meaning thereby that the pursuer was unfit for his duties as superintendent of the asylum, that he did not know his work, was not properly qualified for the work in which he was engaged, and ought to be dismissed from his post." The defender says that issue should not be allowed, because it is quite clear that these words can only mean, and did only mean, that the pursuer, not being a duly qualified medical man (which is admitted), was in that sense a quack and in that sense a person not duly qualified to treat insane people; and this, the

* "Opinion.— . . . The fourth issue is in a different position, and I am of opinion that it ought to be approved. I think the words, 'What does that mannie Chisholm know about treating lunatics? He is just a quack. We will sack him yet,' will reasonably bear the meaning which the pursuer seeks to attach to them, in view of the facts and circumstances averred on record. The defender argued that the meaning which he intended to convey, and did convey, was that the pursuer was not a duly qualified medical practitioner. That may be so. I express no opinion on that matter. All I decide is that they are reasonably susceptible of the meaning which the pursuer suggests. It will be for the jury to decide, after hearing evidence, which contention is correct. I accordingly allow this issue."

[1] Collins v. Carnegie, (1834) 1 A. & E. 695; Long v. Chubb, (1831) 5 C. & P. 55; Dakhyl v. Labouchere, [1908] 2 K. B. 325.

[2] Wakley v. Healey, (1849) 7 C. B. 591.

defender says, is no slander. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that this may have been the meaning, but (like him) I offer no opinion whether it was so or not. "Quack" seems to me to be rather a stupid and vulgar word. I am not sure that anybody knows exactly what he means when he uses it. But I cannot say what the defender asks me to say, viz.: that the meaning which he puts upon the word is the only one that can reasonably be put upon it. I think the case of Dakhyl v. Labouchere,[1] to which we were referred, is a sufficient authority for saying that the word may have more than one meaning. I am not prepared to hold that the meaning put upon it by the pursuer is not one which may be reasonably put upon it; and, if that meaning is put upon it, I think it would involve damages. The question is—are we entitled to withhold the case from a jury? I think we are not; and accordingly I move your lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Salvesen and Lord Ormidale concurred.

The Court adhered.

J. Ferguson Reekie, S.S.C.—Alex. Morison & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 33.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

The Parish Council of the City Parish of Edinburgh, Pursuers (Respondents).—D.-F. Dickson—J. R. Christie.
The Local Government Board for Scotland, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Sol.-Gen. Morison—Pitman.

Poor—Lunatic pauper—Warrant for removal of pauper to England—Appeal to Local Government Board—Competency—"Residence" of lunatic—Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 5.

The Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, section 5, enacts that, whenever any parish council has obtained a warrant for the removal from any parish in Scotland to England or Ireland of any English-born or Irish-born pauper who has not acquired a settlement by residence in Scotland, an appeal may be taken to the Local Government Board for Scotland if such pauper "shall have resided continuously in such parish for not less than one year before the date of the application for relief," and the Board shall determine whether it is reasonable and proper that such pauper shall be so removed.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Skerrington) that the word "resided," as used in the section, referred merely to bodily presence, and not to intelligent residence, in a particular locality; and accordingly that an appeal was competent in the case of a lunatic pauper who had lived in a Scottish parish (being boarded out at the expense of a relative) for more than a year, although she was insane during the whole period.

Poor—Removal of pauper to England—Finding as to residence in Sheriff's warrant—Poor Removal Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 113), sec. 2.

The Poor Removal Act, 1862, section 2, enacts that a warrant for the removal of a pauper from England to Scotland, or from Scotland to England or Ireland, shall contain "the name of the place in Scotland or England or Ireland (as the case may be) where" the justices or magistrate or Sheriff shall find such person "to have been born, or to have last resided for the space of five years in the case of a poor

[1] [1908] 2 K. B. 325.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

2D DIVISION. Lord Skerrington.

person to be removed to Scotland, and three years in the case of a poor person to be removed to England or Ireland."

Observed (per Lord Dundas) that the residence for three years specified in the section for the case of a removal from Scotland to England is a residence in England and not in Scotland.

ON 10th July 1912 the Parish Council of the City Parish of Edinburgh brought an action against the Local Government Board for Scotland and also, for any interest they might have in the premises, against Mrs Elizabeth Buckle or Scott, the Parish Council of the parish of Falkland, and the Guardians of the Poor of the Union of St Pancras in the city of London. The conclusions of the summons were for declarator "that a warrant or order granted by the Sheriff of the county of Fife, at Cupar-Fife, on the 16th day of May 1911, at the instance of Lawrence Reid, inspector of poor for the parish of Falkland, for the removal, under the provisions of the Poor Removal Act, 1862, of the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott to the Union of St Pancras was properly obtained, and is a good and valid warrant for such removal, and that the defenders the Local Government Board for Scotland have no power to interfere with the operation of the said warrant by virtue of the provisions of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Victoria, cap. 21), or otherwise, and that the said warrant may be put in force notwithstanding any minute or order of the said Board bearing to be made under the provisions of section 5 of the said Act," * and for reduction of "(first) a minute or

---

* The Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict. cap. 21), enacts:—

Sec. 4. "Where an English-born or Irish-born poor person has resided continuously in Scotland for not less than five years (of which not less than one year shall have been continuously in the parish in which he applies for parochial relief), and shall have maintained himself without having recourse to common begging either by himself or his family, and without having received parochial relief, he shall, on thereafter becoming chargeable to any parish in Scotland, be irremovable from Scotland, and shall be maintained by the parish to which he has so become chargeable"—(subject to a proviso as to his ceasing to be chargeable if he shall have acquired a settlement by residence in any other parish in Scotland).

Sec. 5 (1). "Whenever any parish council shall have obtained in terms of the Poor Law Removal Act, 1862, a warrant for the removal from any parish in Scotland to England or Ireland of any English-born or Irish-born poor person who has not acquired a settlement by residence in Scotland, and to whom the immediately preceding section does not apply, such poor person, if he or she shall have resided continuously in such parish for not less than one year before the date of the application for relief (her deceased husband's residence, if necessary, being reckoned as part of her residence in the case of a widow), may, within fourteen days after intimation of the granting of such warrant and of the right to appeal in this subsection mentioned, appeal to the Local Government Board, which Board shall without delay investigate the grounds of such appeal, and determine whether it is reasonable and proper that such poor person shall be so removed. The inspector of poor of the parish whence the poor person is proposed to be removed shall be bound to intimate to the poor person the granting of the warrant and the right of appeal; and no warrant in terms of the Poor Law Removal Act, 1862, shall be carried out until the expiry of the said fourteen days, or, if an appeal is taken, until it has been disposed of by the Board."

(2) "In the case of a poor person as in the preceding subsection men-order of the said Local Government Board for Scotland, dated 4th August 1911, purporting to determine, in accordance with the provisions of section 5 of the said Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, that it was not reasonable or proper that the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott should be removed from the parish of Falkland to St Pancras Union, and to sustain accordingly an appeal at the instance of the Board of Guardians of the Union of St Pancras against her removal; and (second) a minute or order of the said Local Government Board for Scotland, dated 20th May 1912, by which the Board purported to further determine, in terms of powers alleged to be conferred on them by the proviso to section 5 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1898, that the expense of maintenance of the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott should be borne as from the 4th August 1911 by the Parish Councils of Edinburgh and Falkland" in certain proportions.

The pursuers averred, inter alia;—(Cond 5) "Within the area forming the parish of Edinburgh, which is under the administration of the pursuers, there is situated the Royal Edinburgh Asylum, to which insane persons are admitted in considerable numbers from all parts of Great Britain and Ireland. It thus happens that persons who are not natives of, and who have not acquired any settlement in, the parish of Edinburgh live for prolonged periods within the bounds of the parish in said asylum. Questions have arisen between the Local Government Board and the pursuers as to how far, if at all, the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, hereinbefore referred to, are applicable to persons of English or Irish birth who have not acquired any settlement in Scotland, but who, as certified lunatics following upon a warrant of the Sheriff, have been inmates of the said Royal Edinburgh Asylum. There are also cases in which insane persons are boarded out in parishes in Scotland, in virtue of the provisions of the Lunacy Acts applicable to Scotland, and questions have arisen between the Local Government Board and the pursuers as to whether the provisions of the sections before mentioned are applicable to such persons, under circumstances of which the case hereinafter dealt with is typical." (Cond. 6) "A case with which the pursuers question the power of the Board to deal as falling within the scope of the provisions referred to is that of Mrs Elizabeth Buckle or Scott, a pauper lunatic who recently became chargeable to the parish of Falkland. She was born in London, and became chargeable in Leith in June 1871. Being then a lunatic, she was removed to the Royal Edinburgh Asylum. The parish of St Cuthbert's admitted liability in respect of her husband's residential settlement. From 3rd February 1885 to 25th February 1885 she was boarded out by that parish as a pauper lunatic at Kennoway, Windygates, Fife-tioned, the inspector of poor shall also be bound to send by registered letter a notice to the clerk to the board of guardians of the union or parish in England or Ireland named in the warrant of removal, that if they desire they may, within fourteen days after receipt of such notice, appeal to the Local Government Board against the removal, and shall with such notice transmit a copy of the depositions taken before the Sheriff granting the warrant; and if the board of guardians shall so appeal, the Local Government Board shall, without delay, investigate the grounds of such appeal, and determine whether it is reasonable and proper that such poor person shall be so removed. No warrant in terms of the Poor Law Removal Act, 1862, shall be carried out until the expiry of the said fourteen days, or, if an appeal is taken, until it is disposed of by the Board."

---

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

shire. From 25th February 1885 to 11th August 1903 she was boarded out also as a pauper lunatic in the parish of Kettle, Fifeshire, and thereafter, from 11th August 1903 until 8th May 1907, at Freuchie, Falkland. Her husband died in Leith in October 1906. On 8th May 1907, her son having intimated that he would in future support her, her name was taken off the pauper roll, and on 30th May 1907 she was struck off the books of the General Board of Lunacy. From 1st May 1907 until 11th August 1910 she continued to be boarded at the expense of her son at Freuchie, in the parish of Falkland, she being, however, during all that period of unsound mind. Owing to the death of her son, and failure of other means of support, the person with whom she was boarded applied to Falkland parish for relief, which was afforded, and on 10th November 1910 the Poor Law Authority of Falkland made a claim on the pursuers, liability for which the pursuers denied. The Parish Council of Falkland thereupon applied for and obtained a warrant from the Sheriff of the county of Fife and Kinross, sitting at Cupar, Fife, dated 16th May 1911, authorising, in terms of the Poor Removal Act of 1862, the removal of the said pauper lunatic to the St Pancras Union, London. This is the warrant referred to in the summons, and a copy of it is produced.* Against the removal thereby authorised the Guardians of the Poor of St Pancras Union lodged an appeal." (Cond. 7) "Upon consideration of the appeal, the Local Government Board, claiming to act under the provisions of section 5 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, by minute dated 4th August 1911, professed to determine that the 'proposed removal of the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott from the parish of Falkland to St Pancras Union was not reasonable and proper,' and accordingly sustained the appeal of the St Pancras Union Authorities; and by further minute, dated 20th May 1912, the Board further professed, in terms of the powers conferred on them by the proviso of section 5 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, to determine that 'the expense of maintenance of Elizabeth Buckle or Scott should be portioned, as from 4th August 1911, between the Parish Councils of Edinburgh and Falkland in the proportions of—(1) Edinburgh, $\frac{3}{4}\frac{9}{0}$ths (2) Falkland, $\frac{1}{4}\frac{1}{0}$ths.' These minutes are the minutes brought under reduction in this action." (Cond. 8) "The pursuers contend that the warrant or order granted for the removal of the said Mrs Elizabeth Buckle or Scott under the provisions of the Poor Removal (Scotland) Act, 1862, was properly obtained, and that section 4 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, was not applicable so as to render the obtaining of the warrant incompetent. They further maintain that the warrant so obtained is not liable to be set aside or otherwise interfered with by the defenders the Local Government Board for Scotland by virtue of any powers contained in section 5 of that Act or otherwise. The

* The warrant contained the following findings:—"Find that the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott is of the reputed age of sixty-five years; find that the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott last resided for three years in Freuchie, within the parish of Falkland; find that the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott has become, and is now actually chargeable to the Parish Council of the parish of Falkland, and that the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott has not acquired and retained a settlement in Scotland; find that the said Elizabeth Buckle or Scott would not suffer bodily or mental injury by being removed as herein ordered."

Sec. 2 of the Poor Removal Act, 1862, on which the warrant proceeded, is quoted in the rubric.

said pauper is not a person falling within the scope either of section 4 or section 5. From 1871 onwards the said pauper was a person of unsound mind, and was in that mental condition during the whole period she was boarded out under guardianship in the said parish of Falkland. The minutes of the Board professing to sustain the appeal of the Board of Guardians of St Pancras Union against the removal order, and the consequent minute professing to allocate the expense of maintenance between the parish of Edinburgh and the parish of Falkland respectively were ultra vires of the said Local Government Board, and are null and void. . . ."

Of the defenders the Local Government Board for Scotland alone lodged defences. They averred:—(Ans. 6) "Admitted, under reference to the warrant of the Sheriff dated 16th May 1911, and with the explanation that the pauper in question was married in Edinburgh in February 1867, and that for a month in 1885 she was boarded out in Kennoway Parish, Fife, before being moved to Kettle Parish. Explained that, since the raising of the action, the Guardians of the Poor of the Parish of St Pancras have ascertained that the pauper in question was born on 5th February 1845 at St Edward's Yard, Kinnerton Street, in the Parish of St George, Hanover Square, in the St George's Union." (Ans. 7) "Admitted, under reference to the minutes of 4th August 1911 and 20th May 1912, copies of which are produced." (Ans. 8) "Denied that the said pauper is not a person falling within the scope of sections 4 and 5 of the Act of 1898. Admitted that from 1871 onwards she was a lunatic. Denied that the action of the Board complained of was ultra vires. Explained that the Board, in the exercise of the discretion conferred upon them by section 5 of the 1898 Act referred to, sustained the appeal of the Guardians of the Poor of the Union of St Pancras, in the City of London, and apportioned the expense of maintenance of the pauper in question. Explained, further, that pauper lunatics are included in the expression 'poor person' in sections 4 and 5 of the Act of 1898, and that these defenders acted within the powers conferred upon them by said sections when they considered and disposed of the appeal made to them."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, the provisions of sections 4 and 5 thereof not being applicable to the case of English-born or Irish-born persons who are and continue to be lunatics while they live in Scotland, the Local Government Board for Scotland has no right or title to interfere under these sections with warrants, otherwise lawfully obtained, for the removal of such persons under the provision of the Poor Removal Act, 1862, and the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator and to reduction as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) In respect that the expression "poor person" in sections 4 and 5 of the Act of 1898 includes pauper lunatics, these defenders were entitled to receive and sustain the appeal as condescended on, and are entitled to absolvitor.

On 6th December 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Skerrington), after hearing parties in the Procedure Roll, pronounced an interlocutor finding and declaring in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons, and reducing the minutes or orders in terms of the conclusions for reduction.*

---

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are the Parish Council of the City Parish of Edinburgh, and the compearing defenders are the Local Government Board

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division on 11th, 12th, and 16th December 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The appeal to the Local Government Board was competent. The Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1845,[1] sec. 77, the Poor Removal Act, 1862,[2] and secs. 3 to 6 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, formed a code regulating the removal of paupers; and this code was complete in itself. The code dealt with both sane paupers, who could reside in the technical sense of the term, and insane paupers, who could not so reside; and throughout the code the word "reside" was used, as was necessary for its purpose, in its natural sense, viz., as meaning presence in Scotland or in a parish.[3] This accordingly was the sense in which the word was used in sec. 5 of the 1898 Act. The decisions as to the liability of a parish to maintain a pauper which treated the word "reside" as having an established technical signification were not in point in a question as to the

---

for Scotland. The action raises a question of some general interest as to the particular class of cases in which the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict. cap. 21) has conferred upon the Local Government Board a discretionary power to interfere with parish councils which have obtained a warrant for the removal of a pauper from Scotland to England or Ireland. Prior to 1898 the removal of paupers from one parish in Scotland to another was regulated by section 72 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83). The removal of English and Irish paupers to their native land was regulated by section 77 of the same statute, as amended by the Poor Removal Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 113). It seems to have been considered a hardship both on paupers and on boards of guardians that English and Irish paupers, who had resided for a considerable time in Scotland without acquiring a settlement, were liable to removal if a Sheriff or two justices could be persuaded to grant the necessary warrant. It seems also to have been thought that the law as it stood under the Act of 1845 made it too difficult to acquire a settlement by residence, and further, that in certain cases paupers who had a settlement in Scotland ought not to be removed from the parish where they became chargeable to their parish of settlement. The Act of 1898 was passed in order to remedy these evils. The question in the present case is whether the Local Government Board, acting in the assumed exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1898, were entitled to determine that the removal of a pauper lunatic from the parish of Falkland to the Union of St Pancras, London, was unreasonable and improper. The question turns primarily upon the meaning of the word 'reside,' as used in sections 3, 4, and 5 of the Act of 1898.

"It has long been settled that 'residence' for the purpose of acquiring a settlement under section 76 of the Act of 1845 is residence by a person who has a certain amount of intelligence. A lunatic, as distinguished from a person of weak mind, cannot acquire a residential settlement. The conditions upon which a residential settlement may be acquired were altered by section 1 of the Act of 1898, which repealed section 76 of the principal Act. It is, however, clear that section 1 of the 1898 Act assumes that its readers are familiar with the Poor Law of Scotland as settled by numerous decisions. Its phraseology is nearly identical with that of section 76, and besides using the word 'resided' once in connection with the acquisition and once in connection with the retention of a settlement, it uses two expressions to which technical meanings have been attached by decisions, viz., 'continuously' and 'maintained himself.' There is no doubt that it is still the law

---

[1] 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83. [2] 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 113.

[3] Crawford and Petrie v. Beattie, (1862) 24 D. 357, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 367.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland, removal of a pauper. It was to be observed that throughout the Poor Law statutes the word, when it was used in this technical sense, was commonly accompanied by the words "without having recourse to common begging" or a similar phrase. There was no such phrase in the section bearing on the present case, and no ground for refusing to the word "reside" its natural sense Further, under the 1898 Act, a right of appeal to the Local Government Board was given to all the parties affected by an order for the removal of a pauper. The pauper could appeal; and quite independently of that appeal, the English union or parish to which the pauper was to be removed had a right of appeal. Whether the lunatic pauper had or had not a right of appeal under subsec. (1) of sec. 5, and whatever the meaning of the word "reside" as used in that subsection, the Board of Guardians interested in the matter had a right of appeal under subsec. (2) of sec. 5; and when an appeal was taken, the Local Government Board that residence in a parish by a person of unsound mind will not avail for the acquisition of a settlement in that parish. On the other hand, I do not agree with the argument of the pursuers' counsel to the effect that in every case where the word 'reside' is used in the Poor Law Acts with reference to a pauper, the word necessarily refers to residence by a person who possesses some degree of intelligence. Section 1 of the Act of 1898 and section 76 of the earlier Act show that the word 'reside' may be used in the same section in a popular as well as in a technical sense. So far as I know, it has never been contended in the Court of Session that a pauper lunatic who possessed a residential settlement in a particular parish was incapable of retaining that settlement by continuing to reside in the same parish. The contrary has been assumed in a number of cases, of which I need only refer to a single example—Keith Parish Council v. Kirkmichael Parish Council, (1901) 4 F. 76. It seems to me, therefore, that the pursuers' counsel argued his case too high. On the other hand, I agree with him that in any question as to the acquisition of a privilege by virtue of residence, this word, as used in the Poor Law Acts, prima facie means residence by a person who is possessed of some intelligence. When one reads the Act of 1898 as a whole, it seems to me clear that this prima facie view is actually the sound one. It has been said that the law of settlements is a matter of merely pecuniary interest to parishes, and that it is of no importance to paupers. The opposite is the truth. It may be of vital importance to a pauper whether he is removed from a town where he has lived most of his life and has friends, and is sent to a place where he is a stranger. Equally he has an interest in the question whether, after spending the best part of his life in Scotland, he is to be sent to England or Ireland. Accordingly, the law as to the acquisition of a parochial settlement is, in my view, substantially a part of the law of status. As already explained, section 1 of the Act of 1898 makes it easier for a person to acquire a settlement in Scotland; but it still carries forward the long-established rule that a lunatic's residence in a parish will not help him to acquire a settlement. Sections 3, 4, and 5 of the same statute create new and minor privileges, which a person may acquire by residence in Scotland even although such residence may not have been sufficient for the acquisition of a settlement. Thus by section 3 a pauper who has resided for a year in one parish may appeal to the Local Government Board against his removal to another parish in Scotland. This clause is conceived in the interest of paupers, because the Board has no power to alter the legal incidence of the burden of maintenance. Again, by section 4 an English-born or Irish-born pauper, who has resided for a certain time in Scotland without having recourse to common begging or receiving parochial relief, is declared to be irremovable from Scotland. Lastly, by section 5 English-born or Irish-born persons

---

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

were bound to decide whether the proposed removal was reasonable and proper.

Argued for the respondents;—The appeal to the Local Government Board was incompetent. In the poor-law code prior to the Act of 1898, the words "reside" and "residence" were employed, as was decided in numerous cases, with a certain special meaning; and, according to this meaning, a lunatic could not acquire a settlement by living in a parish.[1] This being the recognised meaning of the terms, the Legislature must be held, when it employed them in the Act of 1898, to have attributed to them that meaning.[2] Secs. 1 to 5 of that Act dealt with cognate matters. Sec. 1 was identical with sec. 76 of the 1845 Act[3]; and in sec. 1 residence was clearly used in its technical sense. That being so, the word must receive the same meaning in the other sections of the Act, as there was nothing in them to exclude that meaning. The Act of 1862 mainly regulated the administration of the law, and did not affect the qualifications as who have not acquired a settlement by residence in Scotland, and who have not acquired what is now popularly called a 'status of irremovability' under section 4, are entitled to appeal to the Local Government Board against a warrant for their removal from Scotland to England or Ireland, provided they have resided continuously in one parish for not less than one year. It will be seen, therefore, that sections 3 to 5 are really part and parcel of the legal reform initiated by section 1 of the same Act, and I have no doubt that the word 'residence' as used in all these sections, means residence of a kind which would avail to acquire a settlement—in other words, residence by a person who is not of unsound mind. It is none the less true that every one of these sections applies to persons who are lunatics as well as to persons who are sane. It is of no importance whether a pauper is or is not of unsound mind at the time when the question arises whether he has a settlement by residence, or may appeal against an order for his removal to another parish, or against a warrant for his removal to England or Ireland, or whether he is irremovable from Scotland. Whether he is sane or insane, the only question is whether his residence in Scotland was of the kind contemplated by the particular section under which he claims to benefit. I recognise the force of the argument that the equitable restrictions upon the right of removal introduced by the Act of 1898 are a separate chapter in the Poor Law Code, and that in this chapter the word 'reside' should be construed in its ordinary as distinguished from its technical sense. I find it impossible, however, to dissociate sections 3 to 5 from section 1. Further, section 4 is expressed in the same technical language as section 1, and its phraseology supports the view that the scheme of legal reform contained in the statute must be regarded as forming one integral whole. The language of sections 3 and 5 is much less technical and significant than that of section 4, but they each contain a provision which suggests that the word 'residence' is used in something different from the merely popular sense. I refer to the parenthesis which allows a widow to tack on the period of her residence as

---

---

[1] Melville v. Flockhart, (1857) 20 D. 342; Crawford and Petrie v. Beattie, 24 D. 357; Kirkwood v. Lennox, (1869) 7 Macph. 1027; Thomson v. Kidd and Beattie, (1881) 9 R. 37. Roger v. Maconochie, (1854) 16 D. 1005; and Beattie v. Leighton and Mitchell, (1863) 1 Macph. 434, were also cited.

[2] Parish Council of Kilmalcolm v. Parish Council of Glasgow, (1906) 8 F. (H. L.) 12, per Lord Robertson, at p. 14; Stirling Parish Council v. Dunblane Parish Council, 1912 S. C. 316, per Lord Dundas, at p. 328.

[3] Keith Parish Council v. Kirkmichael Parish Council, (1901) 4 F. 76, per Lord Adam, at p. 79.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

to settlement under the Act of 1845; and the Act of 1898 must be read with reference to the Act of 1845. A prisoner did not acquire a settlement in the parish in which the prison was situated, however long his period of imprisonment might be[1]; and, similarly, the presence of a lunatic in a parish would not give him a settlement in that parish. No aid was to be derived from reference to the law of England, for the principle of the acquisition of a settlement by residence was not introduced into England until 1876.[2]

At advising on 10th January 1914,—

Lord Dundas.—The question for decision in this case is as to the competency, or the reverse, of an appeal to the Local Government Board by the guardians of an English poor-law union against a warrant pronounced by the Sheriff of Fife ordering the removal of a pauper lunatic a wife. This clause seems intended to exclude a technical rule of the Poor Law which might otherwise have been thought applicable.

---

"The pauper was born in London in 1845. She was married in Edinburgh in 1867 to a man who had a residential settlement in the parish of St Cuthbert's. She became chargeable in Leith in 1871 as a pauper lunatic, and she was maintained as such by the parish of St Cuthbert's from 1871 till May 1907. From that time until August 1910 she was boarded at the expense of a son at Freuchie, in the parish of Falkland, her name having been taken off the pauper roll. Owing to the death of her son, she recently became chargeable to the parish of Falkland, which thereupon applied for and obtained a warrant from the Sheriff of Fife and Kinross authorising her removal to the Union of St Pancras, London. The Guardians of this Union lodged an appeal, and the Local Government Board determined that the proposed removal of the pauper was 'not reasonable and proper.' Although the pauper had resided in the parish of Falkland for many years before she became chargeable to that parish, her residence there must, in my opinion, be disregarded upon the ground of her mental incapacity, which has continued without a break from 1871 to the present time. There is nothing, however, in the pleadings to show that she may not have resided continuously in the parish of Falkland for a year sometime between her marriage in 1867 and the date when she became a lunatic. While I agree with the pursuers' construction of the statute, I do not propose to give facilities for the removal to England of a woman whose husband had a settlement in Scotland, and who has lived in this country for more than forty years, more particularly in view of the fact that the Local Government Board has determined that such removal would not be reasonable and proper. Accordingly, I shall continue the case in order that the pursuers may take one or other of two courses. They may, if they choose, submit evidence to the Local Government Board to the effect that the pauper did not reside in Falkland parish for a year between 1867 and 1871, and thereafter, if the Board is against them, the pursuers may amend their pleadings and ask for a proof. Alternatively, the pursuers may move for a re-hearing of the case in order to argue that when section 5 of the Act of 1898 speaks of residence in a parish 'for not less than one year before the date of the application for relief,' it means 'immediately before' such application, and that accordingly it is irrelevant to inquire into the earlier history of the pauper. It must, however, be understood that decree will

---

[1] The Inebriates Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 25 (f), was referred to.

[2] Vulliamy's Law of Settlement, (2nd ed.) p. 2; Clerks of Peace of Somersetshire v. Overseers of Shipham, (1862) 3 B. & S. 507.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

Lord Dundas.

from the parish of Falkland to the workhouse of the said union. If the appeal was competent, we have no concern with the manner in which the Board dealt with it. If it was not competent, we must reduce the minutes of the Board. Though the question at issue is thus capable of brief and succinct statement, it is not easy to set forth with brevity one's grounds of decision; and I do not at all complain of the length of the arguments which were presented in order to enable us to arrive at a conclusion.

The statutory provision upon which, primarily at least, the question turns is section 5 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898. The facts of the case are sufficiently set forth on the record and in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and I need not summarise them. It seems to me clear that, upon these facts, the requisites prescribed by section 5 (1) of the Act, as preliminary to an appeal to the Board, are all here present, if one reads the subsection according to the natural and ordinary meaning of its language. It would appear (a) that Falkland Parish Council has obtained, in terms of the Poor Removal Act, 1862, a warrant by the Sheriff for the removal of the pauper to England; (b) that the pauper was born in England; (c) that she has not acquired (or, at all events, has not retained) by residence a settlement in Scotland; (d) that she has not become "irremovable" from Scotland within the meaning of section 4; and (e) that she has "resided" continuously, in the ordinary sense of the word, for not less (in fact for much more) than one year in Falkland parish before becoming chargeable there. The arguments from both sides of the bar were presented upon the assumption that the Act of 1898, and in particular section 5 (1), deal with insane, as well as sane, paupers; and I think this assumption is well founded, looking to the wide words used, "any English-born or Irish-born poor person," and to section 6, where a specialty is dealt with as affecting "the case of a lunatic poor person proposed to be removed to Ireland." And the pursuers are confronted with what seems prima facie a strange anomaly, in that, though the Sheriff's warrant finds in fact that the pauper "last resided" for three years in Falkland parish, she did not, upon their reading of section 5 (1), "reside" there during the last of these very same years, or indeed at all, because, being a lunatic, she was incapable of "residence," in the sense in which they say that word has been interpreted by decisions of this Court.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the Act of 1898 presupposes an acquaintance not only with prior poor-law legislation, but also with prior decisions of the Court; and I think that when the Act adopts words or phrases which (under the Act of 1845) have been interpreted by decision as bearing a special meaning, it must be held to use them according to that meaning when they occur in a context identical with or similar to not be pronounced as concluded for unless I am satisfied that it is justified either by the facts or by the law of the case. If the Local Government Board state that after considering the evidence they are satisfied that the pauper did not reside in Falkland parish between 1867 and 1871 for the requisite term, I shall, of course, accept their statement."

---

[The parties subsequently lodged a joint minute stating that the pauper did not reside in the parish of Falkland for one year between 1867 and 1871.]

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

Lord Dundas.

that in which they were judicially considered and construed. Now the words "reside" and "residence" as they occur in section 76 of the older Act, with direct relation to the acquisition and retention by a pauper of a residential settlement, have been construed by this Court as connoting, in that context, a certain amount of mental capacity. I think the result of the cases, which are binding upon us, is (1) that a lunatic cannot acquire a settlement by residence; and (2) that a lunatic fails to retain such a settlement, acquired prior to his lunacy, if he is de facto absent for the statutory period from the parish where he so acquired it. Whether or not the lunatic, though he is in fact resident during the statutory period in that parish, can retain the settlement is still, I apprehend, an open question. It is not necessary to decide it in this case; but I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary's observation that "it has never been contended in the Court of Session that a pauper lunatic who possessed a residential settlement in a particular parish was incapable of retaining that settlement by continuing to reside in the same parish." Not only has the contention been maintained, but it has received high judicial sanction and approval, e.g., in Crawford and Petrie v. Beattie,[1] and in Kirkwood v. Lennox.[2] Nor do I agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says that "the contrary has been assumed in a number of cases," of which his Lordship instances (erroneously, as I think) as an example that of Keith Parish Council.[3]

One must consider, then, whether the construction put upon "reside" and "residence," as the words occur in their context in section 76 of the Act of 1845, has any close or real bearing upon the present question, which relates, not to the acquisition or retention of a settlement by a pauper lunatic, but to his removal from Scotland to England, and the competency of an appeal to the Local Government Board against a Sheriff's warrant obtained to that end. The pursuers' counsel did not argue at our bar,—and they stated that they had not argued in the Outer House (though the Lord Ordinary seems to have so understood their argument),—that "in every case where the word 'reside' is used in the Poor Law Acts with reference to a pauper, the word necessarily refers to residence by a person who possesses some degree of intelligence." What I understood to be argued at our bar was that "reside" and "residence" in the Act of 1898, and particularly in section 5 thereof, must be read and interpreted according to the judicial construction put upon those words as they occurred in section 76 of the Act of 1845. Even so put, this contention seems to me rather a violent one. It may well be that that construction would be appropriately applied to the words in question as they occur in section 1 of the Act of 1898, which is in pari materia with section 76 of the Act of 1845; but it does not, to my mind, follow that its application is appropriate to the words as they occur in section 5 of the later Act, which deals with a quite different and separable category of poor-law administration. The statutory provisions in regard to the removal of

[1] 24 D. 357, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 368, and Lord Cowan, at p. 369.

[2] 7 Macph. 1027, per Lord President Inglis, at p. 1029.

[3] 4 F. 76.

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

Lord Dundas.

paupers from Scotland to England or Ireland, and vice versa, seem to me to be quite distinct from the enactments about the acquisition and retention of residential settlements. The legislative code (old and new) in regard to the removal of paupers from Scotland is, I think, contained in section 77 of the Act of 1845, the Poor Removal Act, 1862, and sections 3 to 6 of the Act of 1898. As to section 77, one may observe that the words "reside" and "residence" do not occur in it at all; that it was repealed by section 8 of the Act of 1862, "so far as inconsistent with" that Act; and that certain portions of it were specially repealed—I suppose to make things quite clear—by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. The Act of 1862 was a machinery Act; it was passed to provide "better means . . . for the safe conveyance to the place of their destination in England, Ireland, or Scotland," of paupers who were to be removed. One comes really then to the Act of 1898. The words "any poor person" in section 3 are obviously wide enough to include poor persons who are insane. I do not think any material aid is to be derived from section 4. It creates, under certain circumstances, a status of irremovability from Scotland of an English-born or Irish-born pauper; the proviso certainly seems to refer to paupers who are not lunatics; but it does not follow that the word "reside" is used in two different senses in the same section, though it may apply with different effect to paupers sane and insane respectively. It is, I think, upon section 5 that this matter truly turns; and its whole language, as I read it, concludes the question in favour of the competency of this appeal to the Local Government Board. I see no reason to apply a technical, or any other than the ordinary, meaning to the words "reside" and "residence," as they occur in it. Indeed, if (as I think, and as the Lord Ordinary expressly says that he thinks) the section applies to insane as well as to sane paupers, these words must, I take it, be used in their ordinary sense, for they could not, in the case of a lunatic, be used in any other.

I respectfully think that the Lord Ordinary's conclusion is wrong. He seems to me to have started and proceeded upon a misleading trail. He starts from section 1 of the Act of 1898, as substantially re-enacting (though with variations in the statutory periods) section 76 of the Act of 1845; and he says (rightly, as I think), that "it is still law that residence in a parish by a person of unsound mind will not avail for the acquisition of a settlement in that parish." Thence his lordship proceeds to deduce that "in any question as to the acquisition of a privilege by virtue of residence, this word, as used in the Poor Law Acts, prima facie means residence by a person who is possessed of some intelligence"; and, after commenting upon the sections of the Act of 1898, down to and including section 5, the Lord Ordinary comes to the conclusion that "sections 3 to 5 are really part and parcel of the legal reform initiated by section 1 of the same Act, and I have no doubt that the word 'residence' as used in all these sections, means residence of a kind which would avail to acquire a settlement—in other words, residence by a person who is not of unsound mind." His lordship adds,—"It is none the less true that every one of these sections applies to persons who are lunatics as well as to persons who are sane." The Lord Ordinary thus bases his judgment upon a construction of the first five sections of the Act of 1898, as a massed whole, into which he imports, as an essential element, the judicial interpretation of the words "reside" and "residence," as they are used in section 76 of the Act of 1845. His lordship says he finds it impossible to dissociate sections 3 to 5 from section 1. As already observed, I consider that the judicial construction of the words "reside" and "residence," while fairly applicable to section 1, has no necessary nor (I think) justifiable application to other sections of the 1898 Act, such as that with which we are here specially concerned, which deal with quite a different aspect of poor-law administration; I consider that the "legal reform initiated by section 1" involved two separate and distinct elements, relating respectively to (a) acquisition and retention of residential settlements, and (b) removal of paupers; and I hold that sections 3 to 5 must, for these reasons, and in the above sense, be dissociated from section 1. I am therefore of opinion that we ought to recall the interlocutor reclaimed against, and that the compearing defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

I think it right to add a few words upon a matter which came into prominence during the debate, though it does not actually arise for decision. In the petition to the Sheriff for removal of this pauper to England it is set out that she was born in London, "(or) last resided for three years in the parish of Falkland in Fife"; and the Sheriff's order finds, inter alia, that she so resided. It seems to me that a misapplication of the provisions of the Act of 1862, section 2, is here involved. That section enacts that the Sheriff's warrant shall contain, inter alia, the name of the place in Scotland, England, or Ireland (as the case may be) where he shall find the pauper to have been born "or to have last resided for the space of five years in the case of a poor person to be removed to Scotland, and three years in the case of a poor person to be removed to England or Ireland." The residence for three years specified for the case of a removal from Scotland to England is, I apprehend, plainly a residence in England, not in Scotland. I think the theory of the Legislature was that inquiry should be made in such case as to the pauper's English place of birth, or the last English residence where he has (or may have) acquired a settlement. The Sheriff's finding in the present case of a three years' residence in Falkland seems to me to be irrelevant, and to lack compliance with the requirements of the statute. This view is borne out by the printed forms which were exhibited to us during the debate, and which I understood to be officially issued for use, as matter of practice, as well as by text writers upon the subject—Guthrie Smith's Poor Law, (3rd ed.) p. 274; Graham's Poor Law, p. 312, note. But I need say no more, as it is unnecessary to decide this point, which arose only incidentally during the discussion.

Lord Salvesen.—The sole question in this case is, whether the word "resided" in section 5 of the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898, falls to be read in its ordinary sense as being equivalent to "lived," or, as the Lord Ordinary has held, as qualified by the word "intelligently." In my opinion the answer to this question depends on whether the section is applicable to poor lunatics as well as to other poor persons who have sufficient intelligence to acquire a settlement by residence. Had this question

Jan. 10, 1914.

Edinburgh Parish Council v. Local Government Board for Scotland.

Lord Salvesen.

depended entirely upon the terms of section 5 there is much to support the view that it did not have in contemplation persons who were insane, for it is difficult to understand why provision should be made for granting a lunatic a right of appeal against the warrant for his removal to England or Ireland. There is no other instance, so far as I know, in which a lunatic is permitted to embark upon legal proceedings in his own person, and it is difficult to understand what guidance is to be derived by the Local Government Board in determining the matters submitted to them from the views or wishes of an insane person. It would have been more reasonable if the two appeals which are allowed by the section had been alternative, so that while a sane pauper should be given a right of appeal against a warrant for his removal, the interests of a lunatic should be entrusted to the guardians of the union to which it was proposed to remove him. As the section is framed, however, the appeals appear to be cumulative, and we were told that in practice the Local Government Board have received and considered appeals by persons who had been certified insane. It is, however, unnecessary to dwell on this and similar anomalies of what appears to be an ill-considered statute, for section 6 makes it quite plain by implication that the previous section is applicable to lunatic poor persons since it provides that "in the case of a lunatic poor person proposed to be removed to Ireland the warrant shall order his delivery at the district asylum of the place to which he is to be removed." Unless then the application of section 5 is to be limited to the case of a lunatic who has had a continuous residence for a year while sane in a particular parish, for which limitation there appears to be no good reason, it seems to me that the word "resided" must connote such a residence as both sane and insane persons are capable of having, and which, in the case of the latter, involves only their bodily presence in a particular locality. Prima facie, however, such residence must not be compulsory, as by detention in prison or confinement in an asylum, otherwise undue burdens would be placed on the particular parishes in which prisons and asylums happen to be situated. Here, however, no question of that kind arises, as the lunatic pauper to whom this action relates was supported by relatives in a Scotch parish for a period of three years. Her bodily presence in that parish, in my opinion, satisfied the condition as to residence expressed in section 5, and gave the Local Government Board jurisdiction to entertain the appeal which was presented against the warrant for her removal. I accordingly agree with your Lordships that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary cannot stand, and that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied.

Lord Dundas intimated that the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD GUTHRIE, who were absent at advising, concurred in his opinion.

LORD ORMIDALE was present when the case was advised.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against and assoilzied the compearing defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

R. ADDISON SMITH & Co., W.S.—MACRAE, FLETT, & RENNIE, W.S.—Agents.

MRS MARSHALL COLVILLE AND OTHERS (John Colville's Trustees), First Parties.—Clyde, K.C.—C. H. Brown.
CHRISTINA HENDRIE COLVILLE, Second Party.—Chree, K.C.—Christie, K.C.—Hedderwick.
DAVID JOHN COLVILLE, Third Party.—Clyde, K.C.—C. H. Brown.

No. 34.
Jan. 13, 1914.
Colville's Trustees v. Colville.

Trust—Administration—Appropriation of investments to particular legacies—Competency—Depreciation in value of investments—Succession—Legacy.

A body of testamentary trustees, who were directed to pay a legacy of £5000 at a postponed date, invested that sum in trust investments and appropriated them to the legacy. The trust-deed contained no express or implied direction to appropriate investments to particular legacies, nor was such appropriation necessary to facilitate the administration of the trust. When the term of payment of the legacy arrived the investments appropriated thereto had materially depreciated in value, and the legatee refused to accept the depreciated investments and claimed payment of the legacy in full.

Held that the trustees were not entitled to appropriate investments to the legacy, and accordingly that the legatee was entitled to payment in full.

ON 25th October 1913 a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court upon certain questions which had arisen under the trust-disposition and settlement of John Colville, who died on 22nd August 1901. The trustees acting under that deed were the first parties to the case; Christina Hendrie Colville, the truster's daughter, was the second party; and David John Colville, his son, was the third party. 1ST DIVISION.

By his settlement, the truster bequeathed to his daughter, the second party, (besides a liferent) a legacy of £5000, and to his son, the third party, the residue of his estate, and provided "that these provisions in favour of my children (including the foresaid legacy of five thousand pounds to my daughter) shall be payable in the case of my son when he attains the age of twenty-five years, and in the case of my daughter when she attains that age or is married, whichever of these events shall first happen, and shall vest as at the term of payment."

The truster further provided, inter alia, as follows:—"Without in any way limiting or restricting the powers which my trustees have at common law or by statute or otherwise, but in addition thereto I confer upon them the following special powers in carrying out the purposes of this trust, and such powers shall be exercisable at any time as the trustees may in their discretion think proper, and that although the beneficiaries or any of them may have obtained vested interests,—that is to say, in the first place, to continue and carry on in case they in their absolute discretion shall think fit to do so, for such period as they shall deem advisable, any business in which I may be engaged at the time of my death, either alone or in partnership . . . In the fifth place, to continue all or any part of the trust-estate in the state or investment in or upon which the same shall be at the time of my death (however doubtful or hazardous or limited the description or nature of the property or investment may be). . . ."

Various questions arising out of the provisions contained in the testator's trust-disposition were set forth in the special case, but this report deals only with the legacy of £5000 bequeathed to the truster's daughter, who attained the age of twenty-five in 1912. With reference to this legacy the case stated as follows:—

Jan. 13, 1914.

Colville's Trustees v. Colville.

"7. The trustees entered upon the administration of the trust-estate, and on 12th November 1902 resolved to apply £5000 in making investments to meet the legacy of £5000 to the second party. The resolution they came to is in the following terms:—'It was arranged to invest the legacy of £5000 bequeathed to Miss Christina, and payable to her on her attaining twenty-five years of age, or marrying, in such investments as are authorised by the Will. . . .'

"8. Accordingly, the trustees made the following investments at the following expenditure:—

"(1) £1200 3 per cent Debenture Stock of the London and North-Western Railway Company,	£1216	14	4
"(2) £1500 2½ per cent Debenture Stock of the Midland Railway Company,	1260	18	3
"(3) £950 4 per cent Debenture Stock of the Caledonian Railway Company,	1269	0	2
"(4) £1250 3 per cent Debenture Stock of the North British Railway Company,	1239	9	2
	£4986	1	11

"At the date when the trustees came to said resolution, the second party was under fifteen years of age, and the legacy of £5000 had not vested in her. In arriving at the said resolution, the trustees were not constrained thereto by any necessity for immediate distribution of the trust-estate, or any part thereof, and they came to it merely because they considered it expedient so to set aside and secure in such investments a sum to meet the legacy. The trustees have since treated said investments as applicable to the said legacy of £5000, and the interest on said investments as the interest payable on the said legacy. There has been considerable depreciation in the capital value of these investments, and the first question that arises in this case is whether said depreciation falls to be borne by the second party, or by the residuary legatee of the truster."

With reference to that question, the following were the contentions of parties:—"The first parties maintain that they were bound or at anyrate entitled to set apart and appropriate the investments in question to the second party's legacy of £5000, and that the depreciation on said investments falls to be borne exclusively by said legacy. The third party concurs in these contentions. The second party maintains that, in the absence of any direction to the trustees to set aside investments and appropriate them to the said legacy, and of any necessity requiring them so to do, the first parties were not entitled to appropriate the investments in question to her legacy. She therefore further maintains that she is entitled to payment of her legacy of £5000 in full, and that any depreciation which may have arisen on said investments does not fall to be borne by her."

The first and second questions of law in the case were:—"(1) Were the trustees entitled to set aside and appropriate said investments to the second party's legacy of £5000? (2) Does the depreciation in the investments appropriated by the trustees to the second party's legacy of £5000 fall to be borne by the second party?"

Jan. 13, 1914.

Colville's Trustees v. Colville.

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Johnston) on 7th and 8th January 1914.

Argued for the first and third parties;—The question whether trustees were entitled to appropriate specific investments to any bequest depended upon whether such appropriation was consistent with proper administration of their trust.[1] In the present case, looking to the "doubtful or hazardous" character of investments which the trustees were authorised to hold, it was clearly consistent with proper administration, and also to the advantage of the second party, to appropriate investments to her legacy. She could take no benefit from any increase in the capital value of the trust-estate, and after appropriation of investments to her legacy, she was protected against depreciation in that capital value. As she had this advantage resulting from the appropriation of investments, any depreciation on these investments themselves fell to be borne by her.

Argued for the second party;—The truster had left no directions requiring his trustees to appropriate specific investments to meet the legacy of £5000, and there was nothing arising out of the administration of this trust-estate—which included a most prosperous business, and in which there was no call for immediate distribution—requiring such appropriation to be made. In the absence of directions to do so, or necessity arising in the course of administration of a trust, it was ultra vires of trustees to appropriate investments to any legacy.[2] The second party, being entitled to a legacy of a sum of £5000, was not bound to accept investments of a capital value below that figure. Accordingly, the depreciation in the investments appropriated by the first parties did not fall to be borne by her.

At advising on 13th January 1914,—

Lord President.—The questions submitted for our judgment in this case relate to the succession of the late Mr John Colville. He died in August 1901, survived by Mrs Colville, by one son, and by one daughter. The scheme of his settlement in so far as relates to the son and daughter, with whose interests alone we are concerned in this case, is simple. To the daughter he bequeathed a legacy of £5000 and the liferent of £20,000. This is her testamentary provision. To the son he bequeathed the residue of his estate and, of course, the income. That is his testamentary provision. These provisions, "including" (to use the words of the settlement) "the legacy of £5000," he declared to vest not at the date of the testator's death but on his children respectively attaining twenty-five years of age, or, in the case of the daughter, being married. The daughter is unmarried and has attained twenty-five years of age. Her testamentary provisions have vested and are now payable. Accordingly, she claims payment of her £5000 legacy. The trustees reply that they are ready to give her not the £5000 which was bequeathed to her by her father but certain railway debenture stock in which they say they invested the £5000 legacy in November 1902. That railway debenture stock, it is agreed, has now considerably depreciated in capital value.

[1] Robinson v. Fraser's Trustees, (1884) 8 R. (H. L.) 127.

[2] Scott's Trustees v. Scott, (1895) 23 R. 52, Lord Trayner, at pp. 57-8; Vans Dunlop's Trustees v. Pollok, 1912 S. C. 10, Lord President Dunedin, at p. 14.

Jan. 13, 1914.

Colville's Trustees v. Colville.

Ld. President.

It is certain that the trustees were not expressly authorised to sever the legacy of £5000 and place the money upon separate investments. It is equally certain that they were not impliedly authorised to do so, because it is agreed that they were "not constrained thereto by any necessity for immediate distribution of the trust-estate, or any part thereof. They came to [the resolution to make an appropriation] merely because they considered it expedient so to set aside and secure in such investments a sum to meet the legacy."

In these circumstances, I am very clearly of opinion that, there being no expressed or implied power to set aside specific investments to meet this legacy, the daughter is entitled to have her £5000, and her claim cannot be legally met by an offer to give her something different and something less.—(His Lordship then dealt with questions with which this report is not concerned.)

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree in the result at which your Lordship has arrived.

As regards the first and second questions, I think that the trustees were not warranted in making an appropriation to meet the legacy of £5000. The direction to pay that legacy to the daughter, on her attaining the age of twenty-five or earlier in the event of her marriage, I do not think can be satisfied by tendering to her depreciated investments. It is clear that there is no express direction to appropriate. It is also clear that there may be, in certain cases, an implied direction to make an appropriation, and the case of Robinson[1] was said to be similar to the present. But I think that case is plainly not applicable because the direction there was to make provision, first, for the payment of two specific legacies which were to be held in liferent and in fee, and then for a division of the residue. The terms of that settlement indicated that, in order that there might be no delay in dividing the residue, it was necessary to appropriate. In the present case there is no ground for any such implication, and the statement set out in article 8 of the special case makes that point perfectly clear.

LORD SKERRINGTON.—I concur.

THE COURT answered the first and second questions in the negative.

J. & J. Ross, W.S.—GRAHAM, JOHNSTON, & FLEMING, W.S.—Agents.

---

[1] 8 R (H. L.) 127.

THE ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Blackburn, K.C.—Hon. W. Watson.
JAMES JOHN GREENSHIELDS, Defender (Respondent).—M'Lennan, K.C.—Keith.

No. 35.
Jan. 14, 1914.
Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

Cautioner—Bank—Bank's duty to cautioner—Disclosure of principal's indebtedness.

H., whose bank account was overdrawn to the extent of about £300, and who was also indebted to the bank to the amount of about £1100 in respect of certain accommodation bills, requested G., an acquaintance who had no knowledge of his financial position and in particular of his indebtedness to the bank, to guarantee his account to the extent of £300. The latter expressed to the bank-agent his willingness to undertake a guarantee to that amount, and was informed by the agent that a guarantee of £300 might not assist the principal debtor, as that sum would be taken up by the bank. The agent, however, did not make any disclosure of the principal's further indebtedness of £1100 under the bills, and G., believing an overdraft of £300 to be the sole debt, granted a guarantee for £500.

The principal having failed to discharge his debt to the bank, G. resisted an action for payment under the guarantee, on the ground that he had been persuaded to undertake it under essential error induced by the failure of the bank-agent to discharge his duty of disclosing the existence of the principal's indebtedness under the bills.

Circumstances in which held (rev. judgment of Lord Cullen) that there was no such duty of disclosure, and decree for payment granted.

Observations, per the Lord President and Lord Mackenzie, on the circumstances in which a bank-agent might have a duty to disclose to an intending guarantor the state of the principal's indebtedness to the bank.

Cautioner—Bank—Verbal representations by bank-agent as to customer's credit—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 6.

Opinion reserved, per the Lord President, as to whether section 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856—which provides that representations as to a person's credit made for the purpose of enabling that person to obtain credit or money shall be of no effect unless in writing—applied to representations made by a bank-agent to an intending guarantor of the account of one of the bank's customers.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Cullen.

On 3rd August 1911 the Royal Bank of Scotland brought an action against James John Greenshields, of Kerse, Lesmahagow, in which the pursuers claimed payment of the sum of £500, being the amount alleged to be due by the defender in terms of a letter of guarantee, dated 5th November 1905, granted by him in favour of the bank. In the letter founded on the defender undertook a general guarantee of the indebtedness to the bank of John Hutchison to the amount of £500.

The estates of John Hutchison were sequestrated on 13th December 1909, and yielded a first and final dividend of 4d. in the pound, and thereafter the pursuers raised the present action.

The defender lodged a statement of facts, in which he averred:—(Stat. 1) "About the beginning of November 1908 John Hutchison applied to defender to become cautioner for him to pursuers to the extent of £300, in order that he might in future obtain greater facilities than he then possessed with pursuers for the profitable working of his business. Defender had met Hutchison as a boy on the occasion of defender's visits to his uncle at Kerse many years before, but at this date Hutchison was known to defender only through odd jobs which he had as a joiner done for defender, and from casual contact with him as a residenter in defender's locality. Defender told Hutchison that he would require to see Mr Allan, pursuers' agent at their branch bank at Lesmahagow, with regard to Hutchison's financial condition generally and his position with the bank, before undertaking any such guarantee. Defender was a customer of pursuers, and expected to receive full and correct information as to Hutchison's financial position, and to get every consideration and perfect fairness in the inquiries he was about to make. . . ." (Stat. 2) "An interview followed between Mr Allan and defender on 3rd November 1908 in Mr Allan's private room at pursuers' branch bank at Lesmahagow. At said interview, in answer to defender's questions as to Hutchison's financial position and as to the extent of the risk he would run in guaranteeing Hutchison, Mr Allan represented to and assured defender that the risk was a fair one for the defender to undertake, and would involve no loss to him, that Hutchison required temporary accommodation with the bank merely in order to enable him to carry on his business on more profitable lines, that Hutchison was doing very well and was making money out of a contract in connection with the Abbey Green United Free Church at Lesmahagow, and that his family were now a help to him in his business instead of a burden on him. Allan represented and led defender to believe that there was nothing in Hutchison's transactions with pursuers which required to be disclosed to defender as material to the risk he was asked to undertake in guaranteeing Hutchison, that Hutchison's total indebtedness to the pursuers was less than £300, and that his affairs were in a prosperous condition. In view of the favourable report he had just received, defender assented to the latter's suggestion then made to increase the guarantee to £500, so that it would be of material assistance to Hutchison. Shortly thereafter the defender, in presence of Mr Allan, stated to Hutchison that Mr Allan had given him such a good account of his (Hutchison's) affairs that he would undertake the guarantee. To this statement Allan tacitly assented. Following upon this interview defender, on 5th November 1908, signed the guarantee for £500 now founded on by pursuers. In making said representations in course of said interview with defender Mr Allan was acting for and on behalf of pursuers, and within the scope of his ordinary duties as pursuers' agent. . . ." (Stat. 3) "Defender has ascertained and now avers that at the date of said interview and of the signing of said guarantee Hutchison had, apart from current acceptances for ordinary trade debts, been accommodated by and was indebted to the pursuers to the extent of at least £1200, that he had been indebted in large sums to the pursuers for some considerable time prior to said interview, and that when said interview took place pursuers already held guarantees for £900 in the form of two promissory-notes, one for £500 granted by Hutchison and Mr A. L. Scott, boot manufacturer, Glasgow, and another for £400 granted by Hutchison and Dr Neil M'Coll Hutchison, Mount Florida, there. Said promissory-note for £400 was replaced by one for £500 shortly after defender signed said guarantee. The existence of this indebtedness of Hutchison to pursuers was well known to the agent Allan at the date of said interview but was not disclosed by Allan to defender. Defender further avers that pursuers had for some years prior to 5th November 1908 been aware of Hutchison's financial instability, and had called for statements of his affairs, and that it was after procuring said statements that they first insisted on Hutchison procuring personal security as a condition of their continuing to accommodate him, and obtained the guarantees of Mr Scott and Dr Hutchison. Further, the pursuers had shortly before said interview insisted on John Hutchison's finding further security for his increased indebtedness, and it was in consequence of the pursuers' pressure that Hutchison applied to the defender, although he concealed this fact from the defender. All the facts above stated were well known to Mr Allan as the pursuers' bank-agent. . . ." (Stat. 4) "In these circumstances, the foresaid representations made by Mr Allan were false and unfounded. They were made by him fraudulently, and the true position of John Hutchison's financial affairs was fraudulently concealed by him from defender for the purpose of inducing defender to sign said guarantee, and so enabling the pursuers to obtain security for Hutchison's total indebtedness to them. Had defender been made aware of the true financial position of Hutchison, or of the extent of his indebtedness to the pursuers on 3rd November 1908, or of prior obligations having been undertaken by other third parties to pursuers on Hutchison's behalf, he would have declined to sign said guarantee. He signed the same under essential error as to Hutchison's solvency, and his indebtedness to pursuers, induced by the misrepresentations and concealment of Allan as above set forth."

Jan. 14, 1914.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses, in respect that (a) the defender having requested from pursuers' agent Allan information respecting John Hutchison's financial position, said agent failed in his duty to make full and fair disclosure to defender of the facts within his knowledge; (b) defender undertook the guarantee founded on by pursuers under essential error induced by material misrepresentations on the part of pursuers' said agent; (c) defender undertook said guarantee under essential error induced by the fraudulent misrepresentation and concealment of pursuers' said agent.

A proof was allowed and led. The Lord President summarised the effect of the evidence on the main questions of fact considered in the case in the following passage taken from his opinion:—

"On that vital issue—as I take it, the only issue in fact in the case—the evidence of the defender, Mr Greenshields, is as follows:—He is speaking of the first interview that took place on the 3rd November between him and the bank-agent, and says, 'I then went on to the Bank and saw Mr Allan. I was shown into his private room. I told Mr Allan that Hutchison had applied to me for a guarantee for £300, and I asked him Hutchison's position. I am perfectly clear that I put that question. Mr Allan's reply was that Hutchison's position was a good one; that he had a contract for reseating the church; and that he was making money. He said that Hutchison wanted the guarantee to carry on his business to better advantage.' Then, further on in his evidence, he says: 'All that was disclosed to me was an overdraft which Mr Allan said was under £300. From what I now know there was concealment. (Q.) Was this statement which was made to you such as induced you to believe that there was no indebtedness to the Bank over £300? (A.) From the statement made to me

Jan. 14, 1914.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

I thought the risk was a perfectly good one; I knew nothing else. From the bank-agent's statement I considered that Hutchison was perfectly solvent at the time, and would be able to repay anything that was advanced on my guarantee. From the statement made by Mr Allan at the time I inferred that Hutchison's indebtedness to the Bank was under £300. (Q.) In view of what you now know as regards his actual indebtedness at the time, would you say there was misrepresentation on the part of Mr Allan? (A.) Well, it looks on the face of it misrepresentation; it is concealment; I would not quite call it misrepresentation.' And then, a little further on, he is asked this question—'Did you ask Mr Allan anything about Mr Hutchison's business? (A.) I said to Mr Allan, "What is Hutchison's position?" and I thought that that question would cover everything. By his position, I meant whether he owed the bank, or whether he was a man that I could give a guarantee to.' And then, finally, he says in answer to this question—'Are you sure that you asked any questions of Mr Allan beyond the state of Mr Hutchison's account at the bank? (A.) I asked him his position. (Q.) Did you say the position of his account? (A.) I did not; I said, "What is Mr Hutchison's position?" (Q.) You are quite sure you did not ask, as you came in, "What is the position of Mr Hutchison's account at the bank?" (A.) I did not. (Q.) Did you ask any question of Mr Allan which plainly applied to Hutchison's total indebtedness, and not merely to the state of his current account at the bank? (A.) I think asking his position covered that; it covered the whole case; I expected to be told in what position John Hutchison was, and from what Mr Allan said I believed him to be solvent.' Now, that is the whole evidence given by the defender, Mr Greenshields, upon this the vital issue in the case. It is contradicted by Mr Allan, who says in his evidence-in-chief regarding the interview to which I have just referred, 'He [Mr Greenshields] was not more than two minutes there. He asked me no questions whatever as regards Mr Hutchison's financial position. In particular, he did not use the expression, "What is John Hutchison's position?"' And further on, in cross-examination, he says, 'When Mr Greenshields came in he told me that Mr Hutchison had been down at Kerse and had asked him if he would become cautioner for him for £300. Mr Greenshields did not put the question to me, "What is Hutchison's position," nor "What is Hutchison's position at the bank"; he did not put any such question to me. He did not ask me anything at all about Hutchison's affairs. He did not ask anything about the extent of the risk involved. He never asked me such questions.'"

A subsequent passage in the Lord President's opinion contained this further summary of the evidence:—"He [the bank agent] says that 'after the call of Hutchison that I have referred to,' that was the call made earlier on the morning of the 3rd November, 'Mr Greenshields called at the Bank. He was shown into my private office. I asked him to be seated, and he said no, he had not time because he had a friend waiting outside for him, and then he said that John Hutchison had called that morning and had asked him to become security for him, but after that he said that John had been down there that morning and he wanted about £300 to pay some tradesmen's accounts. At that time I told him that I did not think that £300 would assist John to pay tradesmen's accounts, because it would be taken up by the Bank, but I said, "Mr Greenshields, that is purely a matter between you and Mr Hutchison." Mr Greenshields replied that seeing that was the case he had better see John before doing anything else, and he left the office thereafter.' He is asked, 'Was it only because he said that Hutchison wanted the money to pay tradesmen's accounts that you thought it necessary to inform him of the overdraft at the Bank? (A.) Yes, of course I did not mention the overdraft at the Bank, I told him it would be taken up by the Bank. He did not ask what I meant by being taken up by the Bank. I am quite sure that I made that statement at the first visit that Mr Greenshields paid, and I told him distinctly that it was purely a matter between him and John Hutchison at the time. I said that because I make it a point never to advise my customers to become security for anybody.' And he substantially repeats the same statement in cross-examination."

The import of the evidence is also discussed in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Johnston.

On 7th September 1912 the Lord Ordinary (Cullen) assoilzied the defender.*

---

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the circumstances of the action]—The ground of defence to this action on the guarantee is that the defender was misled into granting it by misrepresentation as to the state of Hutchison's indebtedness to the Bank, in respect he was told only of the debit balance of £300 on the current account, and was told nothing about Hutchison's bills for £900 [subsequently admitted to be £1100] held by the Bank, and that he would not have granted the guarantee had he known that Hutchison was so heavily indebted. The defender maintains that Mr Allan should have informed him of the existence of the bills as well as of the overdraft, and that his omission to do so amounted to a material misrepresentation which disables the Bank from holding him to his guarantee.

"That the defender had no knowledge of the existence of the bills; that he signed the guarantee in the belief that Hutchison's indebtedness to the Bank consisted only of the £300 of overdraft; and that he would not have signed the guarantee had he known about the bills, are facts as to which I have no doubt. The question remains whether the Bank is responsible for the defender having been imperfectly informed as to Hutchison's liabilities and for the error he was under when he signed the guarantee.

"The defender on record alleges that, for some time prior to the guarantee, Mr Allan had been aware that Hutchison was financially unsound, and he imputes to Mr Allan a deliberate scheme to obtain Hutchison's debt to the Bank fortified by outside security, and an intention to deceive the defender in the matter of his guarantee. A good deal of evidence was directed towards substantiating these allegations. I am of opinion that the defender has not succeeded in making good his case on this aspect of it. It is true that the statements of Hutchison's affairs put forward by him were inflated and would not have stood a proper scrutiny. And Mr Allan seems to have passed them without such attention and scrutiny as might have been expected of him, and as he could have given. That he should have done so is not quite easy to understand. But the evidence does not contain anything sufficient to explain why he should have been willing to be a party to misrepresenting the position of Hutchison's affairs to the head office. I take the case therefore on the footing that in these matters Mr Allan acted in good faith.

"There remains, however, for consideration the alleged specific misrepresentation of which the defender complains, that is to say, the failure of Mr Allan to inform him about Hutchison's bill debts to the Bank. If Mr Allan represented, or was a party to representing, to the defender that Hutchi-

Jan. 14, 1914.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

The pursuers reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 16th and 17th December 1913.

Argued for the reclaimers;—A bank-agent had no general duty to disclose to a would-be guarantor the state of the principal's indebtedness. The cautioner was presumed to have made himself acquainted with all the matters material to the obligation he was about to undertake. The agent's only duty was that, if any question was asked regarding the principal's financial relations with the Bank, he was bound to answer truthfully.[1] The defender had failed to prove that any question had been put to the agent which laid upon him the duty of disclosing Hutchison's whole indebtedness. It was not proved that the question "What is Hutchison's position?" had been put to the agent; but even if that question had been put it had been answered truthfully, for it was a question as to Hutchison's general financial position, not as to his position with the Bank. From the son's debt to the Bank consisted only of the balance of £300 on the overdrawn account current, while in fact it included also £900 due on the bills, it appears to me that the defender would be entitled to complain of this as a misrepresentation material to the transaction; and, as there is no doubt that he signed the guarantee in the belief that the £300 was the whole indebtedness, that he would be entitled to disclaim his obligation under it. It is no doubt true that Mr Allan was, originally, not under obligation to inform the defender as to the state of Hutchison's liabilities to the Bank. But if he chose to give information he was bound to see that it was accurate and not misleading.

---

"There is considerable variation in the accounts given by the defender and by Allan as to what passed when the defender first called at the bank on the morning of 3rd November, and between the defender, Allan, and Hutchison, as to what passed at their subsequent meeting at the bank on the same morning. I place most reliance on the evidence of the defender, who impressed me as a very frank and straightforward witness. It is a salient fact in the history of the transaction that whereas Hutchison had originally asked the defender to grant a guarantee for £300, the defender in the end granted one for £500. What occasioned this increase in the amount of the guarantee is not doubtful. It was a statement made to the defender that a guarantee for £300 might not be of much benefit to Hutchison as the sum in it might be taken by the bank to pay off his overdraft of that amount. On hearing this the defender agreed to give a guarantee for £500, so as to provide a substantial margin over said debt. Now, as Hutchison's indebtedness to the Bank was not merely the £300, but totalled £1200, it is clear that the defender gave his guarantee under an error as to how Hutchison stood with the Bank. He believed that the indebtedness was only £300 and that his guarantee would provide a free margin of £200, whereas the indebtedness far exceeded the sum guaranteed. The defender says that, had he known of the additional indebtedness on the bills, he would not have signed the guarantee, and I believe him. His error, therefore, was material, because but for it he would not have contracted as he did.

"Now, while the defender, Mr Allan, and Mr Hutchison vary in their accounts of the meetings at the bank, I think it is proved that the statement as to the overdraft debt swallowing up a guarantee for £300, which misled the defender, was either originally made by Mr Allan or was endorsed by him, and it must have been evident to him that the defender, when he agreed to £500, was proceeding on the footing that by guaranteeing that

---

[1] Young v. Clydesdale Bank, (1889) 17 R. 231, per Lord Adam, at p. 240, and Lord Shand, at p. 244.

answer which he had received it must have been clear to the defender that his question, if it had been intended to elicit an answer as to Hutchison's indebtedness to the Bank, had been misunderstood, and he should then have put the question categorically. The only case that was left was one of concealment, and the defender could not succeed on this ground in face of the law laid down in Young v. Clydesdale Bank.[1] It was contended for the defender that he had been induced to give the guarantee in question by representations made to him by the bank-agent as to Mr Hutchison's financial position. The provisions of section 6 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856,[2] applied to such representations, and denied effect to them unless they were made in writing. Parole proof only had been led with regard to these representations, and it was therefore not competent for the defender to found upon them.[3]

Argued for the respondent;—The respondent accepted the law laid down in Young v. Clydesdale Bank.[1] But in the present case the presumption that the intending guarantor had informed himself of the principal's position was displaced, seeing that he came to the bank-agent seeking such information. It was sufficiently proved that he had asked the agent "What is Hutchison's position?" This question was just such a question as had been figured as putting a duty of disclosure on the bank-agent. In any case the agent had concealed the condition of Hutchison's indebtedness from the defender, in the knowledge that he was not informed, and wished to be informed, thereof. This concealment was material, for it was not denied that the defender would not have undertaken the obligation had he known the extent of Hutchison's debt to the Bank. Such material concealment was enough to release the defender from his guarantee.[4] The case of increased amount he was providing Hutchison with a free margin above the Bank's claim against him. The defender's action in the matter was susceptible of no other meaning. And this being so, I think it was the duty of Mr Allan to dispel the error under which the defender was proceeding by informing him that the overdraft did not represent the whole of Hutchison's indebtedness, but that there were the bill debts as well. Mr Allan may have thought that the bill debts were sufficiently secured to the Bank by the other names on the bills. But Hutchison was the true debtor in them, as Mr Allan knew, and had he disclosed their existence to the defender there is, in my opinion, no doubt that the defender would not have undertaken the guarantee. I am accordingly of opinion that the defender signed the guarantee under a material error, and that this error was induced by the failure of Mr Allan to disclose the existence of the bill debts under circumstances which laid on him a duty of disclosure; and that the pursuers accordingly are not entitled to enforce against the defender the guarantee so obtained from him. . . ."

---

[1] 17 R. 231.

[2] The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), enacts:—Sec. 6. "All . . . representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade or dealings of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, or postponement of payment of debt . . . shall be in writing and shall be subscribed by the person . . . making such representations, . . . otherwise the same shall be of no effect."

[3] Clydesdale Bank, Limited v. Paton, (1896) 23 R. (H. L.) 22.

[4] Hamilton v. Watson, (1842) 5 D. 280, per Lord Medwyn, at p. 290, aff. (1845) 4 Bell's App. 67; Railton v. Matthews, (1844) 3 Bell's App. 56; Royal Bank of Scotland v. Ranken, (1844) 6 D. 1418; Falconer v. North

Jan. 14, 1914.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

Clydesdale Bank v. Paton[1] was no authority for the proposition which the reclaimers sought to found upon it. The representations which were contemplated by the 6th section of the Act of 1856, and to which alone it applied, must be made to the person who was going to give credit or to supply goods, and with the primary object of enabling the person with regard to whom they were made to obtain credit or goods. The representations in question here were made, not to the person who was to give credit, but to the intending guarantor, and their immediate object was to induce him to undertake the guarantee. In any event the effect of section 6 was merely to limit the mode of proof of such representations,[2] and the pursuers were barred from pleading the section after they had allowed parole proof to be taken. Further, there was no plea in law founded on this section.

At advising on 14th January 1914,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—Along with your Lordships I have found it unnecessary to consider and decide whether or no the 6th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of 1856 applies to this case. On that question I desire expressly to reserve my opinion, for, having in view the condition of the pleadings and the course and conduct of this action in the Outer House, it appears to me to be preferable to follow the path which has been taken by the Lord Ordinary.

In substance, although not in form, this is an action for the reduction of a letter of guarantee, dated 5th November 1908, addressed to the Royal Bank of Scotland by a Mr Greenshields, the original defender in the action, who died since the proof was taken and whose representatives have been sisted in his stead. The ground on which Mr Greenshields sought release from the obligation contained in the letter of guarantee is very succinctly stated in his first plea in law to the effect that the "defender undertook the guarantee founded on by pursuers under essential error induced by material misrepresentations on the part of the pursuers' said agent." That plea, which at once puts the defender in the position of pursuer of the issue, rests upon the following statement set out in his defence: an interview took place between Mr Allan, agent for the Bank, and the defender, Mr Greenshields, "on 3rd November 1908, in Mr Allan's private room at pursuers' branch bank at Lesmahagow. At said interview, in answer to defender's questions as to Hutchison's financial position, Mr Allan represented to and assured defender . . . that Hutchison's total indebtedness to the pursuers was less than £300." That was the vital question which was remitted to probation.

The law applicable to this case is well settled. A bank-agent is entitled to assume that an intending guarantor has made himself fully of Scotland Banking Co., (1863) 1 Macph. 704, per Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis, at p. 712; Young v. Clydesdale Bank, 17 R. 231, at p. 244; Brownlie v. Miller, (1880) 7 R. (H. L.) 66.

---

[1] 23 R. (H. L.) 22.

[2] Bell's Com., (7th ed.) Lord M'Laren's note, p. 403; Simpson v. Stewart, (1875) 2 R. 673; Kerr's Trustees v. Ker, (1883) 11 R. 108; Wallace v. Gibson, (1895) 22 R. (H. L.) 56; Walker's Trustees v. M'Kinlay, (1880) 7 R. (H. L.) 85; Maddison v. Alderson, (1883) 8 App. Cas. 467; Lyde v. Barnard, (1836) 1 M. & W. 101.

acquainted with the financial position of the customer whose debt he is about to guarantee. And the bank-agent is not bound to make any disclosure whatever regarding the customer's indebtedness to the bank. But if he does, either voluntarily or in answer to a question put, make any representation which turns out to be erroneous or untrue, then the guarantor who has relied upon that statement is entitled to liberation from his obligation. That is the law as laid down in the case of Young v. Clydesdale Bank[1] and some prior authorities to which we were referred, and is accepted by both parties as applicable to this case.

Now it is certain that, at the date when the letter of guarantee was signed, the customer was indebted to the Bank, not only in respect of an overdraft amounting to close on £300 sterling, but also in respect of certain promissory-notes amounting to, in round figures, £1100. It is equally certain that the existence of that indebtedness on the promissory-notes was well known to the bank-agent and was not known to Mr Greenshields, and that the latter would not have signed the letter of guarantee had he been aware of the indebtedness on the promissory-notes. The question, therefore, which at once emerges is this: Did the bank-agent at the interview prior to the date when the letter of guarantee was signed represent to the intending guarantor that Hutchison's (the customer's) total indebtedness to the pursuers was less than £300?—[Here followed the first passage from the Lord President's opinion quoted supra.]

I think it must be obvious that this, which is the whole evidence in the case upon the vital issue, is quite insufficient to sustain the defence and to cut down this formal letter of guarantee. Even on the assumption that Mr Greenshields's evidence was to the effect that the misrepresentation charged had actually been made, the evidence would have been insufficient because unsupported, not only unsupported but contradicted by Mr Allan. No doubt the Lord Ordinary says that he prefers Mr Greenshields's evidence to Mr Allan's, not, I gather, on the ground of its greater candour, but of clearer recollection. Be it so, nevertheless the unsupported although uncontradicted evidence of one reliable witness, deeply interested in the case, is not sufficient, in my opinion, to prove the whole case and to destroy this formal deed. But on the assumption that Mr Greenshields's evidence is to be accepted as it was given and to be considered as supported, it falls very far short of establishing his case, because the expression of a personal opinion that a man's financial position is good is not equivalent to a statement that his total indebtedness does not exceed a certain sum. An honest opinion may be entertained that a man's financial position is sound although his indebtedness at the time may be considerable. The Lord Ordinary, I observe, has fully acquitted Mr Allan of any intention to deceive. I think his Lordship was quite right, and that the general opinion which Mr Allan expressed regarding Hutchison's position was quite honestly given and honestly entertained.

I reach, therefore, without any hesitation, the conclusion that the evidence given is inadequate to sustain the defence. The Lord Ordinary

[1] 17 R. 231.

Jan. 14, 1914.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

Ld. President.

has reached a different conclusion, not because he finds that a misrepresentation was made—he finds no misrepresentation—not because he finds that a question was asked which elicited the answer that the total indebtedness of Hutchison to the Bank was less than £300—for no such question was put and no such answer was given—but the Lord Ordinary's judgment in favour of the defender is rested on this ground that the defender signed the guarantee under a material error, and this error was induced by the failure of Mr Allan to disclose the existence of the bill debts under circumstances which laid on him a duty of disclosure. So that the Lord Ordinary's judgment does not proceed upon the assumption that the defender has proved that misrepresentation was made regarding the amount of the customer's indebtedness. His judgment rests upon a failure to disclose on the part of the bank-agent. Now it is well-settled law, as I have already pointed out, that the bank-agent was entitled to assume that the intending guarantor was fully conversant with the financial position of the customer, and was not bound to make any disclosure whatever to the intending guarantor. The only circumstances in which I can conceive that a duty of disclosure would emerge, and a failure to disclose would be fatal to the Bank's case, would be where a customer put a question or made an observation in the presence and hearing of the bank-agent which necessarily and inevitably would lead anyone to the conclusion that the intending guarantor was labouring under a misapprehension with regard to the state of the customer's indebtedness. Nothing short of that, in my opinion, would do.

Now when I turn to the Lord Ordinary's reasoning in the note appended to his interlocutor, I find that the particular circumstance which, in his judgment, caused a duty of disclosure to emerge was that a statement was made to the defender that a guarantee for £300 might not be of much benefit to Hutchison, as the sum in it might be taken by the Bank to pay off his overdraft to that amount. On hearing this the defender agreed to give a guarantee for £500 so as to provide a substantial margin over said debt. In my opinion, if that statement was made—we shall see in a moment in what form it was made—it would fall very far short of an expression of view on the part of the intending guarantor which ought to have elicited a full disclosure of the amount of the customer's indebtedness by the bank-agent. The Lord Ordinary himself expresses some doubt as to the circumstances under which and the person by whom that statement was made, and that of itself would be sufficient, I think, to displace the ground of judgment, because the circumstances must be, as I think, plainly and unequivocally proved. But turning to the evidence, I think it will be found that the evidence of the bank-agent upon this topic, which has bulked so largely in the Lord Ordinary's view, is perfectly clear and distinct.—[Here followed the second passage from the Lord President's opinion quoted supra.]

That is to say, the bank-agent himself, without any question put or without any observation made by others, volunteers the statement that a guarantee for £300 might not be of much use to enable the customer to carry on his business, in respect that it might be taken by the Bank. That Mr Allan's account of what took place is correct is, I think, clear when one turns to the evidence of the customer himself, Hutchison, who says, "then we," that is to say, he and Mr Greenshields, the intending guarantor, "talked about the overdraft, and Mr Greenshields said that there was just a danger of the Bank seizing that, and it was then that I asked him kindly to make it £500 instead of the £300. It was either Mr Greenshields or I who mentioned the overdraft." "It was I," he says further on—alluding to what occurred at the subsequent meeting in the Bank—"who led off; I said, addressing Mr Allan, that I thought Mr Greenshields would kindly consent to make it £500 instead of £300, and then Mr Greenshields said that a hundred or two was neither here nor there seeing that everything was satisfactory, or words to that effect."

Now Mr Greenshields denies that anything of the kind took place at the first interview, and he says that the overdraft was mentioned at the second interview, but under circumstances by no means so favourable to himself as the circumstances stated by Mr Allan in the evidence I have just read.

It appears to me that to say that £300 might not go very far, and that it might be taken by the Bank, or would be taken by the Bank in respect of an overdraft, falls very far short of a distinct representation to the effect that the total indebtedness of the customer was less than £300, and is quite compatible with the view that the customer's indebtedness upon other obligations might amount to a very much larger sum. But that is the sole circumstance on which the Lord Ordinary founds when he says that there was a duty of disclosure laid upon the Bank which they failed to discharge. I think there was no duty of disclosure laid upon the Bank by anything that was said in the presence and hearing of the bank-agent either by Mr Greenshields himself or by the customer, and, accordingly, that his Lordship's judgment cannot be supported.

I move your Lordships, therefore, to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and to give the pursuers decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Lord Johnston.—Although I have had considerably more difficulty in the case than I think your Lordship has, I am now quite satisfied that the judgment which your Lordship proposes is the right one. One cannot of course avoid sympathising with anyone in the position of the late Mr Greenshields, who is ultimately responsible under a guarantee of this sort, because one sees clearly that, in this case, Mr Greenshields was misled. But he was misled, I think, partly by want of caution and full inquiry on his own part, and partly by unquestionable suppression of facts on the part of Hutchison, who is now bankrupt. But one's sympathy with the guarantor cannot affect the question of liability, and that, I think, is clear, unless one can follow the line of judgment which was taken by the Lord Ordinary. I thought that there was very great strength in what the Lord Ordinary says on this subject, and it was only on the explanations which your Lordship has given, and which I know are concurred in by my colleagues, that I see that the Lord Ordinary—though perfectly right in his reasoning, and therefore in his conclusion, if he is justified by the facts—is not so justified. I think that what he says in his judgment really amounts to this: Mr Allan was not bound to give any information whatever, but,

Jan. 14, 1914.

Royal Bank of Scotland v. Greenshields.

Lord Mackenzie.

disclosing the whole truth," or—and this would be a case of ordinary fraud—if the intending cautioner makes a statement to the bank-agent, or in his presence, which plainly shows that he is entering into a transaction in an entire misapprehension of the facts of the case, then the bank-agent equally would be under an obligation, arising out of the circumstances of the case, to prevent the cautioner from being misled.

Now, in the present case, no specific question was put which imposed a duty on the bank-agent to disclose the financial position of his customer. That is the only possible view upon the facts, and, if I recollect aright, it was not even attempted to be argued that there was a specific question imposing that duty. But then, the view which the Lord Ordinary has taken is that, in consequence of statements made during the interview, there was an obligation on the bank-agent to disclose that there was a possible indebtedness of £1100 upon outstanding bills.

I keep in view that in his cross-examination Mr Allan goes a little further than he did in the passage which has been already read from his examination-in-chief. His evidence amounts to this: he said he did not think £300 would benefit Hutchison by paying tradesmen's accounts, because it was very likely to be swallowed up by the bank overdraft. That was not a statement made in the course of an inquiry by the cautioner as to what the position of Hutchison was. It was a comment by the bank-agent on what the parties wished him to carry out. I am unable to find it proved that Mr Greenshields, in the presence and hearing of Mr Allan, the bank-agent, made any statement to the effect that he believed that the bank overdraft was the whole amount of the possible liabilities of Hutchison who asked for the guarantee. Accordingly, I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled.

LORD SKERRINGTON concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor reclaimed against and decerned against the defender for the sum sued for.

DUNDAS & WILSON, C.S.—J. MILLER THOMSON & Co., W.S.—Agents.

No. 36.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Menzies v. M'Kenna.

DAVID PRENTICE MENZIES, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—A. J. P. Menzies—Maclaren.

THE RIGHT HON. REGINALD M'KENNA, HIS MAJESTY'S SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT, AND OTHERS, Defenders (Respondents).—W. L. Mackenzie, K.C.—Gillon.

Jurisdiction—Court of Session—Declarator of Heirship.

An action was brought in the Court of Session for declarator that the pursuer was heir of a certain deceased person, the only purpose of the action being admittedly to obtain a decree which might be used as evidence before the Privy Council in support of a claim by the pursuer to be placed on the Roll of Baronets.

The Court dismissed the action as incompetent, in respect that a question of propinquity alone was a matter for the Sheriff of Chancery, and that the Court would not pronounce a decree, which would be inoperative except for the purpose of aiding the pursuer to maintain a claim elsewhere.

Officers of State v. Alexander, (1866) 4 Macph. 741, followed.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Menzies v. M'Kenna.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Ormidale.

ON 27th November 1912 David Prentice Menzies, Plean Castle, Mengieston, brought an action against the Right Honourable Reginald M'Kenna, His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, Home Office, London; the Right Honourable Alexander Ure, Lord Advocate for Scotland, Parliament Square, Edinburgh; Sir James Balfour Paul, Lyon King of Arms, Lyon Office, Edinburgh; and Sir William Patrick Byrne, Registrar of the Baronetage, Home Office, Whitehall, London. The only conclusion of the summons, other than the conclusion for expenses, was for declarator that "the pursuer is the nearest lawful heir male of line of Captain James Menzies of Comrie, Perthshire, who was born at Castle Menzies, in the parish of Weem and county of Perth, in or about the year 1663, and died at Comrie Castle, formerly in the parish of Weem and now in the parish of Dull and county of Perth, in or about the year 1748."

The pursuer averred that he was the nearest lawful heir male of line of Captain James Menzies of Comrie by a chain of descent which he set forth in detail.

He further averred that, by Royal Warrant dated 8th February 1910 and published in both the London Gazette and Edinburgh Gazette of 15th February 1910, it was declared and ordained, inter alia, that an official Roll of Baronets should be prepared and kept in the office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that the Roll should be prepared in consultation with one of the Kings of Arms, that any person, considering himself entitled to be placed on the Roll, should be at liberty to petition the King through the Home Secretary, and "(4) That if in such case, or in any circumstances whatever, Our said Secretary of State finds difficulty in advising Us as to the validity of the claims of any person to be placed or to be retained on the Roll he shall refer the matter either to Our Attorney-General for England, to the Lord Advocate for Scotland or to Our Attorney-General for Ireland for his opinion thereon, and may on consideration of that opinion direct that the said matter be referred to Our Privy Council to submit the same to examination and to advise Us thereon."

He also averred that on 24th December 1910 he had formally applied to the Home Secretary to be entered on the Roll of Baronets as successor (in respect of his relationship to Captain James Menzies, as above described) to the baronetcy of Menzies of Menzies upon the death of Sir Neill Menzies, Baronet, of Menzies, on 21st December 1910; and that the Home Secretary, after consultation with the Lyon King of Arms and the Lord Advocate, had declined to place the pursuer's name on the Roll.

Answers were lodged on behalf of the defenders, in which they averred, inter alia:—(Ans. 2) "Denied that the pursuer is the nearest lawful heir male of line of the said Captain James Menzies of Comrie."

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. (2) The pursuer's averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and the action ought therefore to be dismissed. (3) The defenders, not being the proper parties to be called upon to defend the action, are entitled to decree of absolvitor. (4) The pursuer's averments, so far as relevant, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Menzies v. M'Kenna.

On 23rd January 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Ormidale) sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of Lord Salvesen, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Dewar) on 16th January 1914.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The royal warrant of 8th February 1910 had altered the law as it stood at the date when Bosville v. Lord Macdonald[1] was decided. It entrusted the Privy Council with the duty of investigating claims to be put on the roll of baronets, and of satisfying itself by competent evidence. A decree of the Sheriff of Chancery was not enough for this purpose,[2] but no exception could be taken to a decree of the Court of Session, at least where, as here, there was a contradictor; and it was for the purpose of laying it before the Privy Council as evidence of his claim that the pursuer sought a decree in the present action. An action containing merely a declaratory conclusion was not necessarily incompetent.[3] In Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn[4] the Court of Session ordered a proof on a question of propinquity, and no doubt was suggested as to the competency of the procedure.

---

* "OPINION.—This is an interesting point and one which is of importance to the pursuer, and if I had any doubt on the matter I would have taken time to consider my judgment. But dealing only with the point of competency, and leaving out of view entirely the second question argued whether, there being but a bare declarator, the action is incompetent on that ground, I think the question is already decided by the case that was cited by the defenders, namely, the case of Bosville v. Lord Macdonald, 1910 S. C. 597. In the observations made by Lord Skerrington in that case I entirely concur, and it seems to me therefore that this case is ruled by the judgment which he pronounced. Besides, while it is said in the rubric to have been acquiesced in, an argument is reported to have been submitted for and against it, although there is an observation by the Lord President which seems to show that the reclaimers did not press their contention, but agreed finally that the question was one for the Sheriff of Chancery.

"The only ground which Mr Menzies suggests distinguishes the present case from the case of Bosville is that a royal warrant, dealing with the preparation and keeping of a roll of baronets, and providing for the procedure to be followed by any person desiring to be enrolled, was issued subsequently to the decision in Bosville's case; but it seems to me that, while that is historically quite correct, the warrant has not made any real difference in the course that a person in the position of the present pursuer ought to follow in the initial stages of his endeavour to prove his propinquity. I do not adjudicate upon the matter at all, but it seems to me that the point stated in the letter of the Lyon King of Arms of 24th January 1911, and the question he raises there, might be answered—I do not say that it would, but as at present advised, I am inclined to think that it might be answered—by the pursuer presenting to the Secretary of State through the Lyon King a service obtained in the Court of Chancery, showing that he was what he wants this Court in the present action to declare him to be, namely, the nearest lawful heir male of line of Captain James Menzies.

"Accordingly, following the decision of Bosville v. Lord Macdonald, so far as it deals with the question here raised, I must hold the present action incompetent, and dismiss it."

[1] 1910 S. C. 597.

[2] Sir Hugh Mitchell's claim, The Times, March 12, 1912.

[3] Stewart & Co. v. Sillars, (1906) 13 S. L. T. 800.

[4] 1908 S. C. 1237, per Lord M'Laren, at p. 1251.

Argued for the respondents;—The law of Scotland was not, and could not be, altered by the royal warrant, and Bosville v. Lord Macdonald[1] was still authoritative. The Court of Session had no original jurisdiction in this matter,[2] and the proper course for the pursuer was to obtain service from the Sheriff of Chancery. Such a service, though not perhaps conclusive, at least raised a presumption in favour of the person served.[3] At anyrate it was clearly incompetent to bring a declarator in the Court of Session that one person was, or was not, the heir of another.[4] Moreover, the Court would not pronounce a declarator of right in the absence of the proper contradictors,[5] and the respondents, though they were entitled to object to the procedure, had no real interest in the merits of the case.

Lord Salvesen.—This case raises an interesting question as to whether an action concluding only for declarator that the pursuer is the nearest lawful heir male of line of Captain James Menzies of Comrie, Perthshire, who was born in the year 1663, is competent in the Court of Session. The action is admittedly brought for the purpose of furthering the pursuer's claim to a baronetcy which is said to have lapsed in 1910 on the death of Sir Neill Menzies, the last holder of the title. I think it has been settled that this Court is not entitled in an action such as the present to declare the propinquity of one person to another, and that the proper Court for a person who wishes to serve as heir male of line or on any other footing to a deceased person is the Court of Chancery. The first proposition was, I think, conclusively established by the decision of the Court in Officers of State v. Alexander,[6] where it was held incompetent for one to bring a declarator that another is not the heir of a person deceased. No doubt it was a negative declarator which was there held to be incompetent, but if a negative declarator is incompetent, it appears to me that a positive declarator must be equally incompetent. That was a decision of the Second Division over which, at that time, Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis presided, and, so far as I am aware, there has never been any challenge of that decision which in any sense is binding upon us. We were referred by Mr Menzies to some observations made by Lord M'Laren in the case of the Earl of Lauderdale v. Wedderburn,[6] but all that was decided there was that the Court of Session had jurisdiction to determine a claim to the office of Hereditary Standard Bearer of Scotland, that office being a hereditary office and not a mere title of honour. Now, a baronetcy is a mere title of honour. It confers no privileges, except those that are social, and the pursuer here does not allege that there is any question of heritable right depending upon the success of his declaratory conclusion.

Mr Menzies has practically conceded that such is the law, but he says

---

[1] 1910 S. C. 597.

[2] Stair, iv. 1, 43; Mackay's Manual of Practice, p. 118; Sir A. Moncreiff v. Lord Moncreiff, (1904) 6 F. 1021.

[3] Norris v. Gilchrist, (1847) 9 D. 466, per Jord Justice-Clerk Hope, at p. 474.

[4] Officers of State v. Alexander, (1866) 4 Macph. 741.

[5] Allgemeine Deutsche Credit Anstalt v. Scottish Amicable Life Assurance Society, 1908 S. C. 33.

[6] 1908 S. C. 1237, at p. 1251.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Menzies v. M'Kenna.

Lord Salvesen.

that a change has been effected by the Royal Warrant which was published in the London Gazette of 15th February 1910, the object of which is to institute a roll of baronets. Whatever be the effect of the warrant, it seems to me that, so far from assisting the pursuer, it supplies an additional reason for holding that this Court cannot entertain the present action, because it provides machinery for carrying out its purpose in which the Court of Session has no place. It provides that the claimant may apply by petition to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State has the power of remitting the matter, where a Scottish baronetcy is concerned, to the Lord Advocate, and upon his advice, if he thinks fit, of directing the matter to be referred to the Privy Council for examination. The pursuer does not maintain that a decree of the Court of Session would place him on that roll but, so far as I understand his position, he is anxious to get a decree in this Court in order that he may present it to the Secretary of State as prima facie evidence in support of his claim to be put on the roll. Now, we are not in the habit of granting decrees in order simply that they may be evidence in some other Court or tribunal. We decide matters of fact finally between parties who are interested in the settlement of these particular matters. But I do not think there is any instance, and none has been cited to us, in which the Court of Session investigated a disputed question of fact, not with the view of their decree being operative, but with the view of aiding the person in whose favour the decree was sought to maintain a claim elsewhere.

I do not think we need say how the position of this pursuer may be improved. It may be that if he obtained a service from the Sheriff of Chancery, after an inquiry made by the Sheriff into his claim, that that might assist him in establishing his claim in the proper quarter. Certainly, as he has pointed out, it would not be conclusive, because jurisdiction is not vested in the Sheriff of Chancery, but at all events it would be competent for him to serve before the Sheriff of Chancery whatever the value of such a service might be. All that we have to decide is whether this action is competent, and on that point I have no difficulty in reaching the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Guthrie.—I am of the same opinion. Evidently this is a test case, and the defenders were right in appearing, but I doubt whether they should have gone beyond tabling their position in regard to the preliminary pleas, and whether it was their duty to raise any question on the merits of the case. The pursuer does not ask us to serve him heir to the individual to whom your Lordship has referred, who was born in 1663 and died in 1748, but the result would be practically the same.

I agree with your Lordship that the case is ruled by the case of Alexander.[1] It further appears to me that what the pursuer asks here we cannot grant, because it would be useless. If the defenders opposed the application on the merits, the Privy Council could say that they were not the proper contradictors. If the defenders did not appear, the pursuer would only get a decree in absence, to which the Privy Council would attach little

[1] 4 Macph. 741.

Jan. 16, 1914.

Menzies v. M'Kenna.

Lord Guthrie.

importance; especially in view of the fact that, if he had obtained service from the Sheriff of Chancery, the pursuer would at least have required to produce sufficient evidence to satisfy the Sheriff that he had a prima facie case.

I agree with your Lordship on the further ground that it would be against the practice of this Court to grant a decree which is not going to settle anything finally so far as the pursuer is concerned, but is merely to aid him to maintain a claim elsewhere. We are not bound to advise the pursuer here; and it appears from the correspondence that he is not in the position which has been represented—namely, helpless and unable to take any further step. It is quite clear from the documents referred to on record that if he served he would, at all events, be in a position to make renewed application, and that his service, if tendered, would certainly be considered by the Secretary of State in the first instance, who might refer it to the Privy Council. If the pursuer wants to take any further step he has this course clearly open to him; whether it would advantage him or not in the end, it is not for us to say.

Lord Dewar concurred.

The Court adhered.

Bruce & Black, W.S.—Sir William S. Haldane, W.S.—Agents.

No. 37.

Jan. 17, 1914.

Edgar v. Lamont.

Mrs Jessie M'Intosh or Edgar, Pursuer (Respondent).—D.-F. Dickson—Maclaren.

Alexander Lamont, Defender (Reclaimer).—Horne, K.C.—D. M. Wilson.

Reparation—Negligence—Unskilful treatment by doctor—Ground of action—Delict or breach of contract—Title to sue—Patient or employer of doctor.

Held that the ground of action in a claim of damages against a medical man for unskilful treatment is breach of his duty to his patient and not breach of his contract with his employer; and, accordingly, that a married woman had a title to sue such an action, although the medical man had been employed to attend to her by her husband and not by herself.

2d Division. Ld. Anderson.

On 16th October 1913 Mrs Jessie M'Intosh or Edgar, with the consent and concurrence of her husband, brought an action against Alexander Lamont, M.B., C.M., concluding for payment of £500.

The pursuer averred that on 5th June 1913 she cut her finger, and on the following day sent for the defender, that she was under his care for the next fortnight, and that in consequence of his improper treatment of the wound she suffered great pain, and finally had to have the finger amputated.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage in the manner condescended on, through the gross fault of the defender, is entitled to reparation therefor from the defender. (2) The loss of the pursuer's finger having been caused by the gross fault, incompetence, and negligence of the defender, in consequence of his failure to afford proper and sufficient professional treatment and attention, the defender is liable in reparation therefor to the pursuer. (3) The sum sued for being a reasonable estimate of the loss,

Jan. 17, 1914.

Edgar v. Lamont.

injury, and damage which the pursuer has suffered, and will continue to suffer, through the gross fault, incompetence, and carelessness of the defender as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, the action ought to be dismissed.

On 17th December 1913 the Lord Ordinary (Anderson) repelled the first and second pleas in law for the defender, and allowed an issue.*

The defender reclaimed, and the case was heard before the Second Division (consisting of Lord Salvesen, Lord Guthrie, and Lord Ormidale) on 17th January 1914.

Argued for the reclaimer;—The ground of action was breach of contract and not delict, and the pursuer had no title to sue an action for breach of contract when she was not one of the contracting

---

* "OPINION.—[After narrating the facts]—At the outset, I deal with the first point that was argued, namely, whether or not the lady has a title to sue the action. It was maintained by Mr Wilson for the defender that she had no title to sue the action, inasmuch as it was not she who made the contract with the defender; and it was contended that, as the contract was the husband's, he alone had the title to sue under it for any remissness on the part of the defender in executing that contract. I was referred to a number of cases in different branches of the law, such as the case of Cameron v. Young, 1907 S. C. 475, and in the House of Lords, 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7, and the case of Kennedy v. Bruce, 1907 S. C. 845, which were cases of landlord and tenant. I was also referred to the cases of Raes v. Meek, 16 R. (H. L.) 31, and Tully v. Ingram, 19 R. 65, which are cases where the conduct of a law-agent was involved, and I was asked on these authorities to hold that the pursuer had no title to sue the action. On the other hand, Mr Maclaren for the pursuer referred me to a number of English Cases, such as the case of Pippin v. Sheppard, (1822) 11 Price, Exch. 400, where it was decided that the wife alone, who had been injured by the negligence of the medical man, was entitled to sue him for damages; and the case of Gladwell v. Steggall, (1839) 5 Bing. (N. C.) 733, where the injured individual was a young girl of the age of ten years, and where the doctor had been instructed to attend her by the mother, but where, nevertheless, the Court held that the injured girl was the proper person to sue the action, and Chief-Justice Tindal laid it down as the law of England that in a case like that the claim of the injured person was not ex contractu, but ex delicto; also to Longmeid v. Holliday, (1851) 6 Exch. (W. H. & G.) 761, and in our own Courts, Farquhar v. Murray, (1901) 3 F. 859, in which the opinions of the Judges indicate that the foundation of the action was really delict and not contract. I think that this is according to the right reason of the thing because, if the injured woman here is not entitled to sue this action and recover damages for personal injuries, it seems to me that there are no legal means whereby compensation may be recovered in respect of those injuries. The husband certainly could not sue and make the ground of damages claimed the fact that his wife had sustained those personal injuries. I do not know that he could sue in respect of loss of her services of which he was deprived for a certain time. That is the law in England, but I am not aware that there is any case in this country in which a husband has maintained his right to obtain reparation in respect of loss of service on the part of his wife. Accordingly, I decide that the pursuer here has a title to sue the action, and I repel the first plea in law for the defender.—[His Lordship then dealt with the question of relevancy, with which this report is not concerned]."

parties.[1] Medical attendance was one of the necessaries of family life, for which the husband as head of the family was liable, and though it happened to be the wife who called in the doctor here, the contract was truly with the husband. A good analogy was to be found in the cases where a law-agent was sued in respect of failure to give proper services, and where it was held that he was professionally liable only to his employer.[2] The cases of Pippin v. Sheppard,[3] Gladwell v. Steggall,[4] and Kennedy v. Bruce,[5] referred to by the Lord Ordinary, were no longer sound law after the decisions in Cavalier v. Pope,[6] and Cameron v. Young.[7] Longmeid v. Holliday[8] dealt with a wholly different set of circumstances, and in Farquhar v. Murray,[9] the action—in distinction to the present case—was at the instance of the doctor's employer. [Counsel for the reclaimer then dealt with questions of relevancy and of the mode of procedure, with which this report is not concerned.]

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

Lord Salvesen.—I think the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion.

The first question is as to the pursuer's title to sue. The argument maintained by the defender is to the effect that this is a claim for breach of contract, that the only person with a title to sue is the person with whom the contract was made, and that the contract was made, not with the pursuer, who is a married women, but with her husband, because although it was the pursuer who sent for the doctor, she did so as agent for her husband and on the footing that he must pay for the doctor's services.

No doubt it is sometimes difficult to distinguish between liability arising from breach of contract and liability arising from breach of duty. We were referred to a landlord and tenant case, Cameron v. Young,[1] where it was held that the wife of a tenant could not maintain an action against the landlord for his failure to perform the contractual duty of making the house habitable. But that case is clearly distinguishable from the present, and there is a series of decisions in England to establish the proposition that a patient is entitled to a direct action ex delicto against a doctor for professional incompetence or negligence, and that no action lies in respect of the injuries so sustained at the instance of the person (other than the patient) who contracted for the doctor's services. I think that view is consistent with our own law and with common sense. To hold otherwise would lead to an entire denial of any remedy to a person who did not happen to be the person who had contracted with the doctor, and I should be very slow indeed to arrive at that result. It seems to me that the clear ground of action is that a doctor owes a duty to the patient, whoever has called him in and whoever is liable for his bill, and it is for breach of that duty that he is liable, in other words, that it is for negligence arising in the course of the [1] Cameron v. Young, 1907 S. C. 475, aff. 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7.

[2] Begg on Law-Agents, (2nd ed.) p. 259; Robertson v. Fleming, (1861) 4 Macq. 167; Tully v. Ingram, (1891) 19 R. 65.
[3] (1822) 11 Price, 400. [4] (1839) 5 Bing. (New Cases) 733.
[5] 1907 S. C. 845. [6] [1906] A. C. 428. [7] 1908 S. C. (H. L.) 7.
[8] (1851) 6 Exch. (W. H. & G.) 761. [9] (1901) 3 F. 859.

Jan. 17, 1914.

Edgar v. Lamont.

Lord Salvesen.

employment, and not in respect of breach of contract with the employer. That being so, I have no difficulty in reaching the same result as has been arrived at in England, and in sustaining the Lord Ordinary's view that the plea of no title should be repelled.—[His Lordship then dealt with questions with which this report is not concerned.]

LORD GUTHRIE and LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

STURROCK & STURROCK, S.S.C.—FRASER & DAVIDSON, W.S.—Agents.

No. 38.

Jan. 23, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

JOHN WALKER & SONS, LIMITED, Petitioners.—Watson, K.C.—Wilton.

Company—Alteration of memorandum—Power to sell or amalgamate—Power to acquire similar businesses—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), sec. 9 (1).

A limited company presented a petition for confirmation of a special resolution, by which it was proposed to alter its memorandum of association by adding powers to acquire similar businesses; to sell the undertaking of the company; or to amalgamate with any other firm, person, or company.

The Court, while confirming the power to acquire similar businesses, refused to confirm the other alterations, on the ground that they were not within the alterations which a company was authorised to make by sec. 9 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

1ST DIVISION. ON 28th August 1913 John Walker & Sons, Limited, presented a petition under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908,* for confirmation of alteration of the Company's memorandum of association.

The petition set forth:—

"1. That the petitioners, John Walker & Sons, Limited, were incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, on 11th November 1886, and have since carried on business. . . .

"3. The objects for which the Company was established, as set forth in clause 3 of its memorandum of association, as altered by special resolution of the Company passed on 21st December 1893, and confirmed on 8th January 1894, and confirmed by your Lordships by interlocutor dated 20th March 1894, are as follows, viz.:—'(1) To carry through and complete a transaction for the purchase and payment of the price of "Walker's Bonded Stores and Offices," Strand Street and Croft Street,

* The Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII. cap. 69), enacts:—Sec. 9. "(1) Subject to the provisions of this section a company may, by special resolution, alter the provisions of its memorandum with respect to the objects of the company, so far as may be required to enable it—

"(a) To carry on its business more economically or more efficiently; or

"(b) To attain its main purpose by new or improved means; or

"(c) To enlarge or change the local area of its operations; or

"(d) To carry on some business which under existing circumstances may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company; or

"(e) To restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum.

(2) The alteration shall not take effect until and except in so far as it is confirmed on petition by the Court."

Jan. 28, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

Kilmarnock, in the parish of Kilmarnock and county of Ayr, belonging to Alexander Walker, wine merchant, Kilmarnock, or the firm of John Walker & Sons, wine merchants there, of which the said Alexander Walker is the only individual partner; together with the goodwill of the business of said firm of John Walker & Sons, and their registered trade-mark, and whole machinery, fittings, and other apparatus in the said premises, and the whole stock in trade and other effects belonging to the said Alexander Walker or to his said firm; and of the lease of the shop and premises in Portland Street and Strand Street, Kilmarnock, held by the said firm of John Walker & Sons or the said Alexander Walker as an individual, and likewise the lease of the offices, vaults, and premises at 3 Crosby Square, Bishopgate Street, London, occupied by the said firm of John Walker & Sons, with the whole machinery, fittings, and other apparatus and whole stock in trade and other effects belonging to the said firm. (2) To work the business hitherto carried on by the said firm of John Walker & Sons as bonded store keepers, wine and spirit merchants, Italian warehousemen, and commission agents, and to make the purchases and sales required in the said business, and to purchase and sell all such materials and goods as may be in any way used in connection with the said business, and also to carry on such other business operations as are connected with or incident to the said business. (3) To acquire the distillery known as Cardow Distillery, in the parish of Knockando, Morayshire, with the goodwill of the business now or lately carried on at said distillery, and the whole pertinents of the said distillery and business. (4) To carry on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere the business of distillers, maltsters, and merchants. (5) To purchase [and sell heritable property]. (6) To acquire [&c., patent rights]. (7) To register [&c., trade-marks]. (8) To let or hire all or any part of the property or effects of the Company. (9) To draw [&c., bills and promissory-notes], to discount and sell promissory-notes, bills of exchange, and other negotiable instruments. (10) To borrow any sum or sums of money by way of discount, cash credit, or overdraft, or upon bond, debenture, mortgage, promissory-note, or receipt, or in any other manner, and to grant security for all or any of the sums so borrowed, or for which the Company may be, or may become, liable, and by way of such security to dispone, mortgage, pledge, or charge the whole or any part of the property, assets, or revenue of the Company (including uncalled capital), or to dispone, transfer, or convey the same absolutely or in trust, and to give to lenders or creditors powers of sale and other usual and necessary powers, and also to raise money by the issue of debenture stock. (11) To advance money by way of loan. . . . (12) To enter into and subscribe all writings necessary for carrying through the said transactions and conducting the business and otherwise carrying out the objects and transacting the business of the Company.' . . . .'"

"5. At an extraordinary general meeting of the Company duly convened, held on 30th June 1913, the following resolution was duly passed, and at a subsequent extraordinary general meeting also duly convened, held on 18th July 1913, the same was duly confirmed, so as to become a special resolution of the Company, viz.:—'That clause 3 of the memorandum of association of the Company be altered so as to include the following additional objects, namely—(13) To subscribe for, take, purchase, or otherwise acquire and hold shares or other interests in or securities of any other company having objects altogether or in part similar to those of this Company or carrying on any business capable of being conducted so as directly or indirectly to benefit this Company. (14) To enter into arrangements with local, municipal, and other authorities or companies, corporations, or persons, and to obtain any rights, guarantees, or privileges, and to carry out such arrangements. (15) To acquire, carry on, or undertake the whole of the business and assets, and to undertake the liabilities of any person, firm, or company possessing any property suitable for any of the purposes of this Company, or carrying on any business which this Company is authorised to carry on or which can conveniently be carried on in connection with the same, and as consideration or part of the consideration for such acquisition to pay cash or to issue shares, stock, or obligations, or to acquire any interest, or to amalgamate with or enter into any arrangment for sharing profits or co-operation with any firm, person, or company. (16) To establish and support associations and institutions to benefit the employees of this Company, to subscribe money for charitable or benevolent objects, and to give pensions to the servants and employees of this Company. (17) To sell, improve, manage, develop, exchange, lease, mortgage, dispose of, turn to account, or otherwise deal with the undertaking of this Company, and all or any part of the property and rights of this Company, either for cash, shares, debentures, or debenture stock, or any other consideration. (18) To do all or any of the above mentioned things as principals or agents or otherwise, or by trustees, agents, or otherwise, and either alone or in partnership. (19) To do all such other things as may be incidental to or connected with any of the above mentioned objects.' . . .

Jan. 23, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

"8. The said alteration is required to enable the Company to carry out the first four purposes specified in section 9, subsection 1, of the said statute. It is now customary for incorporated companies engaged in similar business to have, by their memoranda of association, the powers specified in the said alteration, and they are necessary for the proper and efficient carrying on of the Company's business."

No answers were lodged to the petition.

On 15th October 1913 the Court remitted to Sir George M. Paul, D.K.S., to inquire into the procedure and the reason for the proposed alteration of the memorandum of association, and to report.

On 17th December 1913 Sir George Paul reported in favour of confirming the alterations included in the special resolution, with the exception of those giving the company power to sell or dispose of the undertaking or to amalgamate.*

---

* Sir George Paul's report contained the following passages:—"It is stated in the petition that the proposed alteration of the Company's memorandum of association 'is required to enable it to carry out the first four purposes specified in section 9, subsection 1, of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908; that it is now customary for incorporated companies engaged in similar business to have by their memoranda of association the powers specified in the said alteration, and that they are necessary for the proper and efficient carrying on of the Company's business.

"'But,' as was observed by Lord Kinnear in Glasgow Tramway Company v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 18 R. 675, at p. 683, 'the Court is not entitled to sanction such resolutions merely because they appear reasonable and proper in the interests of the Company itself. We must be satisfied that the conditions under which the statute allows the memorandum of association to be altered are complied with.'

"The alterations authorised by the statute must have for their objects:

The case was heard before the First Division (without Lord Mackenzie) on 15th January 1914. Jan. 23, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

Argued for the petitioners;—In the passage quoted by the Reporter from the opinion of Lord Kinnear in the case of Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, Limited v. Magistrates of Glasgow[1] his Lordship was dealing with a proposal to introduce a purpose "entirely foreign to the original purposes of the memorandum of association,"[2] which could not be said of the proposals of the petitioners here. The ground of the decision in the case of Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Company, Limited[3] (referred to by the Reporter as that which had been followed in the case of the present Company in 1894, when the Court refused to confirm general powers to sell the business of the Company or to amalgamate), had been departed from in Scotland,[4] except in the unreported case of the Biggar Auction Mart, decided on 14th May 1912, which should be reconsidered. In the

(1) the more economical or more efficient conduct of the business; or (2) the attainment of the Company's main purpose by new and improved means; or (3) the enlargement or change of the local area of its operations; or (4) the carrying on of some business which, under existing circumstances, might conveniently or advantageously be combined with the Company's business.

"'The alteration which is contemplated in that clause' (of the statute) 'seems to me to be an alteration which will leave the business of the Company substantially what it was before, with only such changes in the mode of conducting it as will enable it to be carried on more economically and more efficiently,'—Mr Justice Warrington in the Cyclists' Touring Club, [1907] 1 Ch., at p. 274.

"In the reference which has been made to the Company's special resolution of 1894 and interlocutor of the Second Division following thereon, it was stated that certain powers included in the special resolution had been refused. These were: (1) to acquire the business or undertaking of any other company carrying on any business which the Company might legally carry on; (2) to sell or transfer the business and undertaking of the Company; and (3) to amalgamate with any other company in the United Kingdom established for objects similar to any of those for which the Company was established. The case is not reported, but the interlocutor of 20th March 1894 will be found on page 14 of the printed memorandum and articles of association, No. 11 of process. The grounds of the refusal were no doubt those given about the same time by the same Division on a similar application by Young's Paraffin Company (21 R. 384), viz., that 'the Act did not contemplate that such general powers should be conferred before the necessity of using them arose.' But the Court stated that they 'would consider any special transaction which the Company might wish to carry out under such articles.' And, in point of fact, they had, as already mentioned, allowed to the petitioning Company (John Walker & Sons) in 1894 the specific application for power to acquire the Cardow distillery.

"In view of the statement in Palmer's Company Precedents (10th, edition) i. 1208, that 'on the whole the Courts have shown themselves inclined to place a liberal and reasonable construction on the Act,' and of decisions in the English Courts (In re New Westminster Brewery Co., Limited, [1911] 105 L. T. R. 946, and the unreported case of In re Provident

[1] (1891) 18 R. 675, at p. 683. [2] Ibid, at p. 684.

[3] (1894) 21 R. 384.

[4] King Line, Limited, (1902) 4 F. 504; London and Edinburgh Shipping Co., Limited, 1909 S. C. 1, at p. 3, footnote, art. 11; Innerleithen Gas Co. (1902) (not reported).

Jan. 23, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

last mentioned case power to acquire other businesses had been granted, while powers to sell or amalgamate were refused. In England these powers had been granted[1] after citation of the case of Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Company,[2] and they had been refused in the case of Cyclists' Touring Club,[3] only because the alterations there sought were not within the class described by Mr Justice Warrington in that case in the passage quoted by the Reporter. In the present case the proposed alterations were within that class, as was explained by Mr Gore-Browne in his opinion quoted by the Reporter. The jurisdiction of the Court to sanction an alteration of the objects of a company was intended to be exercised on broad principles,[4] and the alterations here proposed in terms of resolutions unanimously passed and confirmed by the Company should be confirmed by the Court, without any such change as was proposed by the Reporter.

Clerks' and General Guarantee Association therein referred to) in which the general powers refused in the cases of this Company and the Paraffin Company before referred to were granted, the petitioning Company has again included in its special resolution the general powers previously refused to it, viz. (1) to acquire other businesses of the same nature as that which the Company is authorised to carry on, or which can conveniently be carried on, in connection with the Company's main business; (2) to sell or dispose of the Company's undertaking; and (3) to amalgamate with any company, firm, or person.

"The Company has requested the Reporter to bring under the notice of your Lordships information with which it has been furnished by Mr Gore-Browne, K.C., an eminent English counsel, respecting the practice in the English Courts on applications for power to sell a company's undertaking or to amalgamate with other companies. Upon several occasions Mr Gore-Browne observes such applications have been before the English courts, and 'in all such cases the new powers have been allowed, upon each occasion the attention of the Court being called to the provisions in question.' He has never 'known such a clause as either of those in question rejected.' He further says, 'the ground justifying such extensions is that amalgamation (which often is merely the absorption of a smaller company) enables the Company to carry on its business more economically and efficiently, and to carry on some business which may be conveniently and advantageously combined with that of the Company; and that a sale of the undertaking for shares or other interests in another company is only an amalgamation justified on the before-mentioned grounds, while a sale for cash often enables a company to get rid of a business which by reason of competition or otherwise cannot be advantageously carried on, and to employ the funds obtained by the sale in a more economical or efficient carrying on of the general business which the Company is authorised to carry on or to attain its main purpose by new or improved means, or to change the area of its operations (e.g. by removing the business to some place not affected by the competition).' Mr Gore-Browne, however, says that, so far as he is aware, the matters in question have not been before the Court of Appeal in England.

"Palmer (Precedents, 9th edition, i. 1153), observed that there is no

---

[1] New Westminster Brewery Co., Limited, (1911) 105 L. T. R. 946; Anglo-American Telegraph Co., Limited, (1911) 105 L. T. R. 947.

[2] (1891) 21 R. 384.

[3] [1907] 1 Ch. 269, Warrington, J., at p. 274.

[4] Palmer's Company Law, (9th ed.) 416; Palmer's Company Precedents, (11th ed.) i. 1311-1313.

At advising on 23rd January 1914,— Jan. 23, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

LORD JOHNSTON.—John Walker & Sons, Limited, were incorporated in 1886. The main, indeed the sole, object of the constitution of the Company as set forth in the original memorandum of association was the acquisition of the business of an existing firm of spirit merchants, embracing (a) goodwill; (b) premises in Kilmarnock and London; and (c) plant and stock in trade in or connected with these premises: and having acquired the business of bonded storekeepers, wine and spirit merchants, Italian warehousemen, and commission-agents (to give it its full description), to carry it on, and to carry on also such other business operations as should be connected with or incident to said business.

Proceeding under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890,[1] section 1, the Company in 1894, with the sanction of the Court, altered the existing memorandum of association. But in so doing it did nothing which affected the object of its existing constitution. The purpose of this alteration was to enable the Company to acquire a particular distillery in Morayshire, and to carry on the business of distillers in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. Such addition to the business of the Company, though hardly warranted by the terms of the original power 'to confirm a resolution empowering the company to dispose of its undertaking.' This observation is, however, omitted in the 10th edition.

---

"In the unreported case of the Biggar Auction Mart Company, your Lordships of the First Division, by your interlocutor of 14th May 1912, after hearing counsel, confirmed a general power to acquire other businesses of a similar nature to the company's main business, but refused confirmation of a power to sell the company's main undertaking or to amalgamate, on the ground that the powers of alteration under the 9th section of the Companies Act are limited in a way which excludes the conferring of a power to dispose of the undertaking or to amalgamate. It appears to be assumed in the Act that the Company is not to lose its identity; the authorised alteration must be for its advantage as a going and continuing concern.

"In view of that decision of your Lordships, and the powers allowed in that and in other previous cases, the Reporter is of opinion that the present application might be confirmed as regards all the objects included in the special resolution other than those to sell or dispose of the undertaking or to amalgamate. Considering that nearly twenty years have elapsed since the refusal of 1894, and that the Courts seem now inclined to take a more liberal view of the statute, the Reporter ventures to suggest that the general power to acquire other businesses, which is now being granted in other cases, might be allowed.

"As regards the other powers, viz., to sell the undertaking, or to amalgamate, if your Lordships, following your decision in the Biggar Auction Mart case, should see fit to refuse them, the words 'amalgamate with or' in the fifteenth subclause should be deleted; and, if the general power to acquire other businesses be confirmed, the seventeenth subclause should be altered, as in the Biggar case, so as to be applicable only to after acquired businesses. It might read thus:—'To improve, manage, or develop the undertaking of this Company and all or any part of its property and rights; also to sell, improve, manage, develop, exchange, lease, mortgage, dispose of, turn to account, or otherwise deal with any branch or part of the Company's undertaking which may have been acquired by it as an adjunct to its main business.'"

[1] 53 and 54 Vict. cap. 62.

Jan. 23, 1914.

John Walker & Sons, Limited.

Ld. Johnston.

memorandum, viz., to carry on such other business operations as should be connected with or incident to its original business, was one which might be made under the express terms of the Act 1890, section 1 (5) (d), because it would enable the Company "to carry on some business or businesses which under existing circumstances may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the Company."

Now, the Company, taking advantage of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, section 9, proposes still further to alter the memorandum of association by the addition of seven new articles. Of these, six, if they are not practically already included in the original memorandum, are alterations which are completely covered by the terms of the above section, and to these the Reporter has taken no exception. But there is a seventh, of very doubtful propriety in itself, which the Reporter holds to be outwith the purview of the above section. In this I agree with him.

